P R E F A C E.

WHEN I first described the nature and proposed contents of this work, I prepared my readers for "such alterations, additions and improvements, as time and experience might suggest." Many and useful have been the suggestions of these patient monitors. After having finished the two volumes, which complete the first year of the work, I now regard it as having assumed its permanent form and manner.

This volume, like the former one, may be considered as divided into two parts; the first consisting of the numbers, which have been published weekly during the half year, or, of a reprint of those numbers; the second, of the Supplement. The former of these divisions contains a collection of all authentic documents, appertaining to state affairs, or to matters of political economy, whether they immediately relate to this country or not; and, in making this collection, care has constantly been taken to recur to such compacts and transactions of past times, as do, or may affect the circumstances of the present time.—During the Session of Parliament, a weekly account of the proceedings is given, reserving the Debates, corrected and at full length, to be given in the Supplement to the volume. As occasion requires, and time affords opportunity, brief Notices are given of such new Books as relate to history, politics, or political economy, or that bear upon subjects connected therewith. The preceding heads are followed by a selection of such Foreign and Domestic Intelligence as appears to be of public importance; to which is added, a Record of Appointments, of Bankruptcies, Births, Deaths, Marriages, Prices. The scale of these articles has, in the latter numbers, been abridged; but whatever has been left out in the body of the work, will be found in the Supplement.—Besides the aforementioned matter, which is necessarily supplied by time and events, each sheet of the work contains the Editor's observations relative to all the most important current events and transactions. These observations are, for want of a more comprehensive phrase, called Summaries of Politics, and, upon an uninterrupted perusal of them, they will, I think, be found to form a complete series of statements, arguments, and reflections: and, when, to this series, are added the detached articles from correspondents, whether in the form of Essays, Letters, or Extracts, the whole of the numbers, taken together, forms a Chronicle, not only of events and transactions, but of the opinions, feelings, and motives connected therewith.

The compilers of Annual Registers have adopted a different, and, in my opinion, a far less perfect mode of arranging their materials, which it is their custom to divide into classes, instead of placing them in the order in which they were first communicated to the Public. According to their method, all the State Papers are so inserted as to follow each other without the intervention of other matter; and so of the Proceedings in Parliament, the Historical Remarks, &c. &c. But it is, I think, evident, that this classification can be attended with no one advantage, while it has many very great disadvantages. Considering the Register merely as a book of reference, it is of little import how the materials are arranged, so that they are all included in the book, and are pointed to by the Index in such a manner as to be found with perfect facility; but, as a book for perusal, the chronological order is certainly the most favourable to a clear, an easy, and satisfactory comprehension of the divers matters contained in it. At first sight, it may appear, that the chronological order, followed without reference to the difference in the kind of materials, produces, in one and the same sheet, a heterogeneous mass of Treaties with Foreign Powers, Debates in the Parliament, Intelligence from abroad, Occurrences at home, Fluctuations in the Stocks, Price of Bread, Political Reflections, &c. &c. Yet, upon closer observation, it will be found, that there is a very intimate connexion between all these; that they explain and elucidate each other, and that, though widely different in their nature, the reader must see them all, and all together too, in order to have a full and fair view of the political picture, of which they are the component parts. An article, on the contrary, contained in a Register where the classifying order is pursued, has seldom any connexion with those which immediately precede or come after it ; and, in the studying of it, the reader very rarely indeed derives any aid from the situation in which it is found. Where, for instance, is the connexion between two State Papers ? What help, in general, does the one afford towards the just appreciation of the other ? To know what was thought and said of the new division of Germany, to obtain any knowledge respecting it, other than that which is to be drawn from the Declaration of France and Russia, recourse must be had to those other sources of information, which here accompany the Declaration, but which, in a work otherwise constructed, must be sought for elsewhere, not always with a certainty of success, and never without considerable pains.

The twenty-six sheets, which form the Chronicle for the half year, did not, however, appear to me to be quite sufficient to render the work complete. Several articles presented themselves, which, though too long to be inserted in the Weekly Numbers, were absolutely necessary to the completion of my plan. These, I therefore, resolved to publish in a half yearly Supplement, to be supplied, at a moderate price, to the purchasers of the Weekly Numbers ; and, in this second volume, I have taken advantage of the convenience offered by this plan to render the work a complete Parliamentary Register also, which it was not, at first, my intention to do.—The contents of the Supplement to this volume are as follows.

1. PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS.—All the principal reports, returns, accounts, estimates, &c. &c. (being upwards of sixty in number) which were laid before the Parliament during the last session.
2. PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES, at length, on the Preliminary and Definitive Treaties with France. These debates, which were the only ones of much interest during the session, and which are, and long will be, constantly wanted to refer to, are here collected and arranged with great care, and from the best materials.—This head, together with the preceding one and the reports of Parliamentary Proceedings in the body and supplement of Vol. I. will be found to form a Parliamentary Register of the last session much more complete, as well as more interesting, than any other that has been published.
3. A LIST OF THE NEW PARLIAMENT, together with a selection of the addresses to the Electors, in different parts of the kingdom.
4. PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES, from the commencement of the present session to the recess, collected and arranged with great care.—These debates, together with the sort of Journal of Proceeding which has been kept, during this session, in the weekly Numbers, forms a complete Register of the Parliament down to the recess ; and the next Volume will, of course, continue it down to the end of the session, including all the accounts, reports, estimates, &c. &c.
5. PAPERS RELATIVE TO INDIA.—Under this head are contained, not only the Official Papers laid before Parliament, but all such others as I have been able to collect, and

- as appeared to me likely to be useful to my readers.—There are not less than seventy articles under this head.
6. Statistical Table relative to the Cape of Good Hope.
 7. PUBLIC PAPERS.—All papers of this description which were omitted in the weekly Numbers.
 8. FOREIGN OFFICIAL PAPERS.—Many Dispatches, Decrees, &c. which were not published in the weekly Numbers.
 9. A translation from a work entitled "Etat Commercial de la France," containing comments on Mr. Dundas's Speech relative to the effects which the treaty of Amiens will have on our rights in India.
 10. Extracts from Charmilly's Letter to B. Edwards on the effect of the restoration of St Domingo to France, and on the general consequences of a regicide peace.
 11. Memoir respecting Malta.
 12. Letter respecting the Grand Mastership of Malta.
 13. Count Dietrichstein's observations in reply to the charges brought against him by the English newspaper, called the Times, relative to his conduct in Italy, and to the views of the Imperial Court at that time.
 14. Papers relative to the conduct of Mr. Fox.
 15. MISCELLANEOUS ARTICLES, containing, amongst other things, all the advertisements, resolutions, songs, &c. &c. relative to the Statues and Birth Days of Messrs. Pitt, Dundas, and Addington.
 16. Complete List of Patents, with a specification thereof, enrolled in the year, 1802.
 17. JURIDICAL PROCEEDINGS.—Under this head is contained an account of all such cases, which, during the last six months, have come before the several courts of justice, and as appear to me to contain any thing novel, or peculiarly important, whether from their nature, their consequences, or from the rank, &c. of the parties.
 18. A List of the Titles of all the New Books, which have been published, in the United Kingdom, or in the Continent of Europe, and in America, during the last six months.—When I speak of the "last six months," I am to be understood as meaning, the six months ending Dec. 31st for this kingdom, Nov. 30th for the Continent of Europe, and Sept. 30th for America. In my next list I shall go back to these several epochs.—The books are divided into thirty-two classes, and are upwards of fourteen hundred in number. The titles are all translated into English, but care has been taken to mention the language in which the work is published, and the place where published. This is, I am led to hope, the completest thing of the kind that ever has been attempted. It has cost no small pains, and I trust it will be found to be of great and extensive utility.
 19. The German Empire divided into Departments under the Prefecture of the Elector of * * * ; to which is prefixed, a preface of the Translator, and also an Introduction, consisting of a Memoir on the Political and Military State of Europe, by the same author.—Translated from the French by Mr. COBBETT.
 20. Lists of Promotions, Preferments, Dispensations, &c.
 21. View of the Prices of Bread, of the Value of the Funds, of the Bills of Mortality, &c. &c. during the six months.
 22. INDEXES.—1st of MATTERS; 2d of NAMES; 3d of PLACES.

I have here merely enumerated the principal heads in the Supplement, without attempting to specify the particular articles under each head, which will be done in the Table of Contents to the whole volume.

To class the several articles, in a Table of Contents, according to their different subjects, would, I conceive, render the table so complicated as to be almost, if not quite useless; and, indeed, after having long considered of the matter, I am well convinced, that the only rational classification that can be adopted is that which I have lately followed in each of the weekly numbers, the heads of which, without any reference to the subjects, which are of almost infinite variety, distinguish nothing but the sorts of Documents, or papers, which sorts are very few in number. I have, therefore, adhered to this division.—I. PUBLIC PAPERS; that is to say, Treaties, Conventions, Manifestoes, Armistices, Declarations, and, in short, all papers, of whatever name or purport, made or issued by any Government or Governments, and which treat of matters, in which more than one nation has a direct and evident part or concern.—II. FOREIGN OFFICIAL PAPERS, such as Decrees, Proclamations, Dispatches, Orders, Petitions, Memorials, &c. &c. are and ought to be preserved. Many of them, indeed, it would be useless to insert in a work like this; but others are very necessary to enable the politician to form an opinion, not only as to the interior situation, but also to the exterior views of other countries; and, for the same purpose, he should have correct information respecting the pecuniary, the military, and other resources of the principal nations, particularly such as are, by their situation, power, and disposition, in any degree formidable to ourselves.—III. PARLIAMENTARY PAPERS AND DEBATES, of which nothing need be said, but that they form a complete Parliamentary Register, elucidated occasionally by the Editor's notes.—IV. DOMESTIC OFFICIAL PAPERS, are of the same description as that which has been given of Foreign Official Papers.—V. INDIA PAPERS. This class is rather a deviation from my plan; the documents being of the same sort as, and coming fairly under the head of, Domestic Official Papers; but India is so considerable a branch, it is so distinct from the rest of the Empire, and the papers relative to it are so numerous, that it seemed convenient to give them a separate head.—VI. ESSAYS. Under this head I have placed all the Letters, Addresses, Dissertations, and Extracts; and also all articles of whatever description originating with the Editor and his Correspondents, amongst which are included, of course, the Summaries of Politics, the principal topics of each of which are merely pointed out.—VII. NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.—VIII. POETRY.—IX. JURIDICAL PROCEEDINGS.—X. LISTS of various kinds.—Mere Intelligence, whether foreign or domestic, can never be very important without appearing, first or last, in an official document or paper of some sort or other; and, besides, the intelligence, as well as the tables of Prices, the Gazette articles, &c. recur too often and too regularly, and are too clearly pointed out by the Indexes to need being mentioned in a Table of Contents.

Of the manner and quality of the work, I must leave the reader to judge, but respecting the quantity I beg to be permitted to say a few words.—A guinea and a half for one octavo volume has a high sound; but, if the purchaser will take the trouble to make the comparison, he will find, that this one octavo volume, which is sold for a guinea and a half, well and neatly bound with a Russia back, contains as much print as ten common octavo volumes, which ten volumes are sold, in boards, for seven or eight shillings each; and, of course, the Register is, as I stated with respect to the first volume, proportionally much cheaper than any other book published in London. In the advertisement of that volume, it was stated that it contained as much as four common octavo volumes; but it was meant to say eight. The present volume is much thicker, as well as fuller of print; and, indeed, I scruple not to say, that it contains as much letter press as the twelve volumes of Johnson's Works. This is a fact of which any one may satisfy himself with very little trouble.

DIRECTIONS TO THE BINDER.

N. B. After this page comes the Register, beginning with page 1, and continuing on to page 896. Then follows the Supplement, which begins with page 897, and closes with the Index.

 This Volume must always be bound with a hollow Back.

LONDON, June 30 to July 10, 1802.

TO THE PUBLIC.

In presenting to the public this first Number of the Second Volume of the Political Register, I think it necessary to give some account of the manner in which the preceding volume will be completed. A Supplement to that volume is now in the press. This Supplement will contain about thirty articles, relating to Affairs of the Church; to Finance, Commerce, Navigation, and Colonies; to Military and Naval Concerns; to the conduct, interests, and views of Nations and of Sovereigns. These will be followed with a list of the Acts of Parliament passed during the last session, and a comprehensive view of the estimates, accounts, reports, &c. &c. laid before the Parliament. To this will be added, a complete catalogue of all the Books published in every part of the world during the last six months. After which will follow, all the Promotions and Preferments, Bankrupts, Births, Marriages, and Deaths, in the United Kingdom, alphabetically arranged. A view of the Price of Stocks and of Bread for the half year, will succeed; to which will be added the Bills of Mortality for the same period. After giving a selection of occurrences, for the half year, more full and complete than could be given in the Weekly Numbers, the Supplement will close with a general and copious Index to the Volume. There will be prefixed, for the purpose of binding up, a general Title, an Introduction, and a table of Contents, in which table the several parts of the work will be classed under appropriate heads.

In this Supplement, as well as in the body of the work, I have confined myself almost entirely to subjects belonging, either directly or indirectly, to politics or political economy, and to matters which have either arisen, or have reference to, the proceedings and events of the period for which the work professes to be a complete Register. It has not been my object to swell out a book, but to collect, in as small a compass as possible, every fact and remark, which is, in my judgment, likely to be useful to my readers. The articles, which compose the Supplement, are, in great part, either perfectly original, or to be found in no other English work.

The price of the Supplement cannot be exactly stated, 'till I know how many pages it will contain.—It will be supplied, to those who take the Weekly Numbers, by the persons by whom those Numbers are supplied.—It will be published on Saturday, the last day of July.

THE ALARMIST. NO. 2.

Quæ regio in terris nostri non plena laboris?

VIRGIL.

The fall of St. Domingo, pregnant with dangers of a most frightful aspect to Great-Britain, is nevertheless not wholly unaccompanied by beneficial effects, inasmuch as it tends to spread wider that alarm, which has continued to make its way since the treaty of Amiens, notwithstanding all the lulling opiate notions of our ministerial quacks. Englishmen begin to be roused from the golden dreams of commerce, peace, and plenty, and stand aghast at the huge spectres which having danced in masquerade before their deluded eyes, now exhibit all their native deformity, rendered ten times more hideous by the contrast. The consternation into which the ill-judged and ruinous tax upon tonnage had thrown the ship-owners, is now communicated to the West-Indians, by what is alone capable of reaching their hearts—their own private interest, and the security of their particular property. Their brethren of the East begin also to cry out for that commiseration and assistance to which their conduct so little entitles them. But it is not till the interest of each separate class of men, which compose the diversified system of this empire have been injured, that the outcry will become universal: ministers still have the manufacturers; their profits alone have not yet been injured: this class of men (without the imputation of malignity it may be affirmed) the most unworthy, because the worst af-fectured to that government which gives them protection, has been selected by ministers with their usual judgment, to be cherished and aggrandized, at the expense of the dearest interests of the country. This exultation of the Alarmist in the success of those labours which he has long admired, and of which his zeal has lately thrust him forward as a humble partaker, the meritorious task of tearing the veil from this phantom dressed up by ministry in the shape of peace, will, he hopes, be pardoned, although foreign to the purpose of this paper, that of drawing the attention of the public to the army establishment.

A noble Lord (Castlereagh) to whose opinion considerable importance attaches, as it had evidently the approbation of Mr. Pitt, said in the course of the debate on the 15th of May, "that if France continues in peace to pursue the same system of encroachment and aggrandizement, which she has pursued between the signature of the definitive and preliminary articles, it is impossible that peace can last." Mr. Addington has given such repeated proofs of his determination, to submit to Buonaparté in every thing, that much weight would not have attached to this assertion, notwithstanding the high authority from which it proceeded, had not the pressure of that debate forced from his trembling lips a solemn promise to resist all future encroachments. Now the Alarmist defies the most ingenious quibbler to devise the shadow of a reason, why our enemy (for such he still is, except in name) with all those advantages which the execution of the articles of peace throws into the scale of his power, should desist from those ambitious projects, which he boldly pursued when it was in the power of Great-Britain to renew war, with nearly the same degree of superiority, which she possessed on the cessation of hostilities. No man can be so simple as to suppose that his moderation will increase in proportion to our weakness: upon the union therefore of Switzerland or Piedmont with France, the appointment of Buonaparté to the Consulship of Holland or Tuscany, or the reoccupation of Egypt by his troops, (some of which events seem to be not very far distant) Mr. Addington must declare war, or drop the reins of government from his feeble hands. An argument on which he seemed principally to rely was the following: "supposing that peace cannot last more than two or three years, yet then it must be advantageous by enabling us to economise our resources and thereby to renew the war, with greater advantage than it could now be carried on." Any one will perceive by a superficial glance over the estimates for a peace establishment, how inadequate the savings of two or three years will be, to the expenses of fitting out our fleet on a renewal of war, of recruiting the army, and of wresting from France all those possessions which this disgraceful compact has placed in her hands: the sums requisite for these necessary efforts, must be raised also en masse, by a sudden and violent exertion, which will be much more severely felt than a regularly increasing expenditure during the whole of this truce: it must be raised also from a diminished commerce, diminished manufactures, and diminished resources of every kind; for the conviction that such must be the consequences of this treaty begins now to be pretty strongly and generally felt: but what is most to be feared is a deterioration of confidence and spirit in the people, and what has caused the ruin of half the nations of Europe, national panick and despondency, originating in the frightful consequences of misconduct in their respective governments. That part of the army establishment which seems to be most objectionable, is the cavalry: considering the immense standing army of France, it is evidently the interest of this kingdom to have a large force, fit to take the field as soon as possible, after the commencement of hostilities; now it appears that eight dragoon regiments of the line, together with all the fencible regiments, are to be wholly disbanded: the rest consisting of 20 regiments are to be kept up at the large complement of 480 men each. A few remarks shall now be offered upon a plan, which was submitted by very high authority to the contemplation of the ministry, and rejected: viz. to keep up all the regiments of the line, and the whole number of their officers, but to reduce the complement of men to a very low standard. The justice of this project is manifest: it is no injury to a private soldier, who has received a bounty to enlist, and can employ himself in his former business, to be disbanded; though an officer on half-pay finds great difficulty in sustaining the necessary appearance of a gentleman: great also is the injustice of taking his regiment (perhaps his whole subsistence), from a brave and distinguished general, such as are the commanders of some of those which are to be reduced, though for the sake of avoiding invidious distinctions no names are mentioned, while such a raw boy as Lord Paget, undistinguished by any particular merit (except parliamentary influence) is suffered to command one of the best regiments, to which he is not entitled by military rank, and of the profits of which his fortune places him far above the want.—As to the policy. 1. The expense might be lessened. Suppose for the sake of illustration, each regiment be reduced to 240 men; a saving of nearly 3000 men and horses, which would undoubtedly more than compensate for keeping the officers of eight regiments on full instead of half-pay; and this with equal security; for, 2, the effective force would not be diminished. Every one at all conversant in military affairs, well knows how difficult it is to form a dragoon regiment, and the length of time required to make it fit to meet an enemy, when an entire new body of both officers and men are brought together: the facility of increasing a regiment so as to fit it for actual service is equally well known, where it is only requisite to fill up the ranks of each troop. Under the present circumstances, upon a war breaking out, there will, it is true, be 20 effective regiments, but whatever further number it may be found necessary to raise, will scarcely be capable of making a figure in the field for two or three years; according to the above proposal the whole 28 might be filled up and ready to meet an enemy in as many months. The consideration here introduces itself of the policy of holding out encouragement to the yeomanry to continue their services, under the idea that they may, on a sudden emergency, supply the place of regular cavalry. The encomiums on their courage and loyalty, and their utility in preserving domestic tranquillity, are perfectly just; but they are not at present wanted for this service: suffer them to retire quietly from a service which has been productive of great inconvenience to them, of which they are weary, and for which they see no present necessity, and upon a fresh war they will again step forth with renewed and refreshed spirit. The holding forth invitations to them, to extend their services beyond the original design of the establishment, will produce the same evil consequences which a similar conduct has caused with respect to the militia; it will cause the most valuable members, to withdraw themselves from a service, which they cannot continue consistently with their other duties, and with the views with which they entered into it.

The vast field for observation on our military establishment, and more particularly on the yeomanry and militia, makes it necessary to postpone the continuation of these reflections to another paper. The measures here noticed strike at the very root of volunteer establishments, and threatening their total dissolution, open a very wide scope to alarm.

AMERICA.

The United States of America is of itself a most interesting object, but, when viewed in conjunction with Louisiana and the West-Indies, and with the contemplated operations of France in the western hemisphere, it must be regarded as of the very first importance by all those who endeavour to penetrate into the secrets of time. Thirty years ago England had to consult the opinions of no nation upon earth. She no longer enjoys that happy independence. By the two last disgraceful treaties of peace her situation has been completely reversed: previous to those treaties all the maritime nations looked to her to know their destiny: she was the arbiter of peace and of war: she must now look to other nations for her destiny, and learn from them whether she is to enjoy what yet remains to her. It is, therefore, of great consequence to her politicians to know, what are the opinions and inclinations of those, who have it in their power to contribute to her safety or her danger; and, we have no hesitation in saying, that there is no nation upon earth, which possesses this power to so great an extent as the United States of America, a country which, at all times, has the absolute command of ten millions of British capital, which receives nearly one-third of all our exported manufactures, and which has half as much shipping as Great-Britain herself. An hostile union between America and France, such as France is now, by our baseness, become, would, in a very short time, give us a practical demonstration of the effects of the peace of Amiens. This being our sincere opinion, we watch with no little anxiety to learn the sentiments and inclinations of the Americans with respect to England and France. By the last ships we have received papers and letters, from both of which we shall give some very interesting extracts. The following extract is taken from a paper entitled the Palladium, dated early in May last. It must be observed, that this paper is in the hands of the party opposed to France.

“ While it is a doubt whether other nations can maintain their independence, every thing in France evinces the spirit that would invade it. No European power has so many soldiers—nor such military schools and institutions to form them to be conquerors—nor so general a taste and habit among the people for wars and conquests. In no state is the vanity of appearing terrible, more dear or more a principle of action. In no country do they bear poverty and oppression so willingly, or think it so much a glory for the nation to have a master as terrible to other sovereigns as to his own subjects. Self-love is concerned in their tyrant's victories, and Buonaparté interests the pride of every Frenchman, as much as Louis XIV. did. Vive le grand Monarque, was the cry an hundred years ago. Now it is Vive le Premier Consul. They know they have not liberty—they never had it for a day, but they know that they have something which they understand and love better—and that is the power to make all Europe tremble.

“ With this form of government and such national manners and propensities, France cannot have much commerce nor any liberty, nor long tranquillity. The sword will continue to be her plough-share. She will reap where others have sown. Italy sows for her; Spain digs her mines; Holland is her banker. Like old Rome, she sits on her throne, and takes tribute.

“ The exorbitant ambition of France has lately appeared in Buonaparté's electing himself chief of the Italian Republic.—This subordinate Republic was called Cisalpine, but to prepare the minor powers of Italy for subjugation, the title is changed. The Emperor of Germany, after yielding the Low Countries and his territories on the Rhine, will find Frenchmen once more near neighbours. His newly acquired dominions in the Venetian Terra Firma will be continually exposed in peace to French intrigue, and in war to the arms of the Italian Republic. It seems as if France was determined that none who escaped her yoke shall be free from the dread of it. Her ambition too in making a sort of Deputy King of Etruria, cannot fail to alarm the other powers. Formerly such great changes in the system of Europe engaged the different powers in long negotiations. Now Buonaparté in one hour frames the decree for a monarchy, and the business is no longer open to discussion.

“ This king is of the family of Spain.

It is said that this splendid establishment is the bribe for the cession of Louisiana to France. Thus the United States are to take a late, but not a little, share in the danger and toils which the restless ambition of France has called the world, perhaps for several ages, to endure.

“ The expedition of Leclerc to St. Domingo, shews how great this danger is.—With less than sixty ships of war, and very few, if any transports, an army of nearly thirty thousand men has been transported to that island. England would certainly have employed 400 sail of transports. This circumstance shews how little the health and comfort of the troops is an object, and how much more it is in the power of the French than of the British, to send great armies on distant expeditions. Like the Normans, their ancestors, they crowd men on ship board, as thick as sheep in a fold. Whether the destruction of the troops will be greatly lamented has been doubted by many persons. A thousand millions of French livres were promised to them on the conclusion of the war.—The climate and the sword of Toussaint will quiet a great many of these clamorous creditors. It is yet a doubt whether they will conquer the island. It will afford employment for the restless spirits in the French army. While other nations are returning to the habits of peace, it will keep Frenchmen in arms: it will also accumulate in peace, and while her fleets are free from blockade, a vast force in this quarter of the globe, where France cannot be strong in any other way. Here, as in Europe, she is planning to be terrible.—In St. Domingo and in Louisiana, she is collecting the conquerors of Italy, the restorers of Dutch and Swiss liberty, the peace-makers of Europe! Already she counts on her commanding influence over the West-Indies and the United States. Her arts have lost their power to deceive. She now provides substitutes, her troops.

“ It is another singular proof of the devotedness of all Frenchmen to the affairs of war, that this mighty expedition has been proposed, and got in operation without money. A moneyless fleet and army arrive at Cape François. Hunger, that will break through stone walls, will not stop for walls of paper. Disregarding treaties, they seize and strip American vessels, consume their beef and pork, and detain or imprison their crews. More vessels arrive, and are plundered. This supply failing, Mr. Pichon talks of a loan of a million of dollars, and the grand fleet is expected in the Chesapeake. Ship's guns are well known negotiators. Just as the moment when a refusal was expected, and it was foreseen would not be taken, the news of a probable rupture of the peace with England, hurries the fleet back to France for a safe place in Brestwaters.—Thus the embarrassments of our government, and the violation of our rights are postponed for a season.

“As France can have no object in the war, as she wants peace to prepare Europe for her chains, as she intends to recruit her marine, her trade and her manufactures, as she has already begun her system of monopoly in commerce, and forced the Spaniards to forbid British manufactures, it is probable she will yield every point to the Marquis Cornwallis, and England and Europe will be permitted to suffer two or three years of peace, without honour or safety, or relaxation of exertion and expense. France will probably undergo new revolutions, and humbled Europe will have more wars. America will continue to grow richer in commerce, and weaker in arms. Her soldiers are disbanded—her ships worm-eaten—her revenues abolished—her government chasing popularity, and pursued by contempt.”

ELECTIONS.

It is not our intention to fill the columns of this work with accounts of the debates and battles which the contested elections may give rise to; but there are certain circumstances relative to the elections in London and Westminster, which we think it proper to put on record.

CITY OF LONDON.

A common hall was held in the city on Monday, July 5, at which the following resolutions were passed:—“Resolved, That representatives in parliament being elected, not for their own private advantage or emolument, but to guard and maintain the rights, liberties, and property of those who elect them, it is therefore their bounden duty not to set up their own opinion and interest in opposition to the opinion and interest of their constituents, but upon all occasions to obey their instructions.—Resolved, That it is an indispensable duty we owe to ourselves and to our posterity, to select such candidates, whose abilities and independence will afford us the best security against the recurrence of those evils which have arisen for want of a due circumspection in the delegation of this most sacred trust, and upon the right exercise of which so essentially depends the happiness of the people.—Resolved, That the respective candidates be required unequivocally to declare their readiness, at all times, to obey the instructions of their constituents in common hall assembled, or to resign their trust.”

On the 6th of July, the common hall being assembled for the purpose of proceeding to the election, Sir Watkin Lewes came forward, and said, that, when he had the honour to be one of the members for the city, he had always received the instructions of the livery with pleasure, and implicitly obeyed them, their sentiments had ever been congenial with his own; but had it been otherwise, he should have reckoned himself bound to sacrifice his individual opinion. He was not sent to parliament to represent himself, but his fellow-citizens.—Mr. Alderman Curtis presented himself, but for some minutes nothing was to be heard but hisses and groans. Order being at last restored, he observed, that he appeared there as an old servant, to render an account of his stewardship. This he considered the bounden duty of every one who had received the favours which the livery had conferred upon him. He then re-stated his opinions at some length about instructions. In all local matters he would obey them, but upon every public question he must judge for himself (loud disapprobation). He was firmly attached to the constitution; and how could it be otherwise? He had risen from indigence and obscurity, and was now possessed of an ample fortune; which, whatever might be insinuated, he had made fairly and honourably. He appealed to his past conduct; as the livery approved of that, they would choose or reject him. Hissing succeeded, but it is hard to say whether it was meant for the worthy alderman, or for Sir J. W. Anderson, who succeeded him. He resigned, he said, the important trust of a representative unsullied as when it was put into his hands. He concluded by affirming, that if he should be again chosen, it should be his grand object to testify his gratitude for the distinguished honour.—Mr. Alderman Combe appeared, and the hall rung with applause. Upon that point, of obedience to instructions, he observed, his principles and his practice had ever been the same. Upon the contrary supposition, it was of no consequence whether the city of London had four representatives, forty, or none at all. He had done his best to approve himself a faithful servant, and he fondly hoped they would again take him into their service, and rely with confidence on his zeal and fidelity.—Mr. Alderman Price next came forward, and said, he was devoted to our glorious constitution, to the best of Kings, and to the city of London. If he was chosen, he should be found as active, and zealous, and upright, as any man that ever sat in the house of commons.—Mr. Travers next came forward, amid the plaudits of the hall, and observed, that without his concurrence he had been nominated as one of the candidates. If the other candidates would agree to sign the resolutions passed yesterday, he would resign his own pretensions, and give them his vote. Nevertheless, he considered it to be the duty of every honest man, and of every good citizen, to obey the call of the people. He then put it to the three old members, and Mr. Alderman Price, whether they would sign.—Mr. Alderman Curtis said, 'he had too great a regard for his own independence, and that of the city of London.—Sir J. W. Anderson asked, how in that case he could go to deliberate?—Mr. Alderman Combe observed, that he considered the ceremony as nugatory. However, he was ready to go through it; and he signed the declaration.—Mr. Alderman Price affirmed, that by setting his hand to this paper he would deprive the city of London of the most valuable part of the constitution.—Sir Watkin Lewis, after a violent speech against those whose boasted independence seemed only to be considering themselves independent of their constituents, subscribed the declaration, that he would either obey the instructions of the livery or resign his trust.

CITY OF WESTMINSTER.

On the 6th of July the nomination took place for the city of Westminster. The candidates, Lord Gardner, Hon. C. J. Fox, and Mr. John Graham, an auctioneer. Mr. Fox addressed the people as follows:—Gentlemen, Having had the honour for nearly twenty-two years of being one of your representatives in parliament, I now again appear before you to solicit your votes in my favour on the present occasion. This request I should not have made, if I had not been informed by some of the most respectable constituents, that my doing so would, at the present moment, contribute to the peace and independence of the city of Westminster. Such a request, from such constituents, was not to be resisted. It was impossible for me to hesitate in complying with their wishes so expressed, without proving myself, what I hope I never shall prove myself, the most ungrateful of mankind.—(Loud applause.) After the length of time which has elapsed since our connection was first formed, to speak, gentlemen, of my principles would be trifling with you. My principles are the principles of the constitution of Great Britain; the principles of the constitution as they have ever been understood by the most enlightened patriots. They may be expressed, gentlemen, in a very few words. They are, that in theory the sovereignty originates from the people, and that all the practical branches of the constituted authorities ought never to forget the sovereign under whom they hold. (Loud applause.) We have been too long connected to render it necessary for me to point out in what manner I have been guided by these principles in every part of my public life. I know, gentlemen, it has been asked, why then have I not been regular and diligent in my attendance in parliament? To this I have to say, that, after thirty years of busy public life, and in a case where honesty of intention is undoubted, (for I trust that betwixt me and the electors of Westminster there never can be a doubt of the honesty of my intentions), in such a case, gentlemen, I say, where uprightness of intention is not in the smallest degree in doubt, I do not think that it is asking too much, to request that I may be allowed to act on my best judgment. This judgment I have exercised, and this decision I have followed.

The rest of his speech consisted of a wish that they would elect Admiral Gardner along with him, and a promise, that if things took a more favourable turn, he would attend his duty in parliament*.

* Mr. Fox's advertisement is worth preserving.

TO THE INDEPENDENT ELECTORS OF THE CITY OF WESTMINSTER.

Gentlemen, Having for some years utterly despair'd of rendering any useful service to you, or to the country, by regular attendance in the house of commons, I should not have presumed, upon the present occasion, to offer myself to represent you in parliament, if I were not informed by many respectable persons among you, that by so doing I shall best consult the peace and independence of constituents, to whom I am under greater obligations than any other man ever owed to persons in a similar relation.

In consequence of this information, and in compliance with the desire with which it was accompanied, I once more offer myself as a candidate for your favour, and request the honour of your votes and support on the ensuing election.

At the same time it is fair to state, that I see not the smallest reason to expect that the character of the next parliament will be at all different from that of the last, and that if I find myself in like circumstances, my conduct will be the same.

Lord Gardner then addressed the meeting in a short speech; in which he thanked the electors for their past kindness, and hoped that no part of his conduct had been such as to induce them to withdraw their support. It was true, that since his last election he had been prevented from attending his duty in parliament. When it was considered, however, that he had been employed in the service of his country, he hoped his constituents would not consider his absence from parliament as any ground of objection to his now receiving their support.

To expatiate upon those measures of the late House of Commons, which have fixed in me so ill an opinion of public affairs, or even to point them out one by one, would far exceed the necessary limits of an address of this nature; suffice it to say, that according to the judgment which I formed of that Assembly, the principles of national policy, liberty, humanity and justice were with them as nothing—the will and pleasure of the Court every thing. No tax, however unjust in its principle, or tyrannical in its execution, did they ever refuse. No inquiry, however disastrous or disgraceful the occasion, unless called for by the ministers themselves, did they ever institute. No proposed suspension or surrender of the liberty of the subject seemed to cause among them the slightest hesitation; and if it happened that, in consequence of such measures, the liberty, character, and mean of livelihood of individuals were sacrificed to the alleged exigencies of government, not compensation to the sufferers, but indemnity to those who inflicted the suffering, was the first object of their concern. Private misery excited no compassion; torture itself raised no indignation.

That our general situation is much improved by the peace, I was among the first to admit, and the disposition manifested by the First Consul and government of France, to preserve the good understanding between the two nations, a disposition which, I own, appears to be met with a correspondent desire on the part of our present ministers, has every day more confirmed me in my opinion. But it is not to the late parliament that we are in any degree indebted for that blessing. If the King's servants had peremptorily refused that very peace which has spread such universal joy through every part of country—if they had rejected those very terms which have been approved by a majority almost unexampled (on such an occasion) in the annals of parliament, is it a calumny upon the late House of Commons to say, that the conduct of the ministry would, in that case, have been equally sanctioned by their decided approbation?

When, therefore, my motives are considered, I trust, that even such among you as may have disapproved of my abstaining from a regular attendance in parliament, will not, at least very severely condemn me; and, if I feel any anxiety for your suffrages upon the present occasion, it is not for the sake of sitting in parliament, but as a proof that the city of Westminster continues to me that kindness and esteem which it has been the object of my life to deserve, and my happiness so long to have enjoyed.

I am, gentlemen, your most obliged and obedient humble servant,

St. Anne's Hill, July 1.

Charles James Fox.

Mr. Graham, said that, if, through the favour of the electors, he should have the high honour of being the object of their choice, words would be wanting to express his feelings, or, to use his own emphatic phrase, "his life would speak his gratitude." He felt himself, he said, in that situation, that he was obliged to borrow an observation of Mr. Sheridan, and to say, that "never were words so much wanting as at the present moment." He had with him, however, a paper, which, with the permission of the electors, he would read to them, as the declaration of his parliamentary principles. To shew them how much he valued it, he secured it in a place nearest to his heart.—At first the meeting very naturally took this for an elegant figure of speech; but Mr. Graham soon convinced them that his words were to be literally understood. For, to the no small entertainment of all present, he proceeded to unbutton his waistcoat, &c. and from his bosom drew out the paper containing his parliamentary creed, which our readers will certainly excuse us for not inserting here.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,

Although the note from me, which appeared in the Register of last Saturday,* was by no means intended for publication, I perhaps have no right, and certainly very little disposition, to complain of its insertion. Neither should I advert to your reply, if I did not feel myself called upon most positively to assure you that not one syllable of the Letter to the Proprietors of India Stock, was written or dictated by Mr. Dundas.

Permit me, however, just to add the assurance of my regret, that I should have appeared (certainly without any intention) to trespass upon your exclusive claim to ruleness.

In your Introduction to your Extracts from the third Report of the Special Committee, you charge Mr. Dundas upon ex parte evidence, and in a case you could understand but very imperfectly, with mistakes, mis-statements and pertinacity. This charge, and the general tenor of your observations respecting that statesman, lead some one to infer, that you are not impartial towards him. This you are told in a note intended for your own use only; and in a public reply, you first suppose Mr.

* Vide Vol. I. p. 750 and 751.

Dundas to be himself the author of this note, and then, after asking him what possible reason he could have to suppose you were not impartial, you tax him with involence, because (how unnatural!) he dares to doubt whether, instead of his being pertinacious and mistaken, you are not prejudiced and splenetic.

I shall wait with impatience for your Observations upon the Facts and Calculations contained in my Letter, but until it shall be proved to me that they are false and incorrect, and that the Comparisons and Statements of the third Report, are fair in principle and liable to no objection, as far as figures are concerned, which ought not in common candour to be ascribed to ignorance or inattention, I shall continue to assert what I think I have proved in that letter, that the authors of that Report have been guilty of a violation of truth, and a breach of their trust in their public capacity, as guardians of the interest, credit, and character of the East-India Company.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient humble servant,

The Author of a Letter, &c.

ANSWER.

Sir,

As you are yourself in doubt whether or not you have a right to complain of the publication of your former note, I should spare myself the trouble of any remark on that point, did you not, in a subsequent part of your present communication, appear anxious to infer that some degree of unfairness ought to be attached to the act of giving publicity to a note intended for private perusal only. I am, indeed, well aware, that you never intended that note to be read by any one but myself, and that you were much mortified when you saw it in print; but, Sir, it would be a great and most dangerous innovation in the laws of the press, were the editor of any work to be restrained from publishing what is communicated to him anonymously. If such a practice were to prevail, there would be no means of detecting falsehood, or of rebutting slander. When a writing is communicated without a name, there can be no breach of confidence in publishing it, because there is no confidence placed in the person to whom it is communicated. The author of an anonymous book has, in that character alone, a sufficient advantage over his adversary, without being permitted to make use of private letters in support of his public attack. Your attempt to prejudice me, and, through me, my readers, against the author of the third Report, was ungenerous and clandestine in the extreme. Not to publish your note would have rendered me, in some measure, your accomplice, a situation in which I was by no means desirous to stand.

As to your "most positive" assurance, that "not one syllable of the Letter to the Proprietors of East-India Stock, was written" or dictated by Mr. Dundas," it will, perhaps, have more weight with me when I know your name and your character, and when I see, in the True Briton, an unequivocal contradiction of the paragraph, which I quoted from that paper. Mr. Dundas might not write one syllable of the letter; in the strict sense of the word, he might not dictate a syllable of it; but, Sir, I imagine, you will find it very difficult to persuade any person at all acquainted with the subject, that the pamphlet was not written and published under his direction, and that he did not furnish the materials, of which it is composed. To condescend to use such a subterfuge, for the purpose of extolling his own virtues and talents, (which is done in the letter with a most liberal hand) is not very consistent with the character of a "great and enlightened statesman;" and to have recourse to it for the sake of vilifying a committee of most respectable gentlemen, who have affixed their names to the statements which they have given, merits a species of chastisement not in the power of words to inflict.

Your apology for trespassing on what you have the goodness to term my "exclusive claim to rudeness" is very handsome, but comes rather too late; for, if I ever had any exclusive claim of that sort, it was most furiously invaded by those who accused the East-India Directors of falsehood and treachery, who styled Lord Grenville and Mr. Windham conspirators for place, and who have not unfrequently boasted of bullying the King. For such persons to apologize for the appearance of rudeness, argues a superabundance of affectation, or a miraculous reformation of manners.

While I would fain attribute your apology to the latter cause, I perceive with regret, that, so far from retracting your charges against the East-India Directors, you repeat them with additional hardihood. On this point, therefore, I have nothing to say, except that, in the Supplement to Vol. I. I shall endeavour to fulfil the promise, made to you and the Public in my last letter.

I am, Sir,

Your most humble
and most obedient servant,

WM. COBBETT.

Pall-Mall, July 5, 1802.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Rome, May 25.—The King of Sardinia arrived here on the 22d instant, with his whole suite, escorted by a detachment of pontifical dragoons. He alighted at the Palace Colonna, where every preparation had been made to receive him, and where a guard of honour attended, with colours flying, and drums beating. Next day his Majesty repaired to the Quirinal Palace, where the whole secret chamber were assembled, and where he was received by his Holiness with every demonstration of the tenderest friendship. The day after, his Holiness returned the visit to his Majesty. Scarcely had the Holy Father alighted from his carriage, when his Majesty attempted to kiss his feet, but his Holiness raised him up, and hastened with him into his apartment, where he had a long conversation with his Majesty.

Petersburgh, June 2.—During the absence of his Imperial Majesty, his august spouse will reside at Pawlowsky, with the Empress Mother; but the Grand Duke Constantine remains here. This Prince and Count Nicholas Soltikow have the direction of the Council during the absence of our Monarch. It is thought his Majesty will return in six weeks.

United States of America.—Philadelphia, June 6.—Under this date we have received letters and papers, from which we learn, that the negroes in North Carolina had made an attempt at an insurrection, but had failed; that nine of them had been tried, condemned, and hanged; and that thirty-five of the minor criminals had been whipped and cropped, that is, had had their ears cut off. At New York, there had been held (for the first time in the United States) a Book-fair, resembling that of Leipsic in Germany. This fair was held on the first of June last, and brought together a vast rabble of booksellers and printers.—The widow of General Washington died about the first of May last.

Guadaloupe.—The American papers contain some accounts respecting this island, which appear to contradict the official dispatches, which have been received in France. They state, upon the authority of an American captain, that the town of Basseterre had been burnt, and that the houses on the plantations were in flames. This wants confirmation.

Genoa, June 9.—We learn from good authority, that the First Consul has appointed Citizen Cattaneo, the present Minister of our Republic at Milan, the First Magistrate of our future Definitive Government, with the title of Doge. This Citizen is generally esteemed, and was one of the Members of the Provisory Government appointed by Buonaparté in 1797.

Vienna, June 9.—On its being notified to our Court by the French Ambassador Champigny, that the First Consul Buonaparté would be immediately elected Consul for life, his Imperial Majesty instructed his Ambassador to the French Republic, the Count de Cobenzel, to congratulate beforehand the First Consul, and to declare to him, that this important event would be so much the more agreeable to his Majesty, as he was persuaded it would have a great influence over the duration of the general peace.

June 12.—We have the pleasure to announce that his Royal Highness the Archduke Charles is better, and that there is ground for hoping that his health will be re-established in a short time.

Berlin, June 15.—We have received the intelligence of the arrival of the Emperor of Russia at Memel. The details of the entrance of their Prussian Majesties into Memel have been read here with much attention. The greater part of the royal suite arrived there before their Majesties, who on the 9th, at five in the evening, arrived in their carriage along the Haff de Courland, opposite the town. They had expressed a wish not to be received in state, but after they had alighted and taken a moment's rest in a tent, they were conducted to a superb barque prepared for their reception. As soon as they entered it, the ships of all nations fired a general salute; and when they put off from the shore a great number of other barques joined them. During the passage, and amidst the firing of cannon, a boat superbly decorated advanced with twelve beautiful girls of Lithuania in it, dressed in the different costumes of the country; they presented the queen with all sorts of works, and sung stanza in honour of her. When their Majesties arrived in the city, they were received by the principal civil and military officers and all the clergy.

Hague, June 16.—The Government is distributing to several persons allotments of land on the coast of Guinea, on condition that they shall clear and cultivate them, and pay annually to the state a trifling ground rent, proportioned to the tract they may occupy. The same measure will be adopted with respect to the colony of the Cape; and there is not the least doubt that Germany will furnish a sufficient number of adventurers to people those fertile countries, the productions of which must so abundantly reward the labours of the cultivator.

June 19.—The Government has placed its seal upon those presses from whence issued numerous libels against many eminent functionaries of the Republic, and against different foreign powers.

Berne, June 19.—Although the constitution has not been accepted throughout the whole of Helvetia, the Little Council have already proceeded to take measures as if they were sure of its being adopted. It has decreed, that the new senate shall speedily assemble; the members are to assemble at Berne on the 29th of this month. Notwithstanding this, there exists an opposition, which, although it certainly forms the minority of Helvetia, yet has sufficient energy to throw considerable obstacles in the way of the new constitution. The small Cantons, which are the cradle of Helvetic liberty, still preserve that spirit of independence which distinguished the character of the companions of William Tell. They have rejected the new constitution. The Cantons of Schwiz, Uri, and Unterwalden, have unanimously voted against it. In Glaris and Appenzel, there was a great majority against the constitution, and there is some reason to apprehend that this spirit of opposition will extend itself to the other Cantons of Switzerland.

June 21.—The results of the votes of eight Cantons, on the subject of the constitution is, that 138,485 have accepted it, 40,236 having inscribed their acceptance, and 98,249 having tacitly accepted it, and 18,903 have rejected it. In the Canton of Argau, there were 6,336 written acceptations, 6,412 tacit acceptations, and 1,793 have rejected it.

Paris, June 25.—The Consuls of the Republic, on the report of the Minister of the Interior, made the following decree:

Art. I. There shall be established an entrepôt for foreign merchandize in the port of Marseilles.

II. The entrepôt shall be for all kinds of goods and articles, the entry of which is or shall be prohibited, as well as for those which do or shall require a certificate of the place of their manufacture, and 2^{dly} for the following articles.

Manufactured goods of every description, (different kinds of soap are to be comprized in this denomination,) leaf tobacco, salt fish, wines, brandies, liqueurs, oils, sugars, coffee, indigo, cocoa, and all other articles of colonial produce coming from foreign countries.

The magazines shall be prepared for commerce, and locked with two keys, one of which shall remain in the hands of the commissioners of the customs.

III. Merchants who shall offer soap for exportation, and who shall shew that they have paid upon oils imported within the year the established rates of duties, shall have a drawback of three-fourths of the said duties in the proportion of the quantity of oils entering into the composition of the soap to be exported.

IV. The entrepôt shall be opened on the requisition of the merchants for every species of merchandize and goods not specified in the second article.

V. The merchandize and goods destined for the real or nominal (fictif) entrepôt, shall, after verification, be entered in two registers kept by the receiver of the customs.

The persons consigning the goods shall lodge in the hands of this receiver a bond properly secured to report those articles in the course of the year or to pay the duties.

VI. The duration of the real entrepôt shall not be more than two years. The goods and articles, whose entry is or shall be prohibited, may be re-exported without this delay. Goods and articles, whose entry is allowed, are to be subject to similar conditions, or shall pay the duties.

VII. Vessels arriving in the Port of Marseilles, laden wholly or in part with prohibited articles, shall not approach the shore, except at that place which the Director of the Customs shall point out, and where the landing of the goods may be effected.

Prohibited goods and articles which shall be taken out of the entrepôt for re-exportation shall be embarked with the same regulations as to place, and the ships on board of which they are to be stowed, shall not move from this place, but for the purpose of sailing from the harbour.

VIII. The laws and regulations relative to the customs, shall continue to be executed in the Port of Marseilles on their present footing, except so far as the present decree is concerned.

IX. The ministers of the interior and finances are charged as far as it depends on them with the execution of the present decree.

(Signed) Bonaparté, First Consul.
H. B. Maret, Secretary of State.

June 26.—The Consuls of the Republic decreed on the 10th of June:

Art. I. There shall be given standards to all the demi-brigades of light infantry.

II. A deputation from each demi-brigade of light infantry, composed of the Chief of Brigade, the First Captain, the First Lieutenant, the First Sub-Lieutenant, a Serjeant-Major, a Serjeant, four Corporals, one Soldier per Company, and of the Standard bearer, shall repair to Paris to receive them at the Parade on the 14th of July.

(Signed) Buonaparté, First Consul.

Three auxiliary companies are to be formed, each composed of 100 negroes of those who are in France, commanded each by three officers, one of the Isles of Hieres, the other at the Isle of Oleron, and the other at the Isle of Aix.

Auguste Dupaty, one of the sons of the ancient President, is one of the victims that perished during the late troubles of St. Domingo. This young man, interesting from the qualities both of his head and heart, was massacred in Cape Town, with circumstances that add to the horror of the crimes of his assassins. After having exhausted all the refinements of barbarity upon his body, they dragged his bleeding form under the eyes of his wife, whom they forced to embrace him, two hours after his death.

On the 24th June, the Chief Consul visited the national manufacture of porcelain at Sevres. He inspected with the utmost minuteness and the liveliest interest, during the course of an hour, this magnificent establishment, which has given birth to an art in France which no other nation is able to rival.

In an address to the First Consul, the merchants of Lyons unite with the rest of the commercial interest throughout the country, in demanding that the trade to India should be laid open, and that no privileged companies may be re-established. "The creation of privileged companies, say they, not only violates the principle, but necessarily compromises the prosperity of commerce. The experience of ages has proved that all privileged companies are ruinous. England itself would not have derived greater benefit from them, if she had not united to the advantages of her commerce, those that resulted from her sovereignty. Never were the French companies so valuable or important as those which were established in the East, from the year 1773 to 1779, by individual speculators. In all cases it is observable that privileged bodies abuse their monopoly in promoting their own interests, without any consideration to those of France. Exclusive privileges would, above all, be disastrous to the manufactures of Lyons, for it is admitted that individuals have the means of introducing a greater quantity of our manufactures, such as gold wire, hats, cloths, &c. than any company can possess. It is no less evident that individuals could, more effectually than any company, import into France those productions of India which are necessary for our manufactures."

June 27.—The following circular, of this date, was written to the several Prefects by the Minister of the Interior.

Fête of the Anniversary of the 14th July.

It is the desire of the Government, that Morals and Virtue shall be particularly honoured at the fête, and receive public recompense.

At Paris, in each of the twelve Municipalities, there shall be celebrated, on the day of the 14th of July, the marriage of a young maiden with a young man, chosen from amongst those who are distinguished for traits of courage.

The same ceremony shall take place at the chief place of every district, on the 23d of September next.

The Prefects and Sub-Prefects shall concert with the respective Municipalities, respecting the dower of the young women, and shall draw up the form of the ceremonies which shall take place on the occasion of these marriages.

At Paris, on the evening of the 14th of July, there will be a grand concert on the terrace of the Thuilleries. The Palace of Government will be illuminated, as well as the gardens of the Thuilleries, and the Palace la Concorde.

The Minister of the Interior,

Chaptal.

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES.

Letters from Leghorn, of the 15th of June, state, that our troops had delivered up to France Porto Ferrajo, and the whole of the Isle of Elba. They also evacuated Mahon on the 27th of May.

Thirteen new ships are to be launched this year for the service of the Honourable East-India Company, viz. seven of 1200 tons, and six of 800 tons, comprizing, in the aggregate, 13,250 tons.

The Committee appointed by the Lords of the Treasury to examine the models which have been formed for the monuments to be erected in St. Paul's Cathedral, in consequence of addresses to his Majesty from the House of Commons, consists of the following persons. The Right Hon. Charles Long, Sir George Beaumont, R. P. Knight, Esq. J. Townley, Esq. H. Banks, Esq. W.

Locke, Esq. and R. P. Carew, Esq. They have allotted the execution of the monuments to the under-mentioned artists:

Mr. Flaxman , the Monument of Earl Howe .
Mr. Westmacott	Sir, R. Abercromby.
Mr. Banks	Capt. Westcott.
Mr. Rossi	Capt. Moss & Riou.

The two former are to receive 6000 guineas for each of the monuments of the Commanders in Chief; the latter 4000 guineas for each of the others.

On Saturday morning, the 3d instant, Quarter-Master Young, of the third regiment of Guards, was dismissed from his Majesty's service, for embezzling Government stores. He was brought on the Parade at the Horse Guards, his sword broke over his head, his sash cut to pieces, and drummed out of the regiment.

His Majesty's ship Mermaid sailed from Gibraltar the 15th of June, with his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex on board for Lisbon.

All passports granted by our ministers for France are in French. The reason, perhaps, is, that the officers, particularly in the provinces to whom passports must be submitted, do not understand English.

The Saturn, of 74 guns, arrived on Tuesday night at Plymouth, from Martinique, with the body of Rear-Admiral Totty, who, we are sorry to say, died of the yellow fever on the 2d of last month. He was taken ill at Martinique and sailed from thence on a cruise, in hopes of recovering from the disorder, but finding its violence increase the ship bore away for England on the 24th of May. The Admiral died nine days afterwards.

Admiral Lord Keith arrived at Saint Helen's on Saturday evening in the Foudroyant, of 80 guns, Captain Searle. She sailed from Gibraltar on the 20th of June, at which time his Royal Highness the Duke of Kent was in good health.—The Foudroyant left in Gibraltar Bay the Dragon, Superb, Europa, and Thetis; the two latter were bound to England with a battalion of the 40th, and a detachment of the 79th regiment. The Genereux, with troops from Minorca, for England, was going into Gibraltar, when the Foudroyant sailed: she has brought home a detachment of limited service men, from the 5th regiment.

From the London Gazette.—Windsor, July 6, 1802.—Their Majesties and their Royal Highnesses the Princesses set out from hence at seven o'clock on the evening of Friday last, the 2d instant, and arrived at Weymouth the following evening in perfect health.

At Bridgewater Fair on Thursday, the 1st instant, the quantity of cheese produced was very small, and mostly of the inferior kinds, and as there were many buyers, the prices kept up: best cheese fetched from 63s. to 70s.; middling 42s. to 56s.; inferior 35s. to 40s.; bacon 10d. per lb. per fitch. The shew of cattle was tolerably large, and met with a brisk sale, particularly those in good condition; as did sheep and pigs. Good horses bore high prices.

On Saturday the 3d instant, the foundation of a new School for the Charterhouse was laid, in the presence of Dr. Ramsden, Dr. Raine, the Assistant Masters, and the principal part of the Scholars. The building is to be on a very improved scale. It will be considerably larger than the present school, and will, in other respects, be much more convenient. The dimensions are 70 feet long, and 35 feet wide. On the right hand corner of the building were deposited, in a glass tube, on a roll of parchment, the names of the present Governors, Masters, and Scholars, attending the Institution.—We understand that the Governors of Christ's Hospital have it in contemplation to rebuild one of the wings of that ancient edifice in the course of the next year.

The following is a copy of General Orders, issued by the Commander in Chief of his Majesty's forces at Martinico, relative to the late mutiny of the 8th West-India Regiment at Dominica:

“Adjutant General's Office, Fort Royal, Martinico, 27th April, 1802.

GENERAL ORDERS.

“The Commander in Chief has been under the necessity of performing a painful duty, that of ordering the execution of several mutineers of the 8th West-India Regiment.

“This unfortunate event will not induce him in the smallest degree to suspect the fidelity of the other West-India Regiments; he will not confound the innocent with the guilty, and he sincerely hopes that no person will be so unjust as to do so.

“This mutiny is to him no cause of apprehension that other Regiments will follow the example—he, on the contrary, believes that the soldiers of the West-India Regiment will, as well as those of other Regiments, consider with abhorrence the cruel murders committed by some of the 8th West-India Regiment.

“The 1st West-India Regiment is in Fort Edward, and the other troops in the town of Fort Royal, where the Commander in Chief resides; as are detachments from the 4th and 10th West-India Regiments; these three corps furnish the guard on his quarters; he does not intend to make any alteration, but will continue surrounded and guarded by these troops, with the most entire confidence in their fidelity and good conduct.

"Should a change of circumstances occasion his again going on service in this country, he will take under his command as many West-India Regiments as the nature of the service will admit. It has been said that a report was spread amongst the soldiers of the 8th West-India Regiment, that they were to be sold as slaves:—if any such report has been circulated in the 8th or any other West-India Regiment, by evil-minded persons, the Commander in Chief assures the soldiers of those Regiments, that the report is entirely without foundation, no such thing either will or can happen. But his Excellency does not mean to extend this assurance to mutineers and murderers. He will protect and encourage such men of the 8th West-India Regiment as shall appear not to have joined in the mutiny.

"This order to be read at least three times to every West-India Regiment—the Officers of those Regiments will use their utmost endeavours to make the men understand the purport of it.

"The Commander in Chief is highly sensible of the merit of the prompt and effectual measures adopted by Brigadier-General Johnstone to suppress the late mutiny.

"The very favourable report made by Brigadier-General Johnston, of the good conduct, zeal, and spirit of the Officers and Soldiers who acted under his orders, afforded the Commander in Chief much satisfaction.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

The attention of this country is totally occupied with the elections, several of which are carrying on with great warmth. An accurate account of the contests, and the result, will be finally published in the Register; but, in the mean time, we cannot forbear to express our deep regret, that any body of persons, calling themselves Englishmen, should have been so detestably base as to prefer Messrs. Fellowes and William Smith, to Messrs. Windham and Frere. This triumph of whiggism was most gratefully received at Mr. Fox's dinner, whither it was brought express from Norwich on the evening of the 6th of July. Mr. Fox, upon receiving the intelligence, communicated it to the company (amongst whom were Lord John Townsend and Lord William Russel), with the exultation naturally to be expected from the friend of Fitzgerald and O'Connor, and the communication, produced an effect proportioned to the malignity and cowardice of the convives, and to the merits of the man, whom they honour by their hatred and their fear*. It is said, that Mr. Windham means to offer himself for the county of Norfolk. We are not certain of this; but we mention it for the purpose of taking an opportunity to exhort all those of Mr. Windham's friends, who have a vote for that county, to ascertain the fact without delay.

The test proposed at the city election, and subscribed by some of the candidates, is something new in the annals of democracy. We have often heard of the doctrine, that members of parliament ought to act under the instructions of their constituents; but we never before heard of their entering into a written contract so to do. It is, however, pleasing to observe, that the sense of the livery is very different from that of the common hall; for there is every appearance, that three out of four of the members who will be returned, are those who refused to sign this unconstitutional, this foolish, this degrading test.

The partial change which has taken place in the ministry, is of no other importance, than as it is a proof that Messrs. Pitt and Dundas have no intention to resume their places, for some time at least. Lord Castlereagh is a nobleman whom no one can be sorry to see in office. His principles are sound, his character fair, his industry great, and his talents by no means of the inferior order. He will certainly act, in some sort, under the direction of Messrs. Pitt and Dundas; but, if he acts wisely, as we sincerely hope and believe he will, that circumstance is nothing to his disadvantage. We hope he will profit, not only from the wisdom and experience, but from the errors of Mr. Dundas.

With the new-modelling of the treasury department the nation has less reason to be satisfied. For a lord of the treasury to become secretary of the same department, had the appearance, at least, of meanness and avarice; but when we behold the same identical secretary again become a lord, we are compelled to believe, that though the evening was the arrival of a Gentleman with the intelligence that Messrs. Smith and Fellowes, had succeeded at the Norwich election. Mr. Fox immediately on receiving the news, communicated it to the company. As might be expected this most decided and important triumph of the popular interest, excited the liveliest emotions of satisfaction.—It being suggested that Mr. Windham intends to offer himself as a candidate for the County of Norfolk, Mr. Fox followed up this intelligence by proposing the health of

"Mr. Coke and Sir Jacob Astley, and success to their election for the County of Norfolk."

* The following is the account given of this scene by the Morning Chronicle.

"The most important circumstance during the former place was thought fit for the man, the man was found unfit for the place. Such chopping and changing backward and forward, down and up, and up and down, naturally creates the idea of accommodation and jobbing, and weakens the respect which the people ought to have reason to entertain for the servants of his Majesty.

Respecting foreign affairs, we have only room briefly to notice some of the more prominent circumstances. In the Register, vol. I. p. 253, we stated, that an armament, under the command of General Bernadotte, was, in the month of March last, preparing to sail for New Orleans. This armament is now ready. It consists of seven thousand French troops, and the native Indians, whom Buonaparté has, for some time past, retained in his pay. It is said, at Paris, that a great number of the blacks of St. Domingo will be sent to join Bernadotte, and this we think a measure well calculated to promote the objects which France has in view. To be in readiness to convey the army to Louisiana was, doubtless, one of the reasons why Villaret returned with part of his ships. We imagine, that, for the present, the Havannah will be the grand rendezvous for the allied fleet, (French, Spanish, and Dutch); New Orleans and St. Domingo will be the stations for the army; and, when all is well prepared, we shall begin to taste of the "blessings of peace." Not, however, in a greater degree than we deserve. Losses of no common magnitude, lashes of no common severity, can sufficiently reward the people of this country for their base approbation of the treaty of Amiens.

Piedmont, which has never been formally joined to France under the name of department, is, nevertheless, enumerated, sans cérémonie, amongst the military divisions of that amicable and harmless republic, of which divisions it forms the 27th, and its quota of troops has just been fixed at 2,000. Well may the King of Sardinia resign his crown and retire to a convent!

The Maltese have not yet raised, nor have they begun to raise, that famous body of troops which, by our wise statesmen, are intended to preserve the independence of the island. That the King of Naples will risk the safety of his states, merely for the love which he bears to the Addingtons and the Hawkesburys, can hardly be supposed; and, if he refuses to continue a garrison at Malta, the task will naturally devolve upon the guaranteeing powers, of which France is happily at the head. She will have both the means and the will to yield this new-fledged state an efficient protection; and, as to the consequences, they cannot be more fatal to us than many other of those which will result from the treaty of peace.

Accounts from Martinico of the 24th of May, represent the restoration of order in Guadeloupe as a work of difficulty, and requiring long time. They speak of an endless war in the woods, and of the total destruction of the plantations. We do not altogether discredit these accounts; but we cannot but recollect, that we received similar accounts from Saint Domingo.

The orders of the Commander in Chief at Martinico, respecting the West-India, or Negro regiments (see p. 24.) discover a considerable degree of timidity with respect to those sooty savages. Miserable is the lot of a commander, when he is compelled to flatter his men, particularly when those men are of such a description.

In North Carolina the Negroes have, it seems, attempted another insurrection. The consequence has been, whipping, cropping, banishing, and hanging. To the justice of these punishments, considering them applicable to the crime of insurrection in the abstract, we have nothing to object; but, that Negroes ought to be so punished for attempting to extricate themselves from slavery, in a country where the very first article of the Constitution declares, that "all men are born equal and free, and that they have certain unalienable rights," amongst which is liberty," is a position which we leave to be made out by some member of the Whig Club, some able advocate of representative government and written constitutions. Let it not, however, for a moment, be understood, that we wish to cast any blame on the judiciary of North Carolina, for the judgments it has passed on these sable insurgents. If the Constitution consists of impracticable nonsense, the people are not, for that reason, to lose their property and their lives for fear of infringing it. The fact is, a written Constitution makes a very pretty pamphlet, and, sometimes, very profitable to the bookseller who publishes it; and this appears to us to be the only good it ever can produce. When, indeed, the amiable youths, whom Messrs. Thornton and Wilberforce are educating in their academy at Clapham, have brought their studies to maturity, they may probably be able to draw up a Constitution that shall provide for the liberty and equality of all nations and of all colours; but, for white men to amuse themselves with writing Constitutions, appears to us to be, not only a shameful waste of time, but a most scandalous libel on their species.

POSTSCRIPT.

The Abbé Gregoire has arrived in this country, and has been received, with great honour by Sir Joseph Banks, who, together with the Secretary of the Royal Society, have conducted him to the British Museum and elsewhere. This Gregoire was a Member of the Regicide Convention, and, being absent from Paris at the time his Sovereign was arraigned and tried, he sent a written notification to the President of the Convention, that he voted for the death of the king! It must be known that he was, or professed to be, a Roman Catholic clergyman; and it should be remembered, that he was the first man to vote for the pillage and destruction of that church, the members of which had confided their rights to his protection, by choosing him one of their representatives in the States General. It is notorious, that, since that epoch, he has openly vilified and blasphemed, not only the Roman Catholic, but the Christian religion and its founder. We should be glad to know whether it be the politics or the religion of Gregoire, that Sir Joseph Banks most admires.—Volney, too, the notorious Volney, the sworn enemy of England and of Christianity, is in England; and of two other Frenchmen, who have lately received no small degree of public patronage and applause, one was a purveyor to Robespierre's guillotine, and his brother savant, was the man who actually carried the head of the Princess de Lamballe on a pike!—Such are the persons, who are encouraged by some, at least, of the great and the rich of this country, while hundreds of the French emigrant loyalists are dying by inches for want of a sufficiency of food! Can such a country escape destruction? Ought such a country to escape destruction? Let it not be said, that the nation is not to blame. The nation is to blame. It is to blame for its silence on these topics. If there were any public virtue left, it would discover itself in a general abhorrence of these things.

Whitehall, July 2.—The King has been pleased to appoint John Smyth, Esq. Master and Worker of the Mint.

Whitehall, July 3.—The King has been pleased to constitute and appoint the Right Hon. Henry Addington, Charles Small Pybus, Esq. George Thynne, Esq. PUBLIC PAPERS.

A Treaty of reciprocal Advantage and mutual Convenience between the United States of America and the Chickasaws.

The President of the United States of America, by James Wilkinson Brigadier General in the service of the United States, Benjamin Hawkins of North-Carolina, and Andrew Pickens of South-Carolina, Commissioners of the United States, who are vested with full powers, and the Mingco, principal men and warriors of the Chickasaw nation, representing the said nation, have agreed to the following articles.

Art. I. The Mingco, principal men and warriors of the Chickasaw nation of Indians, give leave and permission to the President of the United States of America, to lay out, open and make a convenient waggon road through their land between the settlements of Mero district in the States of Tennessee, and those of Natchez in the Mississippi territory, in such way and manner as he may deem proper; and it shall be a highway for the citizens of the United States and the Chickasaws. The Chickasaws shall appoint two discreet men to serve as assistants, guides, or pilots, during the time of laying out and opening the road, under the direction of the officer charged with that duty, who shall have a reasonable compensation for their service: Provided always, that the necessary ferries over the water-courses crossed by the said road shall be held and deemed to be the property of the Chickasaw nation.

Art. II. The Commissioners of the United States give to the Mingco of the Chickasaws, and the deputation of that nation, goods to the value of seven hundred dollars, to compensate him and them and their attendants for the expense and inconvenience they may have sustained by their respectful and friendly attention to the President of the United States of America, and to the request made to them in his name, to permit the opening of the road. And as the persons, towns, villages, lands, hunting-ground, and other rights and property of the Chickasaws, as set forth in the treaties or stipulations heretofore entered into between the contracting parties, more especially in and by a certificate of the President of the United States of America, under their seal of the first of July, 1794, are in the peace and under the protection of the United States. The commissioners of the United States do hereby further agree, that the President of the United States of America shall take such measures from time to time, as he may think proper, to assist the Chickasaws to preserve entire all their rights against the encroachments of unjust neighbours, of which he shall be the judge, and also to preserve and perpetuate friendship and brotherhood between the white people and the Chickasaws.

Art. III. The Commissioners of the United States may, if they deem it adviseable, proceed immediately to carry the first article into operation, and the treaty shall take effect and be obligatory on the contracting parties as soon as the same shall have been ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States.

In testimony whereof, we, the plenipotentiaries have herunto subscribed our names and affixed our seals at Chickasaw Bluffs, the 24th of October, 1801.

A Treaty of Friendship, Limits and Accommodation between the United States of America and the Chactaw Nation of Indians.

Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States of America, by James Wilkinson, of the State of Maryland, Brigadier General in the army of the United States, Benjamin Hawkins, of North-Carolina, and Andrew Pickens, of South-Carolina, Commissioners Plenipotentiary of the United States on the one part, and the Mingos, principal men and warriors of the Chactaw nation, representing the said nation in council assembled, on the other part, have entered into the following articles and conditions, viz.

Art. I. Whereas the United States, in Congress assembled, did by their Commissioners Plenipotentiary Benjamin Hawkins, Andrew Pickens, and Joseph Martin, at a treaty held with the chiefs and head men of the Chactaw nation at Hopewell on the Keowe, the third day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, give peace to the said nation, receive it into the favour and protection of the United States of America: It is agreed by the parties to these presents respectively, that the Chactaw nation, or such part of it as may reside within the limits of the United States, shall be and continue under the care and protection of the said States, and that the mutual confidence and friendship which are hereby acknowledged to subsist between the contracting parties shall be maintained and perpetuated.

Art. II. The Mingos, principal men and warriors of the Chactaw nation of Indians, do hereby give their free consent, that a convenient and durable waggon way be explored, marked, opened, and made under the orders and instructions of the President of the United States, through their lands; to commence at the northern extremity of the settlement of the Mississippi territory, and to be extended from thence, by such route as may be selected and surveyed under the authority of the President of the United States, until it shall strike the lands claimed by the Chickasaw nation; and the same shall be and continue for ever a highway for the citizens of the United States and the Chactaws; and the said Chactaws shall nominate two discreet men from their nation who may be employed as assistants, guides, or pilots during the time of laying out and opening the said highway, or so long as may be deemed expedient, under the direction of the officer charged with this duty, who shall receive a reasonable compensation for their services.

Art. III. The two contracting parties covenant and agree that the old line of demarcation heretofore established by and between the officers of his Britannic Majesty and the Chactaw nation, which runs in a parallel direction with the Mississippi river, and eastward thereof, shall be retraced and plainly marked, in such way and manner as the President may direct, in the presence of two persons to be appointed by the said nation; and that the said line shall be the boundary between the settlements of the Mississippi territory and the Chactaw nation.—And the said nation does by these presents relinquish to the United States, and quit claim for ever, all their right, title, and pretension to the land lying between the said line and the Mississippi river, bounded south by the thirty-first degree of north latitude, and north by the Yazoo river, where the said line shall strike the same; and on the part of the Commissioners it is agreed, that all persons who may be settled beyond this line shall be removed within it, on the side towards the Mississippi, together with their slaves, household furniture, tools, materials and stock, and that the cabbins or houses erected by such persons shall be demolished.

Art. IV. The President of the United States may, at his discretion, proceed to execute the second article of this treaty; and the third article may be convenient to the government of the United States, and without unnecessary delay on the part of the other, of which the president shall be the judge; the Chactaws to be seasonably advised, by order of the president of the United States, of the time when, and the place where, the re-survey and re-marking of the old line referred to in the preceding article, will be commenced.

Art. V. The Commissioners of the United States, for and in consideration of the foregoing concessions on the part of the Chactaw nation, and in full satisfaction for the same, do give and deliver to the Mingos, chiefs and warriors of the said nation, at the signing of these presents, the value of two thousand dollars in goods and merchandize, nett cost of Philadelphia, the receipt whereof is lately acknowledged, and they further agree to give three sets of blacksmith's tools to the said nation.

Art. VI. This treaty shall take effect and be obligatory on the contracting parties, so soon as the same shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America; by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof.

In testimony whereof, the Commissioners Plenipotentiary of the United States, and Mingos, principal men and warriors of the Chactaw nation, have hereunto subscribed their names and affixed their seals at Fort Adams, on the Mississippi, this seventh day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and one, and of the independence of the United States the twenty-sixth.

Treaty concluded the 20th of May, 1802, between the French Republic and His Serene Highness the Duke of Wirtemberg.

Art. I. There shall be good understanding and amity between the French Republic and His Serene Highness.

II. His Majesty the Emperor, and the Empire of Germany, having consented by the 7th article of the Treaty of Luneville, that the French Republic should possess in full sovereignty and property, the countries and territories situate on the left bank of the Rhine, and which made part of the Empire of Germany, His Serene Highness the Duke of Wurtemberg, renounces for himself, his heirs and successors, in favour of the French Republic, the rights of sovereignty, territorial superiority, property, and all other rights which he exercises, and which belong to him over the countries and territories on the Left Bank of the Rhine, and in particular,

1. The principality of Montbeliard.
2. The county of Storbürg.
3. The seignories of Riquewir, Ostheim, Aubure, Franquemont, Blamont, Clermont, Stéricourt, Châtelot, Granges, Clerval, and Passavant.
4. The fiefs arising out of the said principalities, counties and seignories.
5. The seignories, fiefs, and domains, possessed by the heirs and successors of the natural children of the Duke Leopold Eberhard of Wurtemberg Montbeliard, and which are revertible to the Ducal house.
6. The territories, rights, and revenues at Spire, Dudenhoven, and in the environs on the Left Bank of the Rhine.

III. His Serene Highness in like manner renounces all claims of restitution which he might make upon the French Republic for arrears and non-enjoyment of rights and revenues, and for all other causes, anterior to the present Treaty.

IV. In pursuance of the 7th Article of the Treaty of Luneville, the French Republic promises and engages its good offices to obtain for His Serene Highness, those territorial indemnities which shall be as much as possible suited to the convenience and pleasure of His Serene Highness, equivalent to the losses of all kinds resulting to His Serene Highness, from the war, and conformable to the advantages and privileges attached to the ceded possessions.

V. The 8th Article of the Treaty of Luneville, concerning the debts of the countries on the Left Bank of the Rhine, shall serve as the basis of the regulations to be made respecting the debts of the countries comprised in the cession made by the 2d Article of the present Treaty.

VI. The private debts of communes and other corporations, shall remain charged to them, and by them paid.

VII. On the day of the ratification of the present Treaty, all sequestrations placed on account of the war, on the goods, effects, and revenues of citizens of the French Republic, in the states of His Serene Highness, shall be taken off, and they shall be at liberty to carry away their goods and effects, and also to sell their property, or receive its revenues, without any hindrance whatever.

LOUISIANA.

The cession of this country to France will be one, if not the first and most powerful, cause of the next war, which, it is greatly to be feared, will be the last war that Great-Britain will ever wage. It is, therefore, of great moment to watch the events and circumstances connected with this cession, and to prepare ourselves for acting as the case may require.—It is evident, that the result of the projects of France on the continent of North-America must, in a great measure, depend on the disposition and conduct of the United States; and, for that reason, it is of vast importance for us to be early acquainted with that disposition and conduct.—That the people of the United States, from one end of that immense country to the other, are alarmed at the prospect of seeing the French in their neighbourhood is very certain; but, that they will take any measures to prevent what they so much dread is very doubtful indeed. The perusal of some few of the articles, which have lately appeared in the American papers, will, however, enable the reader to judge of the probabilities in this respect.

“ Baltimore, May 20th, 1802.

“ We find nothing, among the articles of the treaty of Amiens, by which the interest of the United States can be in any degree affected; and there is nothing, therefore, to alloy the pleasure which every friend of humanity must derive from this auspicious event. We had hoped, however, and had been led to believe, that the convention between France and Spain, by which Louisiana is ceded to the French, would be annulled by this treaty. In this expectation we have been disappointed; and it now appears, that this important province is to be annexed to the territories of the French Republic. Whether an attempt will be made, by the government of France, to establish a colony there, is not yet apparent. We stated, sometime since, upon the authority of information which we then considered authentic, that the project had been abandoned. We never questioned the cession of the territory, but denied its intended colonization by the French Republic. Nothing has yet transpired, either giving the stamp of authenticity to the report which had led to this opinion, or convincing us that our information was altogether erroneous and unfounded. We can only say, that we most sincerely hope it may be true, and that we are satisfied, nothing will be wanting on the part of the American government, to induce a relinquishment of the plan. Whatever may have been our attachment to the cause for which the people of France were contending, in the commencement of the revolution, we have now no hesitation in believing, that the government of that country ought to be watched with a jealous eye. We have had strong indications of a departure from the first principles of their revolution. Great and wonderful as is the character of their Chief Consul, we have had too much reason to believe, that universal conquest and domination are the leading objects of his policy. We do not see in him the tyranny of Philip, the cruelty of Alexander, or the brutal ferocity of Charles the XIIth; but we trace in his life and character, the ungovernable ambition of a Caesar, and the aspiring temper of a Cromwell. While the energies of the French Republic, therefore, shall continue under the direction of Buonaparté, we should most sincerely deprecate the event, which should give them an establishment on any section of our continent. The inert and sluggish Spaniard is less to be dreaded than the active and enterprising Frenchman. Bred, and almost born in the camp; trained to the use of arms, and inured to scenes of pillage and slaughter, the peaceful settlers, on our frontiers, would be constantly exposed to their hostile incursions. If the waters of the Levant have been no security against their ambitions and desolating schemes of conquest; the course of the Mississippi would hardly serve as a line of demarcation, by which they would measure the rightful extent of their possessions. Add to this, the chance of being deprived of the navigation of this river, so immensely important to our western territories; and we may consider the possession of Louisiana, by the French, as one of the greatest evils which could befall us; short of an open and predatory warfare. We have the fullest confidence that it will be viewed as an evil by our government, and that every effort will be made to avert it. That these efforts may be crowned with success, must be the ardent wish of every American, of whatever sect or party, who is not deluded by a blind and enthusiastic attachment to this too powerful Republic."

"New York, May 24th, 1802.

"The operations in St. Domingo may retard the French in taking possession of Louisiana, and, possibly, afford an opportunity for negotiation, respecting that vulnerable quarter of our continent.—England, Spain, and the United States, are alike concerned in preventing France from gaining foothold on this continent—a single demi-brigade of French invincibles, will form the entering wedge to rend asunder the Northern and Western possessions of all these powers.—Can Great-Britain remain a calm spectator of the gigantic strides of the French Colossus to universal empire? Will Spain yield up her inexhaustible mines, with the largest and fairest portion of the Western world possessed by any European power, without a struggle? Pour nous autres, what can we do alone? To Americans, will not be left the last dire consolation of the wretched Ulysses in the Cyclops clutches, we shall not be the last, but the first, to be devoured.—The United States would furnish but a breakfast for the French, who would make a dinner of Spain, and sup on the rest of the world!!!—at least this is the creed of every man, of every woman, and of every child, composing the Grande Nation. The French Generals, in St. Domingo, speak in the foulest manner of our country and its government. They talk of sending an army to New Orleans; "then" as one of them was heard to say, "We'll give laws to the United States."

The Editors of the New York paper, after inserting Mr. Cobbett's remarks on the consequences of the cession of Louisiana (Vide Register vol. I. p. 199) say,

"These remarks deserve the serious attention of every American citizen interested in the integrity and tranquillity of his country. If some measures be not adopted, either by negotiation, or otherwise, to divert the French from taking possession of Louisiana, it will not be long ere the foregoing prediction is accomplished." For the purport of this prediction we must refer the reader to Mr. Cobbett's letter, the opinions of which, though ridiculed by that profound politician, Sir Frederick Morton Eden, will, when it is too late, be attended to in England as well as in America.

So serious are the Americans on the subject, that the Governor of Georgia had, in the month of May, issued a proclamation, calling an extra meeting of the legislature of that state, on the 10th of June, the object of which was, to take into consideration the cession of Louisiana to France.—Georgia is very much exposed towards the Mississippi. Indeed, it is totally at the mercy of a powerful French army. But, Bernadotte will be there before the state of Georgia can have voted a corps of militia, which, after they are embodied for actual service (no easy matter), cannot move without the orders of Mr. Jefferson, who, if we are to judge from the language of the prints of his faction, will have little inclination to give such orders.—The extracts, which we have above made from American papers, are taken from prints hostile to the present general government, or, at least, to the persons administering it. We have carefully examined those prints, which are well known to speak the sentiments of the government, and have, as yet, not been able to discover any direct proof of its opinion on this subject, either one way or the other; but as these prints are extremely solicitous to palliate, and even to justify, all the infamous conduct of the French towards the Americans in St. Domingo, there is every reason to believe, that Jefferson and his party are resolved not to break with France on any account; and, though we are fully persuaded, that they will see with great regret the arrival of the French force in Louisiana, they will take no measures to prevent it. Without the aid of Great-Britain, it is, indeed, out of their power to prevent it, and that they would not, were they to ask it, obtain that aid, will be readily believed by every one who has the least knowledge of the character and sentiments of His Majesty's present administration. In fact, they cannot lend their aid to assist the Americans, or any other people, against the encroachments of France. They dare not do it. They have, by their late measures, completely extinguished the warlike spirit of the country. War, of whatever kind, or for whatever object, they have caused to be regarded as an evil; as something detestable; as something to be avoided and hated at all events. Yet we must finally go to war; we must go to war in a very very few years, or we must sink without a struggle. But, the consequence of the peace will be, we shall, though at war in a year from this time, find that we have begun too late; we shall, in every quarter of the world, find the vantage ground taken by the enemy; and, as to the important territory of the Mississippi, all the evils of its cession to France will have taken place before any ministry will dare to talk of arming.

Of what vast importance the absolute command of the Mississippi is, may easily be gathered from the following account of exports down the river from the port of Louisville alone, during the quarter of a year, ending in March last.

Now, let the reader refer to the speeches on the peace, by Lords Hawkesbury and Castlereagh, by the Master of the Rolls and General Maitland, as also to the observations of Sir Frederick Morton Eden, and he will at once perceive, that neither of them was in possession of the most trifling degree of knowledge of this part of the subject, on which they were speaking. They believed, or at least, they wished to make the nation believe, that, because Louisiana was of but little value to France a hundred years ago, it would be of no value to her now. This was begging the question; it was drawing a conclusion upon premises by no means granted or established; for, Louisiana was of great value to France a hundred years ago; but, allowing that it was not of any value before an inch of land had been cleared on the eastern bank of the Mississippi, before the very name of Kentucky was known, does it follow that it will be of no value now, when from Louisville alone, the exports amount to £320,000 a year? On this, and on every other subject, we shall be careful never to make hazardous assertions, not to proceed upon vague and uncertain foundations; but, it may not be amiss to state, what we think will be fully confined by future details, that the whole of the exports down the Mississippi, for the year ending on the 31st of March last, will not amount to less than a million and a half sterling—a fearful amount, when we consider that it will now be placed entirely at the mercy of France!

We shall close this interesting account with an extract of a letter, addressed to Mr. Cobbett, by a gentleman residing in New York, and to the contents of which we may, without hazarding the displeasure of the reader, venture to call his utmost attention.

New York, May, 12. 1802.

As to public matters, since the liquidation of the old debts took place, in which the Virginians were so much interested, they have had no particular motive to prolong ancient animosities, or to excite new ones between the two nations. The French nation, which this country once affected so unwisely, grows weaker, and will be succeeded by a more sincere hatred, if Buonaparté executes his project of colonizing Louisiana. Whether this hatred will ever rise to hostilities, or whether it will sink into a prudential acquiescence, in case of such an event, will depend much on circumstances. At present the French are viewed with an evil eye by a great majority of the people, not only on account of their pretensions to Louisiana and the Floridas, but for the advantages they took in the last treaty, and for their treacherous and profligate conduct towards the American traders at St. Domingo. On their side, I believe, they despise and hate us as sincerely. Tant mieux!

The liberal manner, on your part at least, in which the old claims of British creditors have been settled, was a wise and happy measure: it has cut up the ancient enmity by the roots, in the minds of many influential men who were prejudiced against you merely on that account. To use a well known Indian phrase, the hatchet is buried, and I believe there are few who wish to dig it from its grave, except the French, and their jacobin American allies. If the former take possession of Louisiana, than which nothing is more probable, a more cordial union will take place, or ought to take place, between the parent and her children. We must either go to war with the grand republic, in which case we shall want your aid, or we must agree to lose Georgia, Tennessee, and all the western territory, or we must grant the enemy certain exclusive privileges in trade, injurious to you. The latter I apprehend is not very probable. But what a fatal neglect it was that Great-Britain did not seize on the mouth of the Mississippi before the peace was concluded! What a world of trouble and expense it would have prevented!

I am happy in believing that the strange delusion, that took place in your countrymen, at and after the signing of the preliminaries, is passing away, and that, if the definitive treaty is signed, you have obtained more just and adequate terms. The preliminaries, indeed, would disgrace an idiot. They are a monument of human imbecility. With the best terms you have any chance to obtain from a government of such enormous size and ambition as the French, you will always be unsate: the sword which has been drawn principally for your destruction, will always be hanging over your heads. It has long been a settled point with me that Great-Britain and France cannot long co-exist as equals. This is an opinion founded on the politics of France for more than a century, and is confirmed, beyond a doubt, by her present unexampled thirst for universal domination. The war will be renewed again, and again, until one or other is crushed. How impolitic therefore was your ministry to submit to such terms, or indeed to any terms which would leave your implacable enemies in possession of all their conquests, to say nothing of the surrender of your own conquests, when you had it so much in your power, when indeed it was your duty, to reduce them to a more moderate size.—It is a folly, worthy only of a whining hypocritical philanthropist, to declaim against the horrors of a war ad internecionem, when the matter is not left to your choice—when your enemies have so long resolved on your destruction—and destroyed you must be, or you must destroy them. As to yourself, I see with pleasure you have made a nobler choice: you have resolved to wage perpetual war, with the pen at least, against the foes of your country, foreign and domestic, and I hope your labours will not be lost, that they will help to keep alive the old anti-gallican British spirit, which like the vestal fire of the ancients ought never to be extinguished.

Excuse this leap across the Atlantic, and I will lead you once more back to the woods of America.—Party spirit still rages among us with all its appropriate features. The outs are cursing the ins; and the ins, as far as they are able, are sending the outs to perdition. You have sometimes had such scenes in your country, but party rage has never been carried to such extremes as here. Here the changes in offices have been almost universal: it has extended even to the poor clerks.—Nevertheless I can excuse the present administration so far: the revolution, though pretty complete, does not contradict republican principles, or threaten any material injury to the body of the people. It is only shifting the loaves and fishes of government into new hands. But some of the late acts of the national legislature appear to me extremely impolitic. The abolition of the taxes on luxuries, and other articles to which the people were reconciled, while the duties on certain necessities, such as tea, coffee, and sugar, are continued, must render the authors unpopular in a very short time; and the liberty that has been taken to remove a great number of judges from their offices, without any pretence of misconduct, looks too much like a determination to render the courts of justice the mere engines of a party.—These two articles excepted, I cannot discover any very tremendous charge, as regards the general interest of the community. As to our foreign relations, the present system appears to be completely pacific, and towards your country rather friendly, than indifferent—though if you had obtained from the domineering French, more honourable conditions of peace, you would have stood higher in our esteem.

I remain your most faithful friend.

Mr. Wm. Cobbett, London.

ANSWER.

Dear Sir,

Pall Mall, 14th July, 1802.

You will, perhaps, be surprized to see so great a part of your letter in print; but, I place so much reliance on every thing you say, that I could not forbear communicating your present remarks to my readers.

I can readily conceive, that the liquidation of the old debts has softened the asperity of the Virginians, from whom, chiefly, those debts were due; but I am very far from giving my entire approbation to the manner in which that liquidation has been effected. The debts due to British creditors amounted to about three millions, in lieu of which we have obtained six hundred thousand pounds. That it was very unwise in Lord Shelburne to make any stipulation for the payment of these debts I allow; but, it having been made, and a fair and honourable mode of settling the amount having been agreed upon in a second treaty between the two nations, that mode ought to have been adhered to. In diplomatic transactions this country is ever out-witted, but by no nation has she been out-witted more glaringly than by America. Observe, that, while we forego all the advantages of the treaty of 1794, you forego none of them. While the decisions of the board, which were to obtain justice for British creditors are wiped away, because they operate against the wishes of America, those of the board, constituted to examine and decide on the claims of Americans, are to have their full effect. This system of concession may procure us a short respite from attack; but, be assured, that, if persevered in, it will, in a few years, as certainly effect our ruin as it has already exposed us to contempt.

Your opinion respecting the final consequences of the cession of Louisiana differs somewhat from that which I have formed, though, indeed, you do not speak very positively. You say, that you must either go to war with France, (with our aid), or lose the Western countries, or grant to France certain exclusive privileges in trade, injurious to us, which latter, you think, is not very probable.—I am glad to hear you say this, because it accords with the interests of my country, and because I have the utmost deference for your judgment and foresight. I must, however, confess, that I greatly fear that you over-rate the spirit and good disposition of your countrymen. The tameness, with which you have submitted, and are now submitting, to the injuries and insults of France, gives me no encouragement to hope, that you will, when she is become more formidable to you, buckle on your armour and resist her encroachments. Besides, she will be very careful for some time, not to proceed, in her colonization of Louisiana, in such a way as shall furnish the real friends of American independence with a ground of complaint against her. She will not attack you by storm but by saps. She will have you completely in her power ere she draws the dagger from her cloak.—Truth, however, is what

I wish to convey to my readers, and, therefore, I publish your opinion with the acknowledgment that I regard it as of much greater weight than my own. Nevertheless, as you make the refusal to the granting of France certain privileges in trade injurious to England, to depend on the other alternative of war, with our aid, or upon the losses after yielding the Western countries to France, I must confess, that I see little ground to hope for such a war; and, if France obtains possession of the Western countries without war, your and our ruin will be only postponed for a time.

As to your hope respecting the definitive treaty, it will, ere this, have been completely blasted by a perusal of that disgraceful instrument. I perceive, that your countrymen in general had adopted the opinion, that the circumstance of the French fleet having sailed to the West Indies would operate greatly in our favour at Amiens. This was the opinion here also. It is precisely what Lord Grenville urged in the House of Lords; but, alas! little do you know of the ministers who have made this peace! Inadequate indeed is the notion that you can possibly form of their miserable policy, and of the paltry motives by which they have been actuated.

The delusion, which prevailed at the signing of the preliminaries is wearing away: indeed, it is no more; but the vestal fire of Britain, the old anti-gallican spirit, is not to be kept alive by any exertions, much less by the puny efforts that it is in my power to make. It is already extinguished, or burns in the breasts of but a very trifling portion of the people of this country. The love of money and of ease has overpowered every noble sentiment. There is not more profuseness than formerly. I believe not so much. But there is infinitely more effeminacy, more cant, and less courage. The French revolution has not destroyed our bank, our parliament, nor our courts of law and justice; but it has imperceptibly sapped the hearts of the people, it has neutralized their feelings; eradicated the patriot passion, and has rendered loyalty a matter of expedience rather than what it used to be, a principle of equal force with filial affection or the love of life. The lower orders of the people live better than formerly, that is, they eat better food, and are clad and lodged better; the towns and villages increase in population, in neatness, and in convenience; the houses, the roads, the fields, the cattle, the carriages of every description, present a picture of prosperity and opulence such as never was beheld in any other country; but we want the virtues by which alone these blessings are to be preserved. We want a high sense of national honour; we want a contempt of wealth and of life, when put in competition with the glory of England.

I am, yours, &c. &c.

WM. COBBETT.

ADDRESS to the Gentlemen, Clergy, Freemen, and Freeholders, of the City of Norwich.

Gentlemen, we trust it will not be thought the language of disappointment (we are sure it is not that of presumption,) if we say that we regret the event of the late contest less on our own account, than with a view to the effects which it is likely to produce in this city, and the example which it gives to the kingdom at large.

We have declared our opinion from the beginning—an opinion which our adversaries will be the last to dissent from,—that this has been a great political contest, in which we are now compelled to add, that victory rests entirely on their side. With a deduction made for the effects of money, and of those arts, which though practised perhaps at all times, have in this city rarely been seen to the same extent and in the same forms as on the late occasion, the triumph of that system of politicks, which we can describe only by the name of jacobin politicks, will in few instances be found to have been more complete. Those who know the state of parties in this city, with the characters of some of the principal actors and leaders, will be at no loss for proofs of this remark; and those who judge at a distance will require probably no other proofs than that which they will derive from the event itself. We have said, in a former address, and the assertion is in no degree contradicted by what has happened, that a great majority of the property and consequence of the city was on our side. We fear that that consequence has suffered itself to be defeated and overborne precisely by the same means, which we have seen lead to the destruction of great states and empires; (we hope from our hearts that others may not be exposed to equal danger,)—by the supineness of long-established power, and by the want of estimating truly and in time, the effect of those arts now employed systematically for the overthrow of establishments of every kind.

In this view of things it would not be respect, it would be presumption in us, if we were to dwell on our own individual losses, and the concern which we must feel at being deprived of an honour, which one of us had so long enjoyed, and which we had both so eagerly solicited. What we may be allowed to regret (and no terms can express too strongly our feelings in that respect,) is the separation from those friends whose virtues, public and private, have long endeared our situation to us, and who never gave stronger proofs of those virtues, or did more to render separation painful than at the moment when it was about to take place. In one view, we trust, we shall not be separated from them: we still hope to preserve the connection of private friendship; as undoubtedly no time will ever efface from our minds the memory of what we have owed to their kindness. Never were persons supported in a cause by more ardent, honourable, and disinterested zeal, or by those of whose support they might be more proud. This must be our consolation (and a great and efficacious one it is) under our present disappointment. With this impression upon our minds, with the liveliest sense of gratitude to our friends, and with the best wishes for the prosperity of the city of Norwich, we have the honor to be, gentlemen, your most obedient, and faithful humble servants,

Norwich, July 10th, 1802.

CIRCULAR.

Horse-Guards, July 6, 1802.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you, that his Majesty has been graciously pleased to grant permission to the several regiments of his army, which served during the late campaign in Egypt, to assume, and wear in their colours, a badge, as a distinguished mark of his Majesty's Royal approbation, and as a lasting memorial of the glory acquired to his Majesty's arms, by the zeal, discipline, and intrepidity of his troops, in that arduous and important campaign.

His Royal Highness the Commander in Chief has directed me to make this communication to you, in order that the regiment under your command may avail itself of the honour hereby conferred by his Majesty; and I am commanded, at the same time to apprise you, that a pattern of the badge, approved by his Majesty, is lodged at the office of the Comptrollers of Army Accounts, there to be had recourse to, as circumstances may require.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient humble Servant,

(A true Copy.) Harry Calvert, A. G.

The badge is a Sphinx, with the word "EGYPT" over it.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Horse-Guards, June 12, 1802.

His Royal Highness the Commander in Chief directs it to be made known to the army, that his Majesty has been graciously pleased to signify his Royal Pleasure, that every serjeant (whether of the cavalry, foot guards, or line,) who has in the course of the late war, or may hereafter, become blind on service, shall receive an allowance of 1s. 6d. per diem; every corporal, in the like circumstances, 1s. 2d. per diem; and every drummer and private man, in like circumstances, 1s. a day, for the remainder of their lives.

It is the Commander in Chief's pleasure that his Majesty's gracious intention, above expressed, shall be communicated to the men, and inserted in the orderly book of every regiment.

By order of his Royal Highness the Commander in Chief,

Harry Calvert, A. G. of the Forces.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

The elections continue to be the leading political subject.—A very numerous body of Mr. Windham's friends met, at the Angel in Norwich, on Saturday last, without his knowledge or concurrence, to support his nomination for Norfolk.—Colonel Wodehouse having already declared himself a candidate on the loyal interest of the county, found it necessary to have some understanding with that gentleman's committee, in order either that a junction might be formed between them, or that the latter might withdraw.—Colonel Wodehouse perceiving that the two interests would materially clash, relinquished his pretensions in favour of the superior claims of Mr. Windham. A large subscription was immediately begun, for supporting Mr. Windham's election, and the gentlemen present entered into a resolution, to bring their tenants and neighbours to the poll, free of expense. The next morning, through the activity of his friends, almost every town and village in the county was in motion for Mr. Windham.—At Yarmouth in particular, 700 freeholders volunteered themselves, free of expense, under the direction of the Mayor, Sir Edmund Lacon, and the principal gentlemen of the town, and a handsome subscription was set on foot and increased with great rapidity. But, on Mr. Windham's return to Norwich, having received the intelligence of his being already elected at another place, he thought it right to request that his friends would not carry their exertions in his favour any further, as he would not appear any longer to occupy a post which he thought might be filled by others with greater advantage to their interest.—In consequence of this determination, Colonel Wodehouse again came forward, with the full support of Mr. Windham's friends, and the loyal and independent freeholders of the county, as well as of his own most respectable family interest, and from the result of the poll, there is every reason to believe that he will be returned with a considerable majority.—The numbers, at three o'clock on Thursday, (the fourth day of the poll) are, for Mr. Coke, 3,012, Colonel Wodehouse, 3,071, Sir Jacob Astley, 2,918; great reinforcements are hourly expected for Colonel Wodehouse.—There is no doubt, had Mr. Windham stood, that he would have been elected by a large majority; and so great is his general popularity in the county, that it is now confidently believed, that notwithstanding Mr. Coke's vast county influence, Mr. Windham would have headed the poll.—In Hertfordshire we are sorry to perceive, that Mr. Baker has been rejected, in consequence of the great exertions of the adverse interest. An old, faithful, and industrious member is here lost to the great council of the nation. We hope he will come in for some other place. Men should, in such cases, lose sight of their private injuries in pursuit of the good of their country. Mr. Baker is not less remarkable for his attention to, and his knowledge of, public business, than for his integrity. Such men should not be discouraged by an electioneering defeat.—The City of London has behaved well, upon the whole. Three out of four of the members chosen are those who refused to sign the abominable test, which they were so impudently called upon to subscribe; and, if we are rightly informed, Mr. Alderman Combe did not actually sign, though he gave his unequivocal assent to the principle of the test.—The County of Middlesex has, too, resisted the clamours of Democracy. To read the bills and advertisements that have been published, one would believe, that the contest in this county was not between two gentlemen, but between the magistrates and the thieves, and that the great body of those who have espoused the cause of Sir Francis Burdett, have done so with a hope, that, if he were successful, there would be an end to all legal punishment, and that crimes of every sort would be committed in perfect security.—The contest at Dover, from some very singular circumstances attending it, has excited a great share of public attention. Mr. Spencer Smyth, brother of Sir Sidney, both of whom are natives of this place, stood upon what is called the independent interest. Mr. Trevanion has a family and proprietary interest. Mr. Huskisson stood upon the interest of the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, of which Dover is one. Soon after it became certain, that Mr. Huskisson's pretensions would be contested, a handbill in the following words, was published by a Mr. Fector, who is a banker at Dover, and a principal proprietor in the packet boats of that place:

"That no false rumours may prejudice Mr. Huskisson's election, I think it a justice due to him to declare that I had not even a common acquaintance with him, nor knew any thing of his intention of offering for Dover, previous to my hearing from Mr. Pitt on Saturday the 20th June last, that it was his wish, and the wishes of government, that he should succeed Mr. Pybus, who meant to decline. The strongest testimony I can afford the town, that I shall never be instrumental in attempting to force any person upon them is, that in this very instance I actually did give up one of my most intimate friends (Colonel Churchill) then a member, and equally anxious to come forward with the good wishes of government. The gentleman in question, I have every reason to believe, might have had the countenance of Mr. Pitt, if I had pressed it. To have done so I thought would have been a presumption, particularly as Mr. Huskisson's public character was not unknown to me. High in the confidence of Mr. Pitt and the present administration, I felt convinced Mr. Huskisson would prove an active and useful member to the town. No other motive induced me to give him my support: and should any person be disposed to question these facts, I can and will afford him undoubted testimony that this is the truth, and the whole truth upon the subject.

(Signed) "J. M. FECTOR."

This is, indeed, a very extraordinary publication, and one which we have anxiously wished to see contradicted; but, as it has not been contradicted, we are certainly bound to regard it as authentic, and so regarding it, we feel ourselves called upon to bestow on it some few remarks. Its object appears to have been to convince the electors, that by choosing Mr. Huskisson, they would please Mr. Pitt (the Lord Warden) and the ministry. It appears to have been the prevailing notion, that Mr. Fector had, of his own accord, and to answer his own private purposes, resolved to bring in Mr. Huskisson. To remove this impression, which might be injurious to that gentleman,

Mr. Fector informed the electors, that it was not to gratify his own wishes, but the wishes of Mr. Pitt and the ministry (for we cannot in the language of Mr. Fector, call the ministry the government), that he had proposed and supported Mr. Huskisson. Such an explanation, in private, might have been proper enough; but to make it the subject of a hand-bill, though it may not deserve the name of treachery, was, to give it the mildest term, certainly a most glaring instance of indiscretion. That Mr. Pitt, being out of the ministry, should take upon him to express their wishes, in this instance, will most assuredly lead to a belief, that he has ruled the cabinet, not only in the whole of the electioneering arrangements, but in every measure adopted since his resignation, and that the present ministers are, to all intents and purposes, the mere puppets of others, who govern in reality, while they are securely sheltered from even the appearance of responsibility. It is hardly possible that Mr. Pitt should have authorized this publication of Mr. Fector; but, we cannot help lamenting, that he should have communicated in such a manner with such a man. To request Mr. Fector to give his support to a particular candidate would have had nothing objectionable in it. It was what Mr. Pitt had an undoubted right to do; it was even what he ought to do; but, to communicate "the wishes of the government" on the subject, was either too high or too low for Mr. Pitt. As the master of the ministry it was too high, as the agent it was too low. As Mr. Pitt and as Lord Warden he should have spoken, and as nothing else. —With respect to the merits of the opponent candidates, it is hardly fair to suppose, that Mr. Pitt, in recommending Mr. Huskisson, wished to oppose Mr. Spencer Smyth, because it is not certain that he was apprized of that gentleman's intention to stand for Dover; if he had known it, we would fain believe, that he would have been the last man in the world to attempt to frustrate his views. With regard to Mr. Huskisson, however, we cannot refrain from expressing our surprize and even our regret, that he should have been the person fixed upon by this great and penetrating statesman. That the talent of public speaking is by no means an indispensable qualification in a member of parliament we are ready to allow; and, if it were so, Messrs. Huskisson and Pybus are, in this respect, much about upon a level, each of them being, we believe, fully adequate to the task of articulating the monosyllables aye and no; but, when we see what we cannot but regard as extraordinary exertions, made to bring in a candidate, and made too by such a man as Mr. Pitt, we are naturally and irresistibly led to inquire into the nature and extent of that candidate's pretensions to a post of so much honor and public importance; and, without the least desire to detract from the merits, which Mr. Huskisson may possibly possess (though they have never come to our knowledge), we must say, that we think he has been already more than sufficiently loaded with the favours of government. Either high birth, distinguished talent, or great public service, is, and ought to be, a sufficient pretension to public honours and emoluments; but, as far as we have been able to learn, Mr. Huskisson has a claim upon neither of these grounds. Lord Gower found him a banker's clerk at Paris. We are very willing to believe that his lordship's patronage was not improperly conferred when he procured him an appointment as clerk in the Alien Office; nor are we inclined to question the propriety of his being promoted in the office of Mr. Dundas; but, we cannot deny ourselves the right of questioning both the propriety and the justice of giving him a seat in Parliament, in addition to the ample, not to say extravagant and prodigal provision which he had already obtained from his Majesty's ministers. It was in the year 1793 that he was first noticed by Lord Gower. In six years afterwards (during the far greater part of which time he had been in very inferior situations) he obtained a pension, during pleasure, of no less than £1,200 a year; and, upon the change of ministry in 1801, this pension was changed from during pleasure to a pension for life. He, at the same time, enjoyed the agencies for the Cape and Ceylon, each of them £600 a year. The former of these is gone, of course, but the latter he still enjoys. So that, if the peace had not unfortunately robbed both him and the nation of the Cape of Good Hope, he would, to this hour, have been in the enjoyment of £2,400 a year. As it is, he has for his services, as a mere clerk, received a reward nearly as great as that which was bestowed on Lord Rodney, or the Hero of the Nile, and much greater than that bestowed on the Defender of Acre! This, one would think, was enough without a seat in parliament! It was enough to give him a fortune, without setting him up to be the rival of the nobility and gentry of

England; without sending him to make laws for the government of the empire! Far be it from us to rail against places and pensions: they are the rewards, which government bestows, and ought to bestow, on those who render services to the nation. Nay, we go further, and allow that it is perfectly proper, not only to entail such rewards on widows or children, but, for the support of the aristocracy of the kingdom, to bestow emoluments, in certain extraordinary cases, on persons who have rendered no services at all to the state. This is a prerogative which belongs to a king, and without which a crown would not be worth having. The writer of this article has witnessed the fatal effects of a niggardly system of economy, and is well convinced that no part of the public money is, generally speaking, better employed, than that which goes to answer the demands of national gratitude, generosity, and munificence. Nor do we grudge Mr. Huskisson a pension; but that pension should have been proportioned to his services, or to his birth, neither of which entitled him to any thing like the provision, which he has secured. Such being our opinion, we cannot but express our pleasure at the result of the Dover election; not so much, however, at the defeat of Mr. Huskisson (for we bear him no ill-will) as at the success of his opponent, who, besides his own merits, has the honour to be the brother of Sir Sidney Smith. Sir Sidney is chosen for the City of Rochester; and we observe with great pleasure, that those gallant officers Sir John Borlase Warren and Sir Edward Pellew will also be seated in the next parliament. We have never enquired what are the politics of these gentlemen. We feel no anxiety about the side they will take, being well assured, that, unless they are deceived (which the wisest men sometimes will be) they will never give their consent to a measure hostile to the interests or honour of their country. They will bring into the new House of Commons that best of all possible ingredients, courage, of which the last was so miserably destitute; and, from the result of the elections in general, we are led to hope, that the race of "well-meaning men," of "economists" and "philanthropists," will have experienced a considerable diminution. The disorder of this nation is not a fever, but a palsy. Any thing that will enliven is good. An actual rebellion would not be half so dangerous as that torpor, that total indifference, which has lately prevailed; the former might be quelled, but the latter, if it continue for any length of time, must end in radical destruction. The decline of life and of genius has ever been marked by a return to childish fancies and amusements; and really the last House of Commons, with its bills about "bull-baiting" and "rabbit's dung," exhibited a scene strongly resembling the last stages of mortality; a scene so disgusting, so humiliating to the nation, and so pleasing to its enemies, we hope never again to behold within the walls of St. Stephen. With the new parliament we hope to see also a new ministry; or, at least, an efficient and responsible ministry. We believe Mr. Addington to be a very honest man, but what is that? Honesty alone is not a commendation for a footman, and shall it be for a first minister? He is not altogether destitute of talents as an orator, and even, perhaps, as a financier. In truth, he is what may be called a clever man. But he wants those great and commanding qualities, which mark the statesman, and which are at this time, more than ever, necessary to the preservation of the country. There are several persons in the ministry possessed of very good talents, nor are they at all deficient in point of industry and zeal; but they want weight, they want consequence, they want birth. At no period of our history were the powers of government ever shared by so few men of family. The ancient nobility and gentry of the kingdom have, with a very few exceptions, been thrust out of all public employments: this part of the aristocracy has been, in some measure, banished from the councils of the state. A race of merchants and manufacturers, and bankers and loan-jobbers and contractors, have usurped their place, and the government is very fast becoming what it must be expected to become in such hands. We think it probable, that Mr. Pitt may again be minister, and if he should, we hope he will perceive and avoid the evil consequences of surrounding himself with low and little men. In a minister who is himself a little man, it may be excused; but Mr. Pitt must always be great, even among the greatest. If Mr. Pitt should ever cast his eye upon this page, we are well persuaded he will not impute any selfish or malicious motive to the writer of it, and we, therefore, beg leave to tell him what many good men think, what is thought by many of his warmest admirers, but what he will never hear from any body but ourselves; and that is, that his preference of low-churchmen has excited great jealousy and suspicion in those who are sincerely attached to the hierarchy, amongst whom are certainly to be reckoned a vast majority of the clergy; that the project, imputed to him, for rendering the clergy pensioners of the state, has greatly strengthened this suspicion; that, in short, the clergy do not regard him as a friend of the church. While Jacobinism was at our doors, while all was in jeopardy, the clergy supported him, because the existence of the Church and State was, in some sort, identified with his administration; but, now that the danger of commotion and rebellion is past, the minds of men will return to considerations of a nature somewhat more private, and, he may rest assured, that the attachment of this powerful body, powerful by their numbers, their talents, their character, and their local situations, is to be preserved by nothing short of unequivocal testimony, that he harbours no intention of invading or undermining the established Church, to effect which was, as many persons believe, the sole object of the establishment of the Board of Agriculture, a belief which has been but too strongly corroborated by the proceedings and publications of that board. We also beg leave to tell him, that his partiality for young and new men, for persons of his own creation, to the almost total exclusion of the old nobility and gentry, is a subject of complaint with a great number of very good men. In the present state of this country a minister might set the nobility and gentry at defiance, if the ill-will excited amongst them could be confined to their own breasts; but it cannot; the people, we mean the better sort of the people, resent the neglect and ill treatment of those whom they have been, from their infancy, in the habit of respecting, more especially when the honours and favours due to them are conferred on persons of mean birth. Il vaut mieux qu'une cité périsse qu'un parvenu la gouverne, is an old Norman proverb; and, though the age of chivalry is certainly gone, men yet retain soul enough to dislike the power that places them beneath an upstart. This upstart system naturally grew out of the peculiar circumstances, under which Mr. Pitt came into power. It was adhered to, with some exceptions, from the first moment of his administration to the last: he appears never to have voluntarily and cordially given the hand to any thing great, whether of birth, character, or talent. Let us hope, that, if he should again come into power, he will discard a system so injurious to the harmony and welfare of the State. Another error, which it is to be hoped Mr. Pitt will correct, is, that superabundant caution, which prevents him from clearly and unequivocally stating his object and his resolution, which leaves the public mind for ever in a state of uncertainty, and which has, in so many instances, proved injurious to the country. To this very error, and to this error alone, the French Republic owes all its successes. The British Parliament never, at any one time, knew the real object of the late war; and how, then, should Europe know it? From an over anxiety not to fail in any enterprise, the British minister acted in a way in which he never could be said to undertake; and, therefore, he was never cordially joined, either at home or abroad. No man voluntarily embarks to be drifted to and fro by the tide, or to shift his course with every change of the wind; but, tell him his destination, and he cheerfully braves the toils and dangers of the sea.—Mr. Pitt's fort lies in the domestic rather than the foreign department of politics. Having, from his very youth, had one eye constantly upon the Bank and the other upon the Parliament House, he has never been able to look abroad into the great world of politics. Without, therefore, at all detracting from the powers of his mind, we may venture to say, that he has discovered no great degree of penetration as to the conduct, the interests, and views of other nations. This is a science, however, which he must now apply himself to. The career, on which he is now about to enter, bears no resemblance to that which he has heretofore run. The present peace has laid the foundation for an entirely new distribution of power, the effects of which must be felt in a very few years. We must then have war; and it behoves him to consider how we shall be able to resist the confederacy, which France can, and will, form against us. It behoves him to consider, in time, how the people of this country are again to be roused to arms. "Husbanding our resources" will not save us. France has neither "commerce, capital, nor credit," yet, at only six weeks notice, she ships off an army of thirty thousand men across the Atlantic. She has, in the whole, sent 45,000 men, and more are preparing. This shows that "commerce, credit, and capital" are not essentially necessary to the power of France;

England; without sending him to make laws for the government of the empire! Far be it from us to rail against places and pensions: they are the rewards, which government bestows, and ought to bestow, on those who render services to the nation. Nay, we go further, and allow that it is perfectly proper, not only to entail such rewards on widows or children, but, for the support of the aristocracy of the kingdom, to bestow emoluments, in certain extraordinary cases, on persons who have rendered no services at all to the state. This is a prerogative which belongs to a king, and without which a crown would not be worth having. The writer of this article has witnessed the fatal effects of a niggardly system of economy, and is well convinced that no part of the public money is, generally speaking, better employed, than that which goes to answer the demands of national gratitude, generosity, and munificence. Nor do we grudge Mr. Huskisson a pension; but that pension should have been proportioned to his services, or to his birth, neither of which entitled him to any thing like the provision, which he has secured. She has, in the whole, sent 45,000 men, and more are preparing. This shows that "commerce, credit, and capital" are not essentially necessary to the power of France.

and we hope, that Mr. Pitt will no longer regard a contest with that power as "a war of finance." Men are very apt to attach the greatest degree of importance to that science which they best understand: "You may," said the currier, "think what you please about stone and oak, but, if you have a mind to have the town well fortified, take my word for it there is nothing like leather." We have opposed money to a military spirit, and we have failed. Let the eloquence of Mr. Pitt be employed to create something more efficient than wealth; something that France cannot rob us of; then will he acquire a renown more lasting than brass and marble.

The length of these remarks has left us but little room for other matters, and, indeed, there is nothing very important to notice. The dispatches from Guadeloupe, notwithstanding the unfavourable accounts lately received and industriously promulgated in London, state, that the French have completely succeeded in restoring order and submission in that island. An article in the French papers informs us, that Toussaint, the famous black hero, who was to maintain a war everlasting, is arrived, in high health and spirits, at the port of Brest. If this be true, the English philanthropists may repair thither, and give him the fraternal embrace.

The United States of America is, at this moment, the most interesting scene. The people of that country are, at last, seriously alarmed at the prospect of seeing the French in their neighbourhood (vide p. 38). They even talk of preventing what they so much dread; but, their resistance will be confined to words, though we shall not be surprized to hear, that Bernadotte, if he be not very rapid in his movements, has met with some annoyance at the mouth of the Mississippi. Bernadotte will have about 7,000 French soldiers, to which will, probably, be added 4 or 5,000 blacks from St. Domingo. If the Americans support General Bowles, either openly or secretly, the French General may have some trouble, but we think he will finally triumph, and, from that moment, the American States are at his mercy. So much the better, says Sir F. M. Eden, "this will create a jealousy of France, which will attach the Americans more closely to us." This doctrine has not been very fully exemplified in the case of Holland. If we were ready to lend the Americans aid, then, indeed, the cession of Louisiana would have been a happy circumstance; but we want peace, "peace and a large loaf," as the base rabble of Norwich replied to the arguments of Mr. Windham. Should there be any attempt, on the part of the Americans, to resist the French, the English ministry, so far from lending them aid, will be the first to protest against their resistance; nor should we be at all surprized, if His Majesty were to be advised to issue a declaration to that effect.

TO THE PUBLIC.

On Wednesday last CHARLES BELOE (son of the Rev. Wm. Beloe), a clerk in the General Post-Office; CHARLES WAGSTAFF, another clerk in that Office; and JOHN HARWOOD, an amanuensis to the Rev. Wm. Beloe and to the British Critic, were tried at the Sessions at Clerkenwell, for a riot committed at the house of Mr. Cobbett in Pall Mall.—They were convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine, the two former of £30 each, and the latter of £10, and were bound to keep the peace and to be of good behaviour for the space of two years. This brief notice would have sufficed; but, as the proceedings of the trial have been most shamefully misrepresented in the London Newspapers, we think it our duty to publish a faithful account of them, a duty which we shall discharge as soon as possible. In the mean time we think it right to observe, that, it appeared from the evidence of the Deputy Comptroller of the Foreign Post-Office, that neither of the two clerks had been for a moment suspended from their places or emoluments, since the commission of the crime, for which they were several weeks ago, indicted; and that a letter of Lord Auckland was shown in court, for the purpose of proving, that that crime had in no degree injured the character of the criminals. We do not say that his lordship so expressed himself, but the letter was shown to the prosecutor's counsel with a view to convince him that such was his lordship's opinion; and it does, we confess, appear somewhat strange, that men who had been committed to gaol, and who were afterwards indicted by the Grand Jury, should, nevertheless, still retain their places in a government office, under the controul of a nobleman, remarkable for his attention to business. Nor is our surprise, in this respect, diminished, when we contrast the conduct of his lordship with that of the Commissioners of the Excise, who instantly suspended an Exciseman that was taken up at the same time with Beloe and his associates, and who kept him suspended, 'till his innocence was ascertained by the decision of the Grand Jury.

☾ New Moon (1st. Quar. ○ F. Moon. ☾ last Quar.

The observations, (see p. 54) relative to Mr. William Huskisson, having, by a friend of that gentleman, been thought to contain certain statements and insinuations, injurious to Mr. Huskisson, and unfounded in fact, I requested this friend to furnish me with a memorandum, pointing out the errors, which he conceived me to have committed. This he very readily complied with, declaring, however, in the most positive manner, that his application to me was entirely an act of his own, and by no means at the desire or suggestion of the party or parties concerned. This memorandum I here insert.

“ Mr. Huskisson never was, directly or indirectly, either in the capacity of clerk (as stated in the Register of Saturday the 17th instant) or in any other capacity whatever, connected with any banking-house or commercial establishment of any description, either at Paris, or in any other quarter of the world.—He was not promoted to be a clerk in the Alien Office; but when the Alien Act was first passed in 1793, was appointed to superintend the execution of it (a situation held jointly with the Under Secretaries of State in the Home Department) with the necessary assistance of clerks, instead of being himself one of those clerks. In March 1795, he became Under Secretary of State, and continued in that situation until May 1801, when he obtained leave to retire. The rewards he has received were granted, it is presumed, for his services in this latter capacity. No Under Secretary of State, at least for a considerable number of years past, has retired without such a provision, and most of them have held at the same time with that situation, other offices of emolument. Mr. Huskisson has not enjoyed his pension from the period of its being granted, it being a contingent one to commence when he ceased to be Under Secretary of State, and to terminate whenever he might hold any other office or offices, of equal amount. As long as he remained in office he not only received nothing

“ on account of the pension, but the amount of the salary annexed to the agency of the Cape, of which he did the duty, was deducted from that to which he was entitled as Under Secretary of State, so that in fact no additional charge was incurred by that appointment. With respect to the agency of Ceylon, an appointment of some trouble and responsibility, attended also with some expense, it was given to Mr. Huskisson so lately that he has not at this hour received one farthing on account of it. The same may be said of his pension, owing in this latter case to the arrears of the Civil List; and the real value of it after paying fees and deductions can scarcely exceed £900 per annum. The provision, therefore, made for Mr. Huskisson can neither be considered unusual in itself, nor equal perhaps to what has been done in the case of any gentleman who preceded him in the office of Under Secretary of State, and held it an equal length of time. As Mr. Huskisson's birth is more than once mentioned in a particular manner, in the paper above alluded to, although perhaps no reflection was intended on that score, it may not be amiss to add, that he can scarcely feel it any mortification to avow that his father was nothing more than a country gentleman, or in other words, one of the honest yeomanry of England, who lived respected and beloved upon the estate he had inherited from his father, in the parish of Bushbury in Staffordshire, and which in the course of the entail, devolving at his death to Mr. Huskisson, placed him at least above dependance.”

As I have had no desire to misrepresent facts, so I have no inclination to rest under the charge of misrepresentation; and, therefore, I must trouble my readers with a few observations on this memorandum.

1. It appears (for I am by no means inclined to question the veracity of the writer of the memorandum), that Mr. Huskisson never was connected with any banking-house, or commercial establishment of any description, either at Paris or elsewhere, and, consequently, Lord Gower could not, as mentioned in the Register, find him "a banker's clerk at Paris." But, is this circumstance very material; and is not the mis-statement rather in favour of Mr. Huskisson than against him? I had always understood, that he was living, at Paris, with his uncle, who was an apothecary, and that he himself, followed the same business; but, having, just before the Register went to the press, been told, that he was a banker's clerk, and regarding that as somewhat the more reputable profession of the two, I adopted it in preference to the other. Since, however, I received the above memorandum I have made particular inquiry, and I am now fully convinced, that Mr. Huskisson's uncle was an apothecary, and that the nephew, sometimes at least, prepared the prescriptions, and visited the patients, in which latter office, it seems, he was first noticed by Lady Gower, in consequence of his attendance on some of her ladyship's female domestics. That he should be at Paris, without any occupation at all, appeared to me extremely improbable, and most persons will allow, that (with the exception of the learned and the warlike professions, to neither of which he ever belonged) I could not have fixed one less degrading than that in which I stated him to be; therefore, my mis-statement in this respect, though very immaterial, is, as I before observed, in favour of Mr. Huskisson rather than against him.

2. He was not "promoted to be a clerk in the Alien Office," but was, it seems, appointed to superintend the execution of the Alien Act, passed in 1793, a situation held jointly with the Under Secretaries of State in the Home Department, and having clerks under him, "instead of being himself one of those clerks." The real state of the case is this: Mr. Nepean was, when the Alien Law passed, Under Secretary of State in the Home Department, at the head of which was Mr. Dundas. Mr. N. could speak little or no French, and, therefore, it was necessary to have in the office some person capable of interpreting, translating, and, occasionally, writing in, that language. This was the employment of Mr. Huskisson, and I appeal to the reader whether I detract from the dignity of his situation in describing him to be "a clerk in the Alien Office." As to superintending the execution of the Alien Act, jointly with the Under Secretaries of State, I know not what to make of the phrase. The words have no definitive meaning, as they are here applied. That Mr. Huskisson was a subaltern to the Under Secretaries of State, I believe, his friend will not deny: what, then, could he be more than a clerk?

3. The pension and sinecures bestowed on him are represented as granted for services as Under Secretary of State, and are stated not to be greater in amount than the emoluments enjoyed by other Under Secretaries upon their retiring from office. In the first place, I by no means approve of the word retire as applied to Mr. Huskisson. "When he obtained leave to retire!!!" Would not one imagine, that the personage here spoken off were a duke, at least? "Obtained leave to retire"! In dudgeon, perhaps, because the royal ear was become deaf to his counsels? What did he retire for? Pensions and sinecures are, as far as relates to the subaltern offices of government, provided for men, who are, in a manner, worn out in the service, or who, in consequence of the new arrangements of a ministry, are displaced: they never were intended as a provision for those, who may choose to quit their offices. Because Mr. Dundas might think it necessary to resign, shall Mr. Huskisson be suffered to resign also? With all my heart, provided that he carries no pension with him; but, if he receives the public money, we have a right to follow him into his retreat. In fact, nothing can be more presumptuous than this affectation of obtaining leave to retire (on the part of such a person as Mr. Huskisson), on account of any opinions entertained in the Cabinet. —As to Mr. Huskisson having been, for the far greater part of the time, a mere clerk, I still persist in my assertion. He went with Mr. Dundas at the creation of the new office, and was promoted; but he never was an Under Secretary of State; if he had, he could not have been in Parliament at the same time with Mr. Frere. He might be called Under Secretary of State, he might have a salary suitable to such a situation; but, without an open and scandalous violation of the law, he could not be an Under Secretary of State; and, if not a Secretary, he must have been a clerk. The fact is, that the business transacted by him was not that of a Secretary of State. It had nothing in common with state affairs. He was the first person that filled the new and non-descript office; as to precedents, therefore, none can be found. But, were I to acknowledge him to have been an Under Secretary of State, I should still insist, that the provision made for him was, and is, all circumstances considered, totally unprecedented.

On whatever scale it is computed, it is out of all proportion, and must, by every candid man, be allowed to be a shameful waste of public money.

4. Never did I mean to say, or to insinuate, that Mr. Huskisson enjoyed his pension and sinecures during the time that he was in office; nor do I think that my words will bear any such interpretation. Indeed, upon a re-perusal of page 54 of the Register, I perceive, that it is absolutely impossible to understand me as having added the pension and sinecures to the emoluments of the office; for, I state the amount of the whole at £2,400; whereas with the addition of the official salary and emoluments, the total would have been £4,400, and perhaps much more. I meant to confine myself, and I think I did confine myself, to the emoluments received by Mr. Huskisson, since he "obtained leave to retire." I state that he has taken care to secure to himself £1,200 for life; that he is furthermore in the enjoyment of £600 a year for the Agency of Ceylon, and also £600 for the Agency of the Cape, which last he will, of course, lose, but which he will, however, enjoy from the time he "obtained leave to retire" 'till the last hour that we shall hold the Cape, and perchance for a few hours longer.—As to the pension being in arrear, does Mr. Huskisson's friend really suppose, that that circumstance will induce one to believe, that the pension is of uncertain value? And with regard to the subtraction on account of fees, &c. &c. what estate is there which is not liable to deductions, &c.? When Mr. Huskisson's friend talks of his real estate of £500 a year, he certainly means the full rent of it, undiminished by taxes and expenses. I did not state that Mr. Huskisson's pension amounted to so much net: I merely said it was a pension of £1,200 a year. It will be recollected too, that, it was not so much the positive as the comparative magnitude of his provision, which formed the subject of my complaint. It was not so much that £1,800 a year had been bestowed on Mr. Huskisson, as that he had obtained nearly as much again as the defender of Acre. If Mr. H.'s pension be in arrear, so is Sir Sidney Smith's; if the former be really worth no more than £900, the latter is worth no more than about £780. But, it is not pretended, that the agency suffers any considerable diminution, and, therefore, it is by no means unfair to conclude, that Mr. Huskisson receives from the public purse a reward of double the magnitude of that received by Sir Sidney Smith! The result of the enquiry is this: while

Mr. Huskisson was in office, he received, in various ways, about £3,000 a year; since he has "obtained leave to retire," he has hitherto received (or it is become due to him, which is the same thing) £2,400 a year; but, as the Agency of the Cape will, perhaps, drop off in nine or ten months after our final evacuation of it, his permanent receipt from the public will be £1,800.

5. Most assuredly no reflection on the birth of Mr. Huskisson was intended by me. I said his birth did not entitle him to such extraordinary favours; but, is it not evident, that I only meant to say, that he did not belong to the nobility or the gentry of the kingdom? I did not say, or insinuate, that his birth was disreputable: I said nothing that could render the explanation of his friend at all necessary; and, indeed, I am almost tempted to believe, that he has feigned a misconception of my words, for the purpose, not of defending Mr. Huskisson against any charge of dishonourable birth, but for that of inculcating a belief that his birth was honourable, that his immediate ancestors were of the gentry of England. With this view it undoubtedly is, that we are told, "His father was a COUNTRY GENTLEMAN, or, in other words, one of the HONEST YEOMANRY of England, from whom he received an estate, which placed him above dependance." Honest yeomanry are not only other words than country gentleman, but they convey quite another meaning. I am very willing to allow that Mr. Huskisson's ancestors were yeomen, and as to their honesty, no one, as far as I know, ever presumed to call it in question; but, as to country gentleman, especially when spoken of at Whitehall or at St. Stephen's, I can by no means give that title to a farmer of £500 a year. This income, it seems, placed Mr. Huskisson "above dependance." What proof have we of this? Is it to be found in the records of the Alien Office, or of the war department? Is it to be found in the list of pensions or of sinecure places? Is it to be found in the circumstances under which the pension was obtained, or in the motives from which the tenure of it was changed? As a farmer, as a yeoman, indeed, he might have been above dependance; but, I imagine it would be very difficult to point out one person in all England more dependant than he now is, if unmeritedly living upon the public money can be called dependance.

Having thus endeavoured to obviate the objections made to any statement respecting Mr. Huskisson, I must beg leave to say, that I cannot but regard those objections as being rather vexatious; and that, instead of complaints on account of my hostility, I really should have expected thanks for my forbearance. Mr. Huskisson must know, that I could have touched upon several subjects, which I have even now passed over in silence. The very positive assertion, that he has never been concerned, either at Paris or elsewhere, in any commercial affairs might easily have been combatted, and that too with the introduction of circumstances not altogether uninteresting to the public. I have said nothing about the secret history of the pension: "Tiens, Gil Blas, je te donne cela pour cadeau de nocces." Mr. Dundas is no very feeble imitator of that faithful friend and generous patron, the Duke of Lerma; nor do I think it is at all over-rating either the talents or integrity of Mr. Huskisson to say, that he, in certain points, bears a strong resemblance to honest Gil Blas. There was, unfortunately, no parliament in Spain, or, to render the semblance more complete, Gil might possibly have been a law-giver.

Let it not be forgotten, that I, a long time, forbore to meddle with Mr. Huskisson and his emoluments, and that I was at last provoked to break silence by nothing short of an attempt to thrust him into parliament in opposition to the brother of Sir Sidney Smyth. It cannot be supposed that I had, till the other day, been ignorant of Mr. Huskisson's history; yet, till then, I never did write a word on the subject; nor should I have done it at all, had he been content to use his acquisitions for any other purposes than those of a public and political nature. To attempt to force him upon the country as a member of parliament, was the very last excess of indelicacy: it was an act of which no one would have suspected Mr. Pitt; and, indeed, it is said, that it ought to be ascribed solely to Mr. Dundas, whose domineering influence has, in too many instances, thwarted the will of his more scrupulous and less selfish colleague. What are the motives of Mr. Dundas in heaping favours upon Mr. Huskisson, I shall not, in this place, enquire; but, that they are very powerful no one will doubt, and I am far from being certain, that they may not become the subject of some subsequent page of the Register.

WM. COBBETT.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Memel, June 12.—To shew honour to our distinguished visitors, the town has had two triumphal arches erected; one before the gate of Lieban, representing a portico, the entablature of which was supported by four groups of pillars, and in the frieze the inscription—Alexandro et Frederico Wilhelmis a Deo junctis civitas. In the middle of the attic were the arms of the town—a sarage leaning on an anchor, wreathed with flowers. The other triumphal entry, at the end of Linden street, was formed by two obelisks entwined with garlands of flowers, one bearing the Russian, the other the Prussian flag. On the 10th his Imperial Majesty arrived, under the name of a "Comte de Russie," at Bolangen, the last frontier town of Russia, three German miles hence, where he was received by Comte Kalkreath, General of Cavalry, who accompanied his Majesty to the entrance of the town. On the way from Bolangen to Bommels, half a mile off, the royal state coach with eight horses, was ready to receive him; he was accompanied by several piquets of hussars, placed there for the purpose, and thence to the town by a squadron of dragoons, and by the merchants' guard of this place. His Majesty did not accept the state coach, but remained in his chariot, attended only by an Adjutant. His Imperial Majesty had put on the Insignia of the Order of the Black Eagle. He was saluted from the camp with 100 guns. His Majesty the King, ornamented with the Russian Order of St. Andrew, rode in the mean time on horseback, about a quarter of a mile from the town. On perceiving the Emperor's chariot, his Majesty dismounted, as did the Emperor likewise, and the two illustrious personages welcomed and embraced each other. The Emperor then mounted one of the King's led horses, and the two Monarchs rode side by side, followed by their united suites (all on horseback) into the town. Before the house of Mr. Lorck, where the King and Queen were lodged, Her Majesty the Queen came to meet the illustrious guest, and surprised him with an embrace, which the Emperor returned by pressing her Majesty's hand to his lips. He remained to dinner with their Majesties, and about four o'clock, accompanied by the Royal Princes, went to his apartments at the Merchant Glagon's, in Linden-street. Before entering, his Imperial Majesty passed twice before the guard of one hundred and twenty-seven men and four officers, and inspected the grenadiers with visible satisfaction. He then presented Major Von Bulow with a gold snuff-box set in pearls, and each of the officers commanding the guard with a gold ditto, and each private with a ducat. He conversed much with Major Von Bulow, concerning the arming and equipment of the Prussian grenadiers, and requested that the greatest part of the guard might be dismissed; which was immediately complied with, only 50 men being left for this purpose. His Imperial Majesty passed the evening also with their Majesties, the bands of three regiments performing Turkish music before the house all the time. On Friday morning he was present at the review, at the end of which his Majesty the King placed himself at the head of the infantry, saluted the Emperor, and then rejoined him; on which the whole line passed before the two Sovereigns. The Emperor dined again with the King, and afterwards both, accompanied by the Queen, who rode between them, all three on horseback, took a ride to the camp, and afterwards through a great part of the town. To-day their Majesties have again dined together, and in the evening are expected to honour with their presence a ball, given by the Company of Merchants trading abroad. The proprietor of the house where his Imperial Majesty is lodged receives 200 roubles per diem. The price of all provisions is immensely risen. The ladies of the Prussian court have had the honour of a visit from the Emperor, under the name of Comte de Russie. Their Royal Highnesses the Princes Henry and William, the King's brothers, have received from him the Russian Order of St. Andrew, and different noblemen of the Court other Russian Orders: in like manner the King has honoured several persons of the Russian Court.

June 16.—The departure of his Majesty the Emperor of Russia was at first appointed for the 15th instant; it did not, however, take place till to-day, when, between ten and eleven o'clock, he set out on his return, under the discharge of 100 pieces of cannon, with the same retinue, and in the same order as he arrived. About noon the King and Queen of Prussia likewise left this city, amidst the loudest acclamations and blessings of the populace, and proceeded to Tilse, whence they will go by the way of Takehmen and Rastenbergl to Jerutren.

The tour of the Emperor of Russia through his States resembles a triumphal procession.

St. Domingo.—The present state of the French colony, in this island, may be guessed at by the following letter from an American merchant, dated Cape François, 25th April, 1802.

Dear Sir,

I am about to depart from this iniquitous hole, consequently this will be the last letter you will receive from me for some time—then “Ye infernal Gods, who rule the shades below, “Chaos and Phlegethon, the realms of woe,

“Grant what I have heard, I may to light expose,
“Secrets which earth, and night, and hell inclose.”

My last to you was on the 5th inst. per the brig Favourite, Captain Brown—that morning Mr. Couriée, a venerable and respectable planter, stood upon the pillory, exposed to the scorching heat of the sun for six hours in the market place, and imprisoned for months in a dungeon, for demanding (as I was informed) the services of one of his former slaves, which he had recognized in Paul Louverture's detachment.—This worthy old man is rich, and also a royalist; they expected that rather than remain so exposed, he would part with a few of his dollars—he however disappointed them.

9th. General Leclerc returned from Port Republican, and I believe the following morning, Mr. Lear waited on him, no doubt to congratulate his Excellency on his safe return. But lo! before the good-natured man had time to make a congé, he was told his functions as Consul were no longer valid. This salute was to be sure a sideration to the feelings of Mr. L. who had hitherto done every thing in his power to please: a harsh measure, considering that he was very smooth, and very docile in submitting to all the imperious mandates, that have been issued respecting the Americans.—Towards evening the arms were pulled down—and the hotel shut.

12th. His Britannic Majesty's ship Cerberus, Captain M'Namara, came in, with a letter from Admiral Campbell, cruising off the Mole, to the Captain-General, and was saluted accordingly.

13th. Captain Rogers, late of the United States navy, and Captain Davidson, of the ship St. Domingo Packet, were arrested, and confined, first, in a dungeon, and afterwards at liberty, to mix with the common vagabonds in the prison yard. The allegations against these unfortunate gentlemen, have not yet officially transpired; there are however many surmises in circulation, respecting the former, which ought not to preponderate with his friends on the Continent. The real cause of their barbarity towards him, is in consequence of a letter which was written to a person of the name of Clemon, who at present acts as Harbour Master. Words took place, and a challenge ensued, which Clemon refused, but applied to the Commander in Chief for protection. Rather honourable to be sure! however, when Captain Rogers goes back, I presume from his well-known courage, the author of the letter will have to lament his officious rashness, and malicious conduct. Regarding the latter, the general says, "the name of "his ship has given uneasiness to the "army." They are denied pen and ink, and the sight of their friends.—Captain D. is in a bad state of health, and probably cannot long sustain so much cruelty. The general's conduct towards these gentlemen is flagitious and insulting, and may be compared to those of a mischievous boy, who tortures and mutilates a wretched animal, and smiles at its agonies; had the subtle general the good fortune to be born in Turkey, with the same education and bent of temper, his name might have been handed down to posterity as a notable Bashaw, and his merits displayed by the number of his tails. I am aware he aims at greatness of character—this I am afraid he will never attain. I am however ready to pronounce him an extraordinary minion of caprice. He may, it is true, at a future period (if he subdues the Cosmopolites) be called an uncommon man. But he will never be considered as a great man, or a great general; his endeavours to hand down his name to future ages, may be about equally successful with those of the antient candidate for fame, who, to make himself talked of by posterity, burned the temple of Ephesus. It may however stand conspicuous on the historic page of the colonies; but it must be with the unenviable distinction of a character, possessed with the most arbitrary and oppressive spirit that ever was invested with delegated authority—He who should turn over the pages, in which are transcribed his mandates, arrêtés, and proclamations, would experience some affection of his risible muscles, was not his disposition for mirth repressed by indignation; and did not false professions and ridiculous assertions, excite the strongest emotions of contempt for the duplicity and detestation of the principles of the author, and those employed under his authority.

One instance, I fancy will suffice to elucidate their want of integrity, even in the most solemn engagements. Captain Fuller, of the brig Constellation, arrived with a cargo of lumber prior to the destruction of the Cape, which he afterwards sold by contract to the French contractor, at 72 dollars per M. but they would not pay him more than 30 dollars; the contractor's motive was no doubt to pocket the difference; he has often asserted that he came from France to make his fortune. Nothing can be done without a bribe: for every 1000 dollars there is a poundage of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. besides 1 per cent. for provisions, and other deductions. There is another instance which I cannot help noticing: the ship Ann, Captain Terry, of New-York, arrived here about a month before the Cape was destroyed, in ballast, to load a cargo of coffee; the Captain had for his private adventure ten kegs of gunpowder, which were regularly reported at the Custom-house, both before, and after the French arrived; the magnanimous General Boyer granted permission to have them landed; they were accordingly deposited in the arsenal; the government were to have it at a certain price, provided they wanted it.

17th February. All the ports in the island were declared in a state of blockade, the Cape and Port Republican excepted, the 3d article declares all warlike stores, brought after that period liable to condemnation. 8th March she was seized, and on the 18th April condemned. A copy of the condemnation I have obtained, which, for its modesty, resembles the countenance of its author.

EQUALITY!!!

In the name of the French Government.

ARRÊTÉ.

The ship Hanna, of New-York, arrived here with a cargo of powder, it is evident she came to supply the rebels with the means of supporting themselves against the authority of the mother country.

In consequence of, and after all the commercial regulations which prohibits the trade of powder,

The General in Chief orders!!!

Art. I. The ship Hanna, of New-York, is confiscated; the cargo and hull shall be sold, and the fund arising from the sale, shall be lodged in the military chest.

Art. II. The Commissary charged with the sale of the ship Monten, shall proceed to that of the ship Hanna.

Art. III. Merchandize remaining on board shall be landed, and immediately after, the sale shall be made known by public notice, and shall take place ten days after the publication.

Art. IV. The hull of the vessel shall also be sold, if it is not found to be useful to the army.

Art. V. General Ledoyen, President of the Commission, is charged with the execution of the present arrêté; which the Chief of the Etat-Major will cause to be printed.

Dated, Head-Quarters at the Cape, 24th Germinal, 10th year of the French Republic.

The General in Chief,

Leclerc.

Paris, July, 14.

A PROCLAMATION.

The Consuls of the Republic to the French.

"Frenchmen,

"The 14th of July began, in 1789, the new destiny of France. After 13 years of labour, the 14th of July returns still more dear to you, and more august to posterity. You have conquered every obstacle, and your destiny is fulfilled. Within, all acknowledge the Empire of Equality: without, there is no longer any enemies who menace your safety and your independence; no longer any French colony refusing to submit to the laws, without which it cannot exist as a colony. In the bosom of your ports, commerce calls forth your industry, and offers you the riches of the universe. In the interior, the genius of the republic is fruitful in all the germs of prosperity.

"Frenchmen, that this epoch may be for us and for our children, the epoch of a durable happiness; that this peace may be embellished by the union of virtue, learning, and the arts; that institutions suitable to our character may environ our laws with an impenetrable intrenchment; that youth, eager to receive instruction, may learn in our lyceas to know their duties and their rights; that the history of our misfortunes may preserve us from the repetition of past errors; and that this edifice of grandeur, raised by the courage of our citizens, may be preserved in the bosom of wisdom and of concord:—

"Such is the wish and hope of the French government: second its efforts, and the felicity of France will be as immortal as its glory.

"Buonaparté, The First Consul."

"Buonaparté, First Consul of the Republic, orders that the above proclamation be inserted in the Bulletin of Laws, published, printed, and posted up in all the departments of the Republic.

Extract of a Letter from General Leclerc, dated St. Domingo, 11th June, to the Minister of Marine.

"Citizen Minister,

"I informed you by one of my last dispatches, of the pardon which I was disposed to grant to General Toussaint. This ambitious man has not ceased to conspire secretly since the moment I pardoned him. He only surrendered because Generals Christophe and Dessalines saw that he had deceived them, and refused to carry on the war any longer; but seeing that he was abandoned by them, he endeavoured to organize an insurrection among the cultivators, and to make them rise en masse. The information I received from all the Generals, even from General Dessalines, of his conduct since his surrender, left me no doubt upon the subject. I intercepted the letters he had written to a man of the name of Fontaine, who was his agent at the Cape. These letters prove beyond a doubt, that he was conspiring to regain his former influence in the colony. He placed considerable reliance upon the sickness which prevailed in the army. Under these circumstances, I did not think it right to give him time to effect his criminal purposes. I ordered him to be arrested: this was not easy to be accomplished; it was nevertheless effected by the skilful measures of General Brunet and of Citizen Ferrari, my Aid-de-Camp, whom I had entrusted with this business.

"I have sent to France, with all his family, this man, who is so profoundly perfidious, and who with so much hypocrisy, has done us so much evil. The government will see what is fit to be done with him.

"The arrest of General Toussaint has given rise to new assemblies of the rebels: two chiefs of the insurgents have been already arrested, whom I have ordered to be shot; and one hundred of his principal adherents have been also arrested; a part of whom I have put on board the frigate La Muiron, which I have ordered to sail for the Mediterranean. The remainder have been disposed of in the different ships of the squadron.

"I am continually occupied in the reorganization of the colony, with as little force as possible; but the excessive heat, and the maladies which afflict us, render the labour extremely difficult. I expect with impatience the month of September, when the season will restore our activity.

"The departure of Toussaint has caused a general joy at the Cape.

"The Commissary of Justice, Montperon, is dead.—The Colonial Prefect, Benezech, is dangerously ill. The Adjutant-Commandant, Dampierre, who was a young officer of great promise, is also dead.

"I have the honour to salute you,

"Leclerc."

The General in Chief to the Minister of Marine.

Head-Quarters, Basse Terre, June 8.

After giving a detailed account of operations to the 1st, as in the preceding dispatch, the General proceeds to give an account of subsequent operations.

General Joubert pursued the blacks who evacuated Fort Charles, with 700 men, and came up with them the moment in which they joined the intrenched post of Dollet, which was carried at the point of the bayonet. A part of the negroes saved themselves in the Mornes of the point of the old fort; 300 of the 15th hemmed them in. The 400 men remaining of General Gobert, proceeded to Grande Terre, whither the rebel chiefs, Ignace and Palerme, had returned with a new assemblage of armed blacks, to massacre, they said, the white inhabitants, and burn the habitations, which they had already done in Capesterre, the richest part of the island.

The passage of the river Salée had been vigorously defended by the troops of the 37th and 82d left at Grande Terre, but they could not check the too numerous enemy; every hour they increased in strength, got possession even of the redoubt Bembriche, which fortunately they found disarmed, and marched to Point-à-Pitre. General Gobert joined to the troops come with him from Basse Terre, all those left at Grande Terre, and the men of the National Guard, proceeded against the enemy, and forced them to concentrate themselves in Fort Bembriche; the cannon threw them into confusion; our brave soldiers, carried away with the desire of conquest, penetrated into the redoubt, made a horrible carnage, and in an instant all the brigands were either dispersed or destroyed. Ignace was found among the dead. The chief of brigade, Pelage, continued during this action to give proof of a courage bordering on heroism.

The 5th and 6th of June were employed in rallying the troops, and reconnoitring towards the Parc and Matonbas, excellent retreats of the insurgents, where the dispositions they had added to the natural defences, appeared to enable them perfectly to refuse any disadvantageous contest, and to spread themselves, by sudden irruptions, through every part of Basse Terre.

It was necessary, then, to increase our efforts of every kind. The resolute enemy whom we had beaten with so much trouble, determined to employ their last resources, which rage and despair had rendered very powerful. The French soldiers acquired also strong resources, from the desire of supporting their reputation, and of proving that they are irresistible, when they are directed to punish, and to quell rebellion.

The enemy had their advanced post in front of the habitation of Grichard, at the top of the angle formed by the Black River, and the River des Pères, the banks of which are steep, and more than fifty feet deep; their mass being placed at the vast habitation of Auglemont, defended by rivers and fortified by parapets, armed with cannon and palisades, an attack in front was soon seen to be impossible; it was necessary then to divide our force, and to endeavour to adopt our measures so as not to be forced to attack separately.

On the 5th in the morning the 2d battalion of the 66th set off from Legret, and by roads on dreadful precipices, they cleared the Mornes Houel, Colin, and the habitation Lasalle, from whence they drove the enemy, and arrived, in pursuing them, at Presbytere.

The 3d battalion of the 66th ascended by the Morne Louis, came up with the enemy, drove them before them, gained with inconceivable ardour, the Morne Fisc-Macieux, defended by artillery which they destroyed.

The Chief of Battalion Delacroix, was then struck by a mortar. I immediately sent to replace him the Chief of Squadron Maucoulable, my aid-de-camp; but the brave Delacroix wished at this glorious moment to remain near his battalion, which, proud of having him still with it, crossed the river of Peres, and reached, after a long train of obstacles surmounted, the position of Presbytere, constantly driving the enemy upon his centre at Auglemont.

The reserve of grenadiers, commanded by my aid-de-camp, Capt. Crabbe, attempted a very useful diversion by an effort to arrive at Grichard by the Mountain Constantin, but those who were there surrendered without firing a shot, and Capt. Crabbe had his horse killed under him. The grenadiers were then forced to abandon the enterprize. I was then sure that the enemy could not effect his retreat by this latter passage, which our grenadiers defended. We were also well assured, that the posts of Grichard, and the troops of Auglemont, could not avoid an engagement with the two battalions of the 66th, which had joined upon the heights of Presbytere.

After a moment's rest, these two battalions marched with mutual emulation in columns, against Auglemont. They braved, for a quarter of an hour, a shower of balls and bullets without being able to return the fire. Nothing could stop them, and several had already entered the entrenchments, when the enemy, pushed to extremity, set fire to their powder and blew themselves up, to the number of three hundred, among whom was Delgresse. This scene was shocking. Each party stood stupified for a moment, but we soon thought of taking advantage of the disorder which such an event always occasions, and the day terminated by the entire destruction of all the enemy who escaped the explosion.

We lost in this day the advanced posts of two columns, and Lieutenant Faquiant, who entered Auglemont the moment before it blew up. Captain Petit was severely wounded. This last affair has destroyed the revolt in its source.

The Chiefs are killed. All the rest have been disarmed, have submitted, and returned to labour.

I salute you with respect.

Ricbeance.

MINISTRY OF MARINE.

The General in Chief to the Minister of Marine.

"Head-Quarters at the Cape, June 15.

"The colony continues to enjoy the greatest tranquillity. Some assemblages which were forming, have been dispersed. The letters annexed from the Generals who command in the different departments, will inform you to what a length that miserable Toussaint carried his deceit. Instead of keeping his promise to remain quiet, not to meddle in any business, or leave his plantation, he went in the night into different points of the island, contrived plots, and held meetings. He had an account sent to him constantly of the effects of sickness upon the army, and watched its progress with satisfaction. I have cut short all his plots. Toussaint should have arrived before this at Brest. I have arrested the Generals who conspired with him. As for the rest, the Cape is rebuilding with surprizing activity. All the inhabitants of the Spanish part, whom Toussaint's invasion had driven away, are returning home. Diseases make some ravages at the Cape; but, fortunately, they are not general in the island. Citizen Benzech is dead. I regret in him the loss of a civil officer, who joined to long experience, zeal, and great devotion for the government. I recommend his family to you, as they appear to stand in need of your assistance; for, notwithstanding the important functions which he filled, he died poor.

"I have the honour to salute you,

"Leclerc."

The General in Chief of the Army of Guadeloupe to the Minister of War.

"Basseterre, May 25, 1802.

"Citizen Minister,

"I have only delayed for so long a period to give you an account of what has passed here, in order that I might, when I inform you that we had found rebels to combat, announce to you at the same time, that they were vanquished.

"On the 7th, we effected our disembarkation at Gosier, and at the Port of Point-à-Pitre. At the latter place we had every reason to believe that we should meet with resistance from the batteries of l'Islet-à-Cochon, and those of the Forts of Fleur d'Épée and l'Union.

"Two ships anchored before the Gosier, and disembarked their troops, who immediately afterwards were ordered to march upon the Morne Mascatte, in order to take the Fort Fleur d'Épée in the rear, and cut off its communication with the redoubts Bimbridge and Stivenson. The troops disembarked at the port of the Point, were to march to the River Salée, to take possession of the Fort de la Victoire, and then of the Fort l'Union.

"All our dispositions were, however, useless; they were expecting us on the quay, where they received us with cries of "Vive la République! Vive Buonaparté!" —The troops formed themselves on the Place de la Victoire, where I found Pelage, who assured me of the entire submission of the whole island. I ordered him to deliver up all his posts at the Forts of Fleur d'Épée, Union, and la Victoire, and also the redoubts Bimbridge and Stivenson. He promised me that he would give orders in consequence, and also to assemble under the redoubt Stivenson all his troops in this part of the island, and which I wished to review the same evening.

"The French troops assembled upon the Place la Victoire, under the Fort of that name, where the detachments were formed which were to occupy the different Forts, and which set off for that purpose. A moment after, I was informed that Ignace, the Commandant of the Fort of la Victoire, would not suffer the troops I had sent to enter the Fort. I ordered them to enter at the pas de charge, and to make prisoners of Ignace and his troops. The Commandant of the detachment beat the charge, but Ignace retreated with his troops by a gate opposite to that by which we entered.

"During this time I proceeded with the rest of the troops under Fort Stivenson, the rendezvous assigned for the assembling of the black troops. The day had disappeared, and, in spite of the obscurity of the night, I perceived, that a great number of black soldiers were spread about the country under arms. It then occurred to me, what I had often heard said, that Pelage was a traitor. Having arrived at the place of rendezvous, I found Pelage, who informed me that many of his officers, and a great number of his soldiers, had deserted him. I joined, however, those whom I found there, and spoke to them in terms suited to the occasion.

"Little satisfied with what I had seen amongst these troops, and with the desertion of others, I decided to embark those whom I had with me, in the night, and I informed them that I wished to have them with me in proceeding to Basse-Terre.

"On the next day I sent 600 men by land towards les Trois Rivières, and re-embarked 1500 men in the frigates; but the Port being like a mouse-trap, a ship cannot make its way out, except when it is calm. A calm does not take place sometimes for several days, and is generally of so little duration, that rarely more than one vessel can get out. We were obliged therefore to transport the troops on board the ships anchored off Gosier, and much time being thus lost, added to contrary winds, we did not arrive before Basse-Terre until the 10th at noon. The discharges of cannon directed against us, left us no longer in doubt as to the situation of affairs. Being ready, however, either for peace or for war, we lost no time in disembarking.

"At the first discharge of cannon, I sent a canoe with a letter to Pelage, borne by an officer of the colony.—Not seeing him return, the troops, which were placed in the chaloupes, rowed towards the shore, and landed a little beyond the mouth of the River Duplessis, under the fire of the batteries and musquetry. The valour of the troops was conspicuously displayed on this occasion, and I assure you they had much to do, to gain, during the day, the right bank of the River des Peres.

"During the night the troops all assembled on this bank, and at day-break they did not march, but run at the enemy. The position of the enemy on the left bank of the river, was agreed on all hands to be a very fine one, and the rebels were well armed. Their position was, however, forced in ten minutes; a part of the revolvers threw themselves into Fort St. Charles, and another part gained the Mornes on our left: we pursued them towards Galion and the Bridge de Nosièrre.

"General Serisia, who remained at Grande Terre, having had orders to assemble what troops he could in that part, now left what force he thought indispensably necessary for the maintenance of tranquillity in the country, and with the battalion of the 15th, which had come by land from Petit Bourg to Trois Rivières, joined us by les Palmiste, and le Val Canard. Until then, we could not undertake any thing against the Fort.

"This junction being effected, we disembarked the cannon from the ships, and after inconceivable difficulties, having to drag them up very steep mountains, we at length formed a battery of 30 pieces of cannon, which was enabled to act on the 21st. On the 22d, at seven in the evening, the Fort was evacuated by the rebels, who profited by the non execution of my orders, by which 400 men were to have been placed on the left bank of the Galion, for the purpose of taking them prisoners.

"The army in consequence pursued this mob, which is now scattered through all the woods and mornes. Their Chiefs are Delgresse, Massuteau, Ignace, Gedeon, Palerne, Kironanne, &c.

"Some habitations are burnt, but there are no longer disorderly assemblies. I can now maintain my troops in the communes, and easily keep down all the brigands.

"In the affair of Basse-Terre, the army had 300 wounded, and about 100 killed.

"Many officers of all ranks have distinguished themselves. I shall take care to make them known to you in my next dispatch, and also to transmit to you the names of the killed and wounded.

"Rear-Admiral Ebnvet will give you, no doubt, the details respecting the squadron.

I do not think that the Rear-Admiral can make his squadron ready for sea in less than 15 days.

"Health and respect,
"Ricepance."

The Principal Commissary of Marine at Bourdeaux, has received the following letter from Citizen Benezech, the Colonial Prefect at St. Domingo. It is dated 12th May.

"I thank you, Citizen, for having transmitted to me the treaty of peace; it had, however, reached us by means of an advice-boat, which the minister sent out.—You will learn with pleasure, the complete pacification of this colony, in consequence of the submission of Toussaint, Christophe, and all the rebel chiefs. The town of the Cape is rebuilding with great activity, and its commerce is returning, and the coasting trade of the colony, which was suspended by the war, has recommenced.

"Benezech."

Antwerp, July 15.—The Onslow, a small brig, is just arrived in our port from Newcastle, laden with coals, being the first arrival of this kind since government granted their importation.

We have the most flattering intelligence from our Deputies in Paris, respecting our port: they have been graciously received by the First Consul, and promised every thing they could desire, that may tend to the prosperity of this port. Nay, he even declared, at the conference held with them, that it was his intention to extend all the privileges and aid to Antwerp, of which it was susceptible, for bringing it to its ancient splendour. We therefore expect the like privileges which have been just granted to Marseilles.

The Deputies from Havre, who are labouring with might and main to disappoint our aspiring hopes, had the mortification of getting a refusal of their petitions; they having had an audience about the same time.

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES.

The following article is taken from the Demerara newspapers of the 28th May last.—Colonel Hislop has received, by the last packet, a letter from Lord Hobart, one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, of which the following copy he delays not in giving, for the information generally of those to whom it applies.

COPY.

Downing Street, April 2, 1802.

Sir,—It being the intention of his Majesty that lands should be granted at Trinidad, upon very favourable terms, to such British subjects as may be inclined to remove to that island with their negroes from the colonies which are shortly to be restored to the Batavian Republic; I am to desire that you will make this intention generally known to the British subjects resident in Demerara, and acquaint them that the specific terms upon which such grants are to be made, will very shortly be communicated to Governor Picton, who will, at the same time, receive instructions for carrying the intentions of government into execution.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient humble Servant,

Hobart.

A most outrageous and alarming affray took place in the market-place of Hull, on Saturday evening, originating in a dispute respecting the price of green peas, a cart load of which a dealer in vegetables having purchased at the rate of 4d. per peck, attempted to retail to the people at an advance to 6d. or 7d. Irritated by this, the mob immediately destroyed the peas, and then proceeding to open hostility, overturned the stalls, without discrimination, of every person in the market.—Meeting with little or no opposition, the shops of the butchers next became their object: several of these they forced open, and plundered the contents, which were carried away by men, women, and children, some of whom being apprehended, were conveyed to the house of correction. Finding that several of their companions were in confinement, they attempted to rescue them by breaking open the doors of the Guildhall; which proving ineffectual, they turned their attention to the windows, every one of which they broke with the most determined fury.

Extract of a Letter from Edinburgh.

An occurrence in our playhouse on Monday last pleased me much. Monsieur of France came there, for the first time since his return to Edinburgh. He came privately—into a private box. The house rose up, and received him like one of our own princes—clapped and applauded—Called for God save the King—The Prince behaved as became him. He appeared deeply affected, but preserved the dignity of his character. The plaudits were renewed several times: people seemed to regret the appearance of the actors, and at the end of the play, when the Prince rose to go away, the house again rose up and saluted him in the kindest manner. The Prince told Mr. Mannors next day that he never had received an accueil half so affectionate in any part of Europe—it overcame him, and he never will forget it.

I am vastly pleased with this effusion of Caledonian hospitality. It forms a most honourable contrast with the cold and really ungracious reception those unfortunate Princes met with, even in every Court of Germany—

Nec tam aversus equos nostris sol jungit ab urbe.*

I was happy in seeing this welcome so universal and so hearty—there seemed no exception; the gallery as much as the boxes or pit. This, I think, looks comfortable.—The Prince is also much delighted with the continued visits of all ranks to see a fine picture of Mme. Elizabeth. He had put it in his closet—but it was viewed, by all who had permission, with so much sympathy and respect, that he brought it into a public room. Mme. Elizabeth was indeed a noble woman—a heroine and a saint. She and the poor Princess Lamballe were, I think, the most exalted characters for heroic attachment which that stage, so fertile in great virtues as well as horrid vices, has exhibited.—Mme. Lamballe, after getting safe to London, when she heard that the poor Queen was stopped at Varènes, went back to Paris; and went into prison with the Queen—the mean envious wretches could not bear the glare of this dazzling affection, and dragged the Princess to a separate prison. Her murderer, I am shocked to hear, has lately been caressed and rewarded by some of the thoughtless nobility of this kingdom! Good God! where will this end?

I am forgetting myself—but, one is disposed to say with his Grace of Canterbury, Hæc quanto melius tui meminisse, &c.

The following letter, addressed to the publisher of the Aberdeen Journal, appeared in his paper of Wednesday se'nnight:—

“ Sir, Duff-House, 11th July, 1802.

“ As nothing is more meritorious than the rigid attention of clergymen to their duty, I desire you will be so good as insert the inclosed letter, which I received yesterday, in your paper; for although I am informed it has been very industriously circulated in their neighbourhood, yet I think it will be gratifying to the authors, that the public at large should benefit by it.

“ I have the more satisfaction that I settled one of the reverend gentlemen on a crown presentation, translating him from a parish he was desirous to leave, where I understood he had met with gross and unmerited abuse.

“ The fact is, I was at Mar Lodge early in May, to drink goat-whey. A labourer went from Rothiemay with the necessaries of life, and should have been there on Saturday, but, from never having travelled in that country before, and the horrid state of the road, he was on it on Sunday. On hearing of the circumstance, I sent one of my servants to the Rev. Mr. Farquarson, of Coldstone, requesting that gentleman to excuse the man, and that he would have the goodness to state his situation to the parish. I shall only add that it is a great blessing the worthy clergyman, the labourer, and myself are accountable to a much higher power than any great Lord or great man on earth.

“ I am, Sir, yours, &c.

“ Fife.”

“ My Lord,

“ It is with great concern that we subscribing find ourselves called upon, not only from the duty of our sacred functions, but to satisfy the imperious calls and importunities of our several sessions and people, to represent to your lordship that on Sunday the 16th of May last, a servant with a loaded cart belonging to you passed through our several parishes, and through some of them even in time of divine worship.

“ To pretend to describe the heinousness of the crime of breaking the Sabbath Day, especially in these times of scepticism, infidelity, and impiety, would be an insult to your lordship's understanding. Suffice it, therefore, to say, that it is expected your lordship will have the goodness to signify your contrition to our several kirk sessions through which your cart passed on said day, for having given such offence to the religious and well disposed part of the community.

"We feel ourselves much hurt to be obliged to make this communication, but respect for your lordship induced us to it, before we took any other step. And the commands of our Lord allow no distinction of persons.

"We have the honour to be very respectfully, my Lord, your Lordship's most obedient, and most humble servants.

"Charles M^r Hardy."

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

The elections are yet the principal object in the domestic concerns of this country. We shall, when they are all closed, give a general view of the result; but we cannot, in the mean time, forbear to notice a few of the more prominent circumstances. In Kent the triumph of the jacobins has been complete; in any other point of view the rejection of Sir Edward Knatchbull is of no consequence. In Norfolk the poll has been closed. Mr. Wodehouse is about 100 votes below his antagonist; but it is confidently expected that a scrutiny will bring him into Parliament. The Westminster election has ended in a way most humiliating to the boasting chairman of the Whig Club. His friends were, at the close of the poll, so intent upon carrying off the hustings, that they absolutely forgot to carry off "the man of the people," whom they left to walk to the Shakespeare Tavern, where, with a heart ready to burst, he blubbered out his complaints of neglect. The words "not chair me as usual," occur no less than thirteen times during a very short and interrupted speech, made on that melancholy occasion. In Middlesex, Sir Francis Burdett's mob are extremely noisy, but his freeholders are rather backward. The road from Piccadilly to the hustings at Brentford is a scene of confusion and sedition, such as never was beheld, except in the environs of Paris, during the most dreadful times of the revolution. At Nottingham and Coventry, and several other places, the mob have been guilty of atrocities without number; but, we are by no means disposed to think, that, upon the whole, the elections have been more turbulent than formerly. Sir Francis Burdett and no Bastile, have not yet produced half so much noise and mischief as Wilkes and Liberty; and, indeed, when we reflect on the latter part of Wilkes's life, we do not despair, notwithstanding present appearances, of seeing Sir Francis a very tractable and even a very loyal gentleman. But, though the elections have not produced more violence than formerly, they have served to bring forth a species of malignity, which never before existed, and which is directed against established authority in all its branches. It is not, as heretofore, a contest between such a gentleman and such a gentleman; but between the high and the low, the rich and the poor. In many places, at least, almost all the rich are on one side, and all the poor on the other. This is the case in Middlesex, where, with the exception of her grace the Duchess of Devonshire, there is not, perhaps, a single well-dressed decent woman in the interest of Sir Francis Burdett. The road to Brentford is lined with ragged wretches from St. Giles's, bawling out, Sir Francis Burdett and no Bastile, and at the hustings there are daily some half dozen convicts, who have served out their time in the house of correction, employed in amusing the rabble with execrations on the head of Mr. Mainwaring. At Nottingham, the rabble seem to have assumed a very decisive character. They hoisted the tricoloured cockade, played ga ira, the Marsellois hymn, and other revolutionary tunes; and, indeed, were to all appearances and all purposes, a republican revolutionary mob.

On the continent of Europe we behold Kings passing their time in trifling visits, while the master and the mortal enemy of Kings is paving the way to power greater even than that which he already enjoys. The fête of the 14th of July was purely military. A mere day of grand parade, and an illumination at night. The proclamation of Buonaparté, on the occasion, contains little more than a string of bombastical phrases, without sense or meaning, but quite good enough for those, to whom it was addressed. The minister of the interior has addressed a circular letter to the prefects, in which he styles Paris "the capital of the world," an appellation which has given great offence to certain high-spirited persons in London, who triumphantly ask Mr. Chaptal: "where is your capital, credit, and commerce?" Perhaps Chaptal may tell them, that those things are not quite so necessary as they seem to imagine. Rome was "the capital of the " world" without invoices and bank-notes; and Carthage, had, at the time of her fall, an abundance of commerce and of wealth.

The rumours respecting a new constitution in France, may, probably, be well founded; but it is impossible to speak with any degree of certainty on the subject. Buonaparté will take care, that every change shall strengthen his power. The present government is a military despotism, but not quite free from the plagues of voting. While that right exists, to any extent, the government will never be safe; and we may safely predict, that whatever changes are contemplated, they have for their principal object the total abolition of the "elective franchise," that most precious jewel of the democratic casket, from which has issued more and greater mischiefs than ever the pagans attributed to the box of Pandora.

Toussaint has, it seems, really arrived in France, and one would have thought, that such a fact might have led the negro-loving politicians in this country to allow, that the blacks of St. Domingo have, somehow or other, been subdued; but, no! no acknowledgment of this sort will ever be extorted from this perverse generation.

The slaves in North Carolina have, according to the last accounts from America, made another humble attempt at insurrection, and the London Morning Chronicle has informed its enlightened readers, that the people in the state of New York are much alarmed, lest the slaves in that state, who are very numerous, should take the contagion! To calm the fears of the people of New York (if our work should reach them in time), we beg leave to remind them, that there are no less than five states, measuring about 600 miles across, between North Carolina and New York; and, further, that if the contagion should at last reach the slaves in the latter state, and if the whole of them should rise in insurrection, and advance in a single body, the number is too small to resist the marshal's posse. The fact is, there never can be any serious danger in the negro-insurrections in the American states. The number of slaves is so much inferior to that of the whites, that attempts to free themselves must always end in the death of the ring-leaders.

Intelligence respecting Turkey has so often, indeed so uniformly, proved false, that we distrust every thing we hear respecting that quarter of the globe. The German papers abound with rumours and speculations about the destiny of the Turkish dominions; but the only way not to be deceived by these prints is never to place any reliance on their contents.

The new treaty, which is said to have been formed between Prussia and France, is a subject of deep speculation with the politicians of the Continent. What its object can be we know not. Germany has, one would imagine, been plundered of every thing worth having.

In the commercial world, the destiny of Antwerp is the most interesting object. The merchants of Havre-de-Grace, as well as of several other sea-ports of France, have remonstrated against the opening of the Scheldt and the re-establishment of Antwerp; but these remonstrances have hitherto been ineffectual. The new establishments in this city are, of course, not very numerous; they are not, however, unimportant. Several Dutch houses have established branches here, and some English ones have done the same. Merchandize in considerable quantities has already been imported, and there seems to want nothing but a clear indication of the resolution of the Consul to encourage and protect the trade of that city. As to capital, it will be found in London, if not to be found any where else. It will be drawn from the same source that now feeds the French army in the West-Indies. The Spaniards, the Dutch, and the Americans have all, indeed, contributed towards the supplying of that army, but, the far greater part of the supplies have been paid for in London!

WEST-INDIA DOCKS.

A very melancholy accident happened at these Docks on Thursday evening by the explosion of the coffee dam, at Blackwall, which is more to be lamented for the loss of lives (among whom is Mr. Duff, brother to the Surveyor), than for any serious injury it has done to this magnificent work, truly an object of national pride. The following notice has been published, by the Dock Company, of this unfortunate event.

We have the authority to state, that the accident of the explosion of part of the coffee dam, at Blackwall, the effect of which has been much exaggerated by public report, although attended with the loss of five lives, and therefore a subject of extreme regret, has not produced any further injurious consequences to the works of the West-India Dock Company at the Isle of Dogs, nor will it in the least degree impede or delay their completion.

The Directors of the West-India Dock Company have ordered an inquiry into the situation of the families of the unfortunate sufferers, with a view to their relief.

FROM THE LONDON GAZETTE, 1802.

Whitehall, July 15.—The King has been pleased to give and grant unto the Right Hon. Convention between his Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, touching the Difficulties arising in the Execution of the 6th Article of the Treaty of 1794.

Difficulties having arisen in the execution of the 6th article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded at London, on the 4th day of November, 1794, between his Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, and in consequence thereof the proceedings of the commissioners under the 7th article of the same treaty having been suspended, the parties to the said treaty being equally desirous, as far as may be, to obviate such difficulties, have respectively named Plenipotentiaries to treat and agree, respecting the same: that is to say, his Britannic Majesty has named for his Plenipotentiary the Right Honourable Robert Banks Jenkinson, commonly called Lord Hawkesbury, one of his Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, and his principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, has named, for their Plenipotentiary, Rufus King, Esq. Minister Plenipotentiary of the said United States to his Britannic Majesty, who have agreed to and concluded the following articles:

Art. I. In satisfaction and discharge of the money which the United States might have been liable to pay in pursuance of the provisions of the said sixth article, which is hereby declared to be cancelled and annulled, except so far as the same may relate to the execution of the said seventh article, the United States of America hereby engage to pay, and his Britannic Majesty consents to accept for the use of the persons described in the said sixth article, the sum of six hundred thousand pounds sterling, payable at the time and place, and in the manner following, that is to say, the said sum of six hundred thousand pounds sterling shall be paid at the city of Washington, in three annual instalments of two hundred thousand pounds sterling each, and to such person or persons as shall be authorized by his Britannic Majesty to receive the same; the first of the said instalments to be paid at the expiration of one year; the second instalment at the expiration of two years; and the third and last instalment at the expiration of three years, next following the exchange of the ratifications of this convention: and to prevent any disagreement concerning the rate of exchange, the said payments shall be made in the money of the said United States, reckoning four dollars and forty-four cents, to be equal to one pound sterling.

Art. II. Whereas it is agreed by the fourth article of the definitive treaty of peace, concluded at Paris on the third day of September, 1783, between his Britannic Majesty and the United States, that creditors on either side should meet with no lawful impediments to the recovery of the full value in sterling money, of all bonâ fide debts theretofore contracted, it is hereby declared, that the said fourth article, so far as it respects its future operations, is hereby recognized, confirmed, and declared to be binding and obligatory upon his Britannic Majesty and the said United States, and the same shall be accordingly observed with punctuality and good faith.—And so as the said creditors shall hereafter meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value in sterling money of their bonâ fide debts.

Art. III. It is furthermore agreed and concluded that the commissioners appointed in pursuance of the seventh article of the said treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, and whose proceedings have been suspended as aforesaid, shall, immediately after the signature of this convention, re-assemble and proceed in the execution of their duties according to the provisions of the said seventh article, except only that instead of the sums awarded by the said commissioners, being made payable at the time or times by them appointed, all sums of money by them awarded to be paid to American or British claimants, according to the provisions of the said seventh article, shall be made payable in three equal instalments, the first whereof to be paid at the expiration of one year; the second at the expiration of two years; and the third and last at the expiration of three years next after the exchange of the ratifications of this convention.

Art. IV. This convention, when the same shall have been ratified by his Majesty and the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and the respective ratifications duly exchanged, shall be binding and obligatory upon his Majesty and the said United States. In faith whereof, we the undersigned Plenipotentiaries of his Britannic Majesty and of the United States of America, by virtue of our respective full powers, have signed this present convention, and have caused the seals of our arms to be affixed thereto.

Account of the Trial of CHARLES BELOE. (son of the Reverend William Beloe), a clerk in the General Post-Office, CHARLES WAGSTAFFE, another clerk in the General Post-Office, and JOHN HARWOOD, an amanuensis to the Reverend William Beloe and to the British Critic; all of whom were convicted at the General Quarter Sessions for the county of Middlesex, held at Clerkenwell, on Wednesday, the 14th of July, 1802.

The court being assembled about ten o'clock in the morning, and the trial of some inferior culprits having been gone through, the prisoners Beloe, Wagstaffe, and Harwood, were arraigned at the bar. The indictment, which was then read, contained three counts: 1, for endeavouring to raise a tumult of a hundred and more persons, with intent to injure William Cobbett, of Pall Mall, in his person and property; 2, for a riot, accompanied with breaking and destroying the windows of Mr. Cobbett; 3, for a riot only. These crimes were alleged to have been committed on the night of 30th of April, 1802, during the continuance of the illuminations for the peace with France.

The indictment having been read, the prisoners were asked, in the usual way, whether they were guilty or not guilty, upon which they severally replied, that they were not guilty.

MR. GLEDE, on behalf of the prosecution, addressed the jury, in substance as follows:—"Gentlemen of the jury, I rise, rather unexpectedly on my part, to address you in a case of no inconsiderable importance to the prosecutor of this indictment, to the prisoners themselves, and to the public at large. This task has devolved upon me, on account of the absence of a learned gentleman, who has been consulted in all the stages of this business, and who, it was expected, would have led the cause this day. But as he is absent, it has unexpectedly fallen to my lot. Gentlemen, I mention this circumstance, not that I will affect to doubt my own power of stating a tale of plain facts, but that I wished a prosecution of such public importance should be conducted to the public satisfaction. The offence of which I this day complain is a national disgrace, but, I trust, this day also it will meet with national justice. It is a disgrace that a mob should have presumed to have dictated laws in their lawless will, and tumultuously to have attempted to enforce their resolutions. This national disgrace, I am firmly persuaded, will this day be wiped away by your verdict, and that not only this country, but America, and all the world, will know that in this happy island, a man may maintain any political principles not interfering with the laws of the land, and that if there are men who presume violently to assault others of contrary principles, whatever their motives may be, the day of retribution will surely arrive, when they will meet the punishment of their offence by the judgment of a court, after they shall be found guilty by your verdict. Gentlemen, the prosecutor of this indictment is a Mr. Cobbett, a bookseller, living in Pall Mall. The prisoners are two of them clerks in the General Post-Office, and the third, as I understand, an amanuensis to Mr. Beloe, the father of one of the other prisoners; and here I must remark, it is a little singular that they are all connected in private life. The indictment charges, 1st, that they endeavoured to raise a tumult, with an intent to injure Mr. Cobbett in his person and property; next, that they broke his windows; and the 3d charge is simply for a common riot, without the circumstances charged in the former two counts. Gentlemen, with respect to the law upon the subject of riots, it is so well known, that it is unnecessary for me to address a single word to you upon that subject. Having thus stated the persons and the accusation, I shall proceed to state the circumstances of this case. The time of the riot was the evening of that day when the proclamation of peace took place. The pretext was, an omission, on the part of Mr. Cobbett, to illuminate his house upon that occasion. From circumstances which had occurred on a previous occasion, Mr. Cobbett had reason to expect that he should be selected as an object of insult by the mob. He had therefore taken the wise precaution to apply to the civil power, and had, near his house, a party of Bow-street officers. Still, however, it was to him a day of "fearful expectation." If he illuminated, he would be thought to derogate from that consistent conduct he had always maintained. He would be contradicting his publicly avowed principles and sentiments; principles and sentiments he had never swerved from, and in which he concurred with many great and virtuous men; men who had long enjoyed the confidence of their sovereign and the nation. If he had illuminated as a symptom of joy, he would have given the lie to the whole of his former conduct, and that, too, without any certainty such a sacrifice would have preserved him from violence. Gentlemen, Mr. Graham that evening attended with a party of police officers to protect Mr. Cobbett's house. As evening approached, the mob began to assemble, and went on increasing. At length the commanders appeared, (generals do not appear till the army is collected). The prisoners at the bar appeared, and were received with a loud shout. They first began to rattle at the windows, then to break them. From thence they proceeded to acts of more outrageous violence. There was a general cry of Damn the American.—We will not suffer him, said Harwood.—What?—He was interrupted, gentlemen, but what he meant was plain enough, we will not suffer him to live amongst us. Gentlemen, Mr. Cobbett is not an American; he is an Englishman, though he resided a long time in the American States; and, during the whole of that time, his Majesty had not a more faithful subject in any part of the world than Mr. Cobbett was; and the services he rendered his native country, during that time, will make his name to be remembered with gratitude by every loyal subject, when those of the prisoners will be preserved no where but in the records of this court. There was, gentlemen, something peculiarly base and malignant in this exclamation of the prisoner, Harwood. He knew Mr. Cobbett was not an American; but he thought the word a good signal for violence against that gentleman's property and person. It is hard to say what motive could have led to so malicious an attempt; but it is by no means difficult to perceive, that the person who could thus endeavour to push on an ignorant rabble, would himself have slunk like a coward from the sight of the gentleman whom he was endeavouring to injure. But, to resume the statement of facts, gentlemen, Mr. Graham finding it impossible to stop the outrages of the mob, called in a military force, and then, and not till then, the tumult was appeased. The three prisoners were taken. But Wagstaffe said he would not be taken; a plain assertion that he was connected with those around him. Nor was it from him only that this expression fell, the others said, "Don't it, don't let us be taken quietly." I shall prove that Beloe used these words; and I shall also prove, that the latter was seen with an immense stone battering at the door. What must have been his object? Could it have been any other than to burst open the door, and let in the mob to unbridled plunder and devastation. If he had succeeded in this attempt, he would, gentlemen, ere this, have stood before a higher tribunal, to answer, with his life, for a crime so detestable in itself, and so dangerous to society. That the attack on Mr. Cobbett's house proceeded from premeditation, there is good reason to believe; because, in several parts of this town, there were houses which were not illuminated, and which did, however, remain totally unmolested. In one of the reports, rendered by the magistrates to the secretary of state, after the illumination, it was stated, that, in a particular district, several hundred houses were not illuminated, and yet, that there was not a pane of glass broken by violence in the whole district. I am anxious to press this circumstance on your minds, gentlemen, because it is a very strong presumptive proof that Mr. Cobbett's house was marked as an object of attack; which proof is strongly corroborated by certain circumstances relative to both the prosecutor and the culprits. Mr. Cobbett was well known to be one of those who disapproved of the peace. By his arguments he had shewn his disapprobation to be well founded. He had made many converts to his opinions, which he had conveyed in a style and manner that left his cowardly enemies no hope of revenge, but through the means of a rabble, rather more ignorant perhaps, but certainly not more base, than their instigators. The prisoners at the bar, gentlemen, were themselves, indeed, but little interested in the question of peace or war; but, recollect, gentlemen, that two of them, Beloe and Wagstaffe, were (and I believe yet are) stipendiaries in an office of government, clerks in the General

Post-Office; and, as to Harwood, besides his being a relation of Beloe, his employment was of a nature not very different in its influence from that of the other two. If, gentlemen, in addition to these circumstances, it should be made appear, that the two former of the prisoners, notwithstanding they were committed to jail, and afterwards indicted by the grand jury, have not been, even for a moment, suspended from their respective offices: I say, gentlemen, that if it should be made appear to you, that these rioters have enjoyed, not only their offices, but their salaries; that, even for the time while they were in jail, and while they are now standing as prisoners at the bar; if it should appear, that they are actually to be paid out of the public purse for time so passed, you will, I trust, require no further explanation, to enable you to judge of the motives that emboldened creatures so cowardly to commit the offence which is now laid to their charge, and on which, I am confident, you will stamp a verdict of guilty.

[We regret that we have not room to give Mr. Glede's speech entire. It was long and eloquent. What we have given here is the substance of only a part of it.]

Mr. Aaron Graham, the magistrate, was first called, who deposed as follows:—"In consequence of an application made by Mr. Cobbett to the secretary at war, an arrangement was made at the Bow-street office for the protection of his house on the night of the general illuminations. It fell to my lot to be appointed to that duty. In the evening I went down and saw the constables about the house. I told them to take no notice of me, unless something made it necessary. I walked through St. James'-street and the places adjoining; and when I returned back, as I approached Mr. Cobbett's house, I heard the windows breaking. I immediately rushed through the mob, and found a vacant space in front of the house; but was much surprised at not seeing any of our officers present. Beloe was then standing on the steps in front of the door, with a large road paving-stone in his hands, with which he was battering the door with all his force. I was about to take him into custody, when a man near me said, I had better not attempt it then, as it might be dangerous. I asked him if he belonged to the office; he answered, no. I then told him not to lose sight of Beloe, while I went to the Horse Guards. I immediately ran to the Horse Guards, and staid no longer than to tell them to send down 20 or 30 horse.

Immediately when I got back to the mob, I found our own officers, whom I directed to assist me in taking the prisoners. We all rushed through the mob, and the three prisoners were taken. Wagstaffe said, "Damn it, don't let us be taken into custody." I got hold of Beloe in the door way of Mr. Cobbett's house. I directed the officers to draw their cutlasses; which they did, and kept off the mob. The horse came in a quarter of an hour, and dispersed the mob. When I first saw the three prisoners, they had Belcher silk-handkerchiefs about their necks; but when I returned from the Horse Guards, they were taken off; but such sort of handkerchiefs were found in their pockets when they were at the office. Upon cross-examination, he said, he had never seen them before, but was certain of their persons. He did not know any thing of their having been committed for a capital offence.

Adolphus Wastney said, he was the man who was desired by the last witness to watch Beloe. He saw all the three prisoners there. He saw them come: they came all together. He saw all of them fetch bricks and half-bricks, and throw them at the windows. When the magistrate returned from the Horse Guards, he assisted in taking them. He heard Harwood say, "D—n the American, he ought not to be suffered." He saw them fetch stones a great many times. During the time that the magistrate was absent, two horse-soldiers passed, and Beloe threw at them. He never lost sight of Beloe till Mr. Graham returned. He was there before any of the windows were broken.

Thomas Ellis and John Corkayne, patrols, corroborated the above testimony.

Mr. Sylvester, on behalf of the prisoners, said, the learned gentleman who had opened the prosecution had no occasion to lament the absence of his learned leader, since, if he had been present, he could not have made a better speech than the jury had heard. The learned gentleman had made the most of his materials; he had represented the offence as a national disgrace; the punishment as an object of national justice, which he desired might be known to America, to the whole world. What was this mighty offence, taken at the worst? Two or three thoughtless children had broke Mr. Cobbett's windows. The learned gentleman then challenged the services his client had rendered in America—very likely; he knew nothing of Mr. Cobbett; but he thought he might as well have staid in America if he chose to run so counter to public opinion. If he would do it, he was laying a trap for men to commit offences, and he had no right to complain if he per chance got his windows broke. Yet this was the mighty cause represented as a national disgrace. Whoever run his head into a hornets' nest must expect to be stung. He had not read his own brief; but as the learned gentleman observed, it was a case which required no preparation; in truth, there was nothing in it. The learned gentleman had remarked, it was a little singular, that they were connected in private life. Truly, a most singular thing, that three young men, all knowing each other, should be parties to the same frolic; yes, but they were generals to the mob. "Look," said he, "at the general, young Beloe is 18 years of age—he is the mighty general." He really thought it was the most foolish prosecution he ever witnessed. The learned gentleman then commented upon the evidence, and insisted that it did not support the charge as laid in the indictment; namely, that they had met for the purpose of exciting the mob to injure Mr. Cobbett. The simple facts were as follow: On the day preceding the night of the illumination, the three young men had dined together at the house of Beloe's father. In the evening they went out to see the lights, and coming to Cobbett's house, they found a mob breaking the windows, and they had the folly to join them in throwing stones at the windows—but what was the consequence? the jury could scarce suppose it—they were committed six days, and told, that they would be prosecuted upon a capital charge. The prosecutor employed a carpenter to examine; but the jury would scarce know for what purpose. Their own feeling hearts would never suggest it to them. It was to see whether the house was not so broken as to warrant the prosecutor indicting those young men for a felony. If they were parents, they would feel what must be the sensations of the families of those youths, when they knew that intention of the prosecutor. He put it to every man amongst them, whether they had not all of them, in the days of their youth, been guilty of similar follies. He concluded by insisting that the fact was not proved as laid in the indictment, and that the defendants were therefore entitled to their verdict.

After this, several witnesses were called to the character of the prisoners at the bar.

Dr. Wingate, second master of Westminster School spoke particularly as to the character of the prisoner Beloe, whom he represented to be a most mild and inoffensive youth, and the least likely to do any mischief of any lad he ever knew.

The Rev. Mr. Nares (partner with the prisoner Beloe's father in the British Critic) swore, that he had known the prisoner Beloe from his infancy to the present time, "I have," said the reverend witness, "been intimately acquainted with all the circumstances of his life, from the time he was in the cradle, and I do not only not know that he was ever guilty of any riotous or disorderly behaviour, but I know, that he was not guilty of any such behaviour, in the course of his whole life, until the very eve of the alleged riot." The same rev. gentleman swore something in behalf of the prisoner Harwood's character, but not quite so positive, or comprehensive.

John Reeves, Esq. said, that he knew the prisoner Beloe, but that he could add nothing to what had been said by Mr. Nares.

Mr. John Nicholls (Editor of the Gentleman's Magazine) said, that, as a proof of the mildness and excellence of the disposition of the prisoner Beloe, he, the said Nicholls, had always suffered him to be upon terms of great intimacy with his "amiable young family, amongst whom were some lovely daughters."

Two persons from the General Post-Office gave the prisoners Beloe and Wagstaffe good characters. The Deputy Comptroller of the Foreign Office being asked, whether the prisoners Beloe and Wagstaffe had been suspended from their office, or pay, in consequence of their apprehension, commitment, or indictment, he answered, that they never had been suspended at all. Upon this question being asked, a person who apparently acted in behalf of the prisoners, Beloe and Wagstaffe, produced in court (and shewed to the prosecutor's counsel) a letter, intended to convince the said counsel, that the commission of the crime, for which the prisoners were then at the bar, had in no wise injured their character with their superiors; and this letter was in the hand writing of Lord Auckland, one of the Joint Post-masters General, and, of course, one of the present administration.

It was proposed, by Mr. Cobbett, to cross-examine the Rev. Mr. Nares, and to ask him whether he had known the prisoner, Beloe, while the said Beloe was in Germany. It was also proposed to ask him, if he could tell how the prisoner Beloe, came by two livid marks which appeared under his eyes. To the latter of these questions, the prisoner's counsel replied, that the appearance here mentioned was occasioned by a blow with a cricket-ball.

Mr. Conant, who presided on this occasion, now summed up the evidence, and concluded by telling the jury, that they had nothing to do with the general character or conduct of either of the parties; that, however excellent the life and conversation of the prisoners might be, they were answerable for their transgression of the law; and, however perverse the conduct of the prosecutor, he was still under the protection of that law.

The jury, after a few minutes consultation, gave their verdict of guilty against all the prisoners, but recommended them to the mercy of the court.

Mr. Sylvester, the counsel for the prisoners, then asked Mr. Cobbett if he would join in the recommendation, to which the latter replied: "Certainly not, Sir; I came here to 'ask for justice, and not for mercy.'"

After a very short deliberation, Mr. Conant pronounced sentence. He said, that, in consequence of the imprisonment, which the defendants had already suffered [about five days], the magistrates were disposed to remit any further punishment of that sort, which, otherwise, they should most certainly have inflicted, as a necessary one in this species of crime. He was directed to pronounce, that the two prisoners, Beloe and Wagstaffe, should pay a fine of thirty pounds each, and Harwood a fine of ten pounds; and that each of the three prisoners should enter into recognizance to keep the peace, and to be of good behaviour for the space of two years.

The prisoners conducted themselves with a tolerable degree of decorum. They appeared to be sensible of the danger in which they were, without having forgotten the greater danger, which they had been fortunate enough to escape. Wagstaffe seemed very much affected when he was brought to the bar. Beloe looked rather sulky at first; but when the counsel for the prosecution drew towards the conclusion of his speech, he was evidently much agitated, and, finally, he cried like a child. Harwood had in his countenance the marks of alarm, if not of contrition. He looked as pale as death it self. In this scene, which was rather of the solemn kind, there arose one circumstance ludicrous enough. It was this: in speaking to the character of the prisoners, their counsel chose to go back to their ancestors. This is sometimes slippery ground. Beloe was the son of the Reverend William Beloe; Harwood was also the son of a clergyman; "and as to Mr. Wagstaffe," said the cute common serjeant, "he is the son of a country gentleman, who is beloved by the poor, by his tenants, and by all who have the honour to know him." Now, the truth is, Wagstaffe's father, who has been dead many years, was the servant of a clergyman in Somersetshire, in whose service he died. The clergyman educated the son out of charity, and, when he grew up, procured him a place in the post office, a considerable part of the profits of which place the young man has regularly transmitted for the support of his mother. Mr. Cobbett had, by means of a letter from this clergyman, been fully apprized of all these circumstances, the last of which it was his intention to communicate to the court; but, after the story about the country gentleman and his tenants, such a communication might have been thought malicious. There was something whimsical, too, in the declamation respecting the tender age of the prisoners. The pathetic common serjeant called them school-boys, lads, and sometimes children. We shall not, indeed, insist, that school-boys, lads, and even children, are not to be found upon the patronage list of Lord Auckland, but the prisoners, though two of them clerks in the general post-office, are not mere insignificant children. Beloe, according to the lowest statement, is eighteen years old. He has been about two in the capacity of a clerk; so that, if he be yet a poor ignorant boy, he is like to prove what the drill-sergeants call one of the king's hard bargains. Besides, now we think of it, it is a mercy that he is not at this moment an ambassador! Let not the reader stare. We can assure him, that this school-boy, this fellow, who is represented as too senseless to know the nature of a riot, would, had it not been for a mere accident, at this moment have been a secretary of legation, if not a minister, at some foreign court!!!—Wagstaffe is upwards of thirty years of age; and Harwood ought not to be a child, seeing that he has a wife.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Genoa, July 2.—The intelligence we have received from Algiers for some weeks past is exceedingly disagreeable. About the beginning of May the Regency sent out eleven corsairs of different sizes, viz. two frigates, one of 46 guns, and the other of 36; four chebecs, two polacres, two schooners, and a brig; and it is known that they have already taken nine considerable prizes in the course of six weeks, namely, five Neapolitan vessels, two Spanish, one English, one Genoese, and a Portuguese frigate.—These privateers have even stopped two French brigs, under a pretence that they were not provided with passports; and it was only after some strong remonstrances that the agent of the Republic was able to obtain their release. There is no doubt that the French government will take some notice of this conduct of the Regency, and demand reparation.—There is reason to believe also, that it will interfere in the affair of the two Neapolitan vessels, because the Republic is immediately interested in the circumstances of their capture. One of them had been dispatched from Corfu by the French Agent in the Republic of the Seven Isles, with a cargo destined for the service of the French army in the kingdom of Naples. The Agent of the Republic at Algiers being informed of the circumstance, which was carefully concealed from him, desired to see the dispatches of which that vessel was the bearer; they were refused to him; and the efforts he made to cause the prize to be given up, were attended with no other success than that of obtaining the liberty of some passengers who were on board.—In regard to the Neapolitan captain, his fate is truly deplorable, and he still groans in the most cruel captivity.—The other Neapolitan vessel, which sailed from Marseilles with a cargo of hemp, was taken in sight of the Hieres Isles; the crew consisted of 21 men; one of them, it seems, was drowned in attempting to escape—two succeeded in getting on shore, and gave in their deposition; the other 18 were conducted as slaves to Algiers. The captain demanded the interference of the French Agent, and the affair is now under discussion.—The English prize excited a violent altercation between the Regency and the English Consul.—The Regency pretended that the Admiralty pass which the captain produced was forged, because the vignette represented a vessel with latine sails, whereas the vessel seized was square rigged. The Consul wished to send notice of the seizure to the British government; but this was refused, and the port was shut. The affair is not decided, and the vessel is still detained. The French Consul has remonstrated with great firmness, and threatened hostilities if the vessel be not restored with proper indemnities.—Of all these prizes, the most remarkable is that of the Portuguese frigate La Cygne, of 44 guns, and 350 men, which was captured, on the 7th of May, at the entrance of the Gut of Gibraltar, by an Algerine frigate of the same force and about 420 men. The Portuguese suffered themselves to be surprised, at least we must believe so. The Algerines came upon them with a press of sail, fired a few shot, and then boarded. The Portuguese captain, the lieutenant, and 36 men, were killed. If they were not deficient in courage, they certainly were deficient in foresight and skill. The rest of the Portuguese were thrown into the hold naked and loaded with chains. The wounded were seven days at sea; without clothes, without nourishment, and without having their wounds dressed: when they arrived at Algiers, several of them died in consequence of their wounds having mortified.—This prize, of which there is no similar example in the annals of Algiers, excited in the city the most extravagant enthusiasm. The insolence of the government has thence increased, and the Europeans can no longer appear in the streets without being exposed to the insults of the populace.—An Algerine Rais had the impudence to ill use the second officer of a small French vessel in the harbour of Tunis, and we know that in the discussions which have taken place on this subject, between the Regency and the French agent, the latter complained of the bad faith and rude behaviour of the Vekislargy. It is even believed that the French government will not suffer such insults to go unpunished, and that if other powers allow their flag to be insulted, and their vessels plundered, the First Consul will inviolably protect in the Mediterranean the honour of the French flag, and maintain that security which he has promised to all commercial speculations.

Turin, July 10.—The Administrator-General, in the 27th military division, eager to put an end to the inquietudes and doubts of certain citizens of the ci-devant Piedmont, has hastened to publish the following arrêté of the Council respecting this subject, and the letter of the Minister of the Interior, which accompanies it. The following is the Minister's letter:

“ Paris, July 2, 1802.

“ I address to you, Citizen Counsellor of State, the inclosed arrêté of the Councils which grants an amnesty for all political offences which have been committed in the departments of the 27th Military Division.

“ The First Consul, in ordering me to address this to you, has commanded me to observe to you that he has chosen the period for carrying this arrêté into execution when the King of Sardinia has, for the second time, in renouncing the crown, released the Piedmontese from their Oath of Allegiance.

"Be so good, Citizen Counsellor of State, as to inform me of the receipt of this letter, and of the measures you have in consequence taken. I salute you cordially,

"Chaptal."

The arrêté of the Consuls annexed to the letter of the Minister is to the following effect:

Arrêté of the Consuls of the 29th June.

Art. I. A general amnesty is pronounced for all political crimes which may have occurred in the six departments of the 27th military division.

II. There shall not be, in the six departments of the 27th military division, any list of emigrants.

III. All the absent individuals, even those who fill diplomatic or administrative situations at the Court of the above-mentioned Prince, are admitted to return to their country, and there shall be granted to them a prorogation to the 23d of September, in the 11th year of the Republic.

IV. They shall make the declaration before the prefect of their department, that they shall renounce all connexion with the house of Savoy, and with foreign powers; and they shall take an oath of fidelity to the constitution of the French people.

V. Those who from ill health, or any other good cause, shall not be able to return by 23d September, 11th year, shall be bound to make the same declaration before the French agents in the country where they are.

VI. Those who, on the 23d September, 11th year, shall persist in remaining emigrants, shall be definitively declared banished, and their property shall be annexed to the Republic.

Buonaparte, First Consul.

Berlin, July 13.—A courier arrived here on the 11th, from the Marquis de Lucchesini at Paris. The contents of his dispatches are not known, but it is believed they relate to the business of the indemnities, which at length approaches to a conclusion. It is pretty certain that all the great powers are agreed on this important point.—The troops destined to take possession of the countries which are to be annexed to the Prussian dominions, will, it is said, march this week for that purpose.

Bordeaux, July 15.—The opening of the Scheldt has thrown alarm into all our commercial ports of the west; they apprehend that the former prosperity of Antwerp will be revived at their expense. Nantz sees nothing but its total ruin, and Bordeaux calculates the loss of its commerce at more than 300 millions of livres per annum.—Are not all these losses exaggerated? The chief branches of the commerce of Nantz were, in the Slave Trade, the Cod Fishery, and the entrepot of foreign merchandize of every kind. The latter of these great means of prosperity, is the only one which can be injured by the opening of the Scheldt. But Nantz, situated at the Mouth of the Loire, cannot fail to be a favourite entrepot, on account of the easy and advantageous passages which it affords into the interior of France. Bordeaux has much less cause to be dissatisfied. Its wines, which are an inexhaustible source of wealth, alone suffice to fix, in this port, an important trade. But it also has its communication with the Mediterranean by Languedoc, which also makes a considerable entrepot for the merchandize of the Levant. Its raisins, pitch, and tar, its iron, and a quantity of other territorial materials, offer to foreigners all kinds of advantageous returns. Is it supposed that the lace of Antwerp will rival so many precious productions, and detach from the noble port of Bordeaux, the rich cargoes of English, Dutch, Swedish, and Danish vessels, which always frequent it? The departments of the north are well-favoured by their position, but those of the south will always attract foreigners by the nature of their productions:

A merchant of Bordeaux has received a letter from the Colonial Prefect of Guadeloupe, dated June 8, which contains the following intelligence:—"I have the pleasure of announcing to you the complete re-establishment of the national authority in this island. The fugitives, in their flight, however, have burnt several plantations and cane-fields, but the damage is not so great as reported. The whole of Grande-Terre has been saved, and a part of the island of Guadeloupe, properly so called. The insurgents are every where returning. Agriculture is resumed, and good order restored. This is important intelligence to commerce, which may now, without uneasiness, pursue its speculations, which, indeed, were never interrupted by this state of warfare, which lasted nearly a month."

The Banks of the Mein, July 16.—The last letters from Berlin of the 10th inst. announce that a negotiation is going on between M. de Haugwitz on the one part, and M. de Rheden and the Baron d'Ompéda on the other, respecting an exchange of a part of the Prussian indemnities for certain possessions in Hanover. After several conferences, the Baron d'Ompéda has set off to consult the Hanoverian Ministry of State, relative to a proposition which, it is said, has been made by the Court of Berlin. It is, however, very problematical, whether this negotiation will have the desired success.

Hague, July 17.—Dispatches from Admiral de Winter, who is with the squadron on the Barbary Coast, announce that he has delivered all the presents destined for the African powers, who have testified a desire of renewing their ancient commercial relations with this Republic, and of making arrangements to prevent any cause of complaint on the part of the Batavian merchants. The squadron will stay some time at Smyrna.

Frankfort, July 18.—The following is the result of the intelligence received respecting the business of the indemnities: "We are assured that it was stipulated in the last article of the Convention signed at Paris on the 4th ult. between Citizen Talleyrand, the Count de Markoff, and the Marquis de Lucchesini, for the purpose of regulating the indemnities of the Hereditary Princes of the Empire, that the Convention should be ratified within forty days from the day of its signature, and the ratifications exchanged on or before the 14th of July. After the exchange of the ratifications, the occupation of the secularized States allotted as indemnities, was to take place without loss of time, according to the same stipulations, even if Austria did not accede to the Convention." It is not known whether the exchange of the ratifications, and the accession of the Court of Vienna, have taken place; but the report of the German Ministers at Paris, respecting this subject, is expected with the greatest impatience.

Letter from Mr. Livingston, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States in France, addressed to Mr. Skipwith, the American Commercial Agent at Paris:—

Sir,

Paris, July 18.

Letters which I have this moment received from Commodore Morris, who commands the squadron of the United States in the Mediterranean, and from Mr. Gavine, our Consul at Gibraltar, communicate the disagreeable intelligence of Mr. Simpson's arrival in that port from Tangiers; the Emperor of Morocco having forced him to depart precipitately, and having at the same time ordered his vessels to be armed against the American merchantmen. I beg that you will give notice of this event, without delay, to our Commercial Agents in the different ports of France, requesting them to dispatch copies of this letter by the first vessels which sail for the United States, or the West-Indies, and to direct the captains of those vessels to publish it in the ports in which they arrive. Commodore Morris advises all American vessels, bound to the Mediterranean, to rendezvous at Cadiz, where they will find a convoy appointed to protect them on their passage through the Straits.

I am, &c. Rob. R. Livingston.

Amsterdam, July 21.—The following resolutions were passed the 19th inst. by the Provisional Government of this city, at the instance of the Commissioners of our Bank:—1. To make it known to those interested, that in consequence of the payments made to the Bank by the common treasurer, the deficiency being entirely filled up, all the debts on bonds or stock which have been deposited in said Bank, are now replaced by hard cash, so that there is now nothing whatever in circulation but upon effective real value, and that thereby the Bank is now in that situation in which it was when originally erected.—2. That the common treasurer of this city be qualified, on behalf of the assembly, to receive from the Commissioners of the Bank, all the pretensions which said Bank had, as also the several bonds resting there in pawn, and to do the needful in this respect.—3. For facilitating the operations in bank money, at the re-opening of the Bank on the 30th inst. to cause to cease the tax of a half stiver on each hundred gilders, which was imposed the 31st March, 1796, by a resolution of the Municipality, on payments made in bank money, and to fix it on the old footing, namely, three stivers for each sum which, per banco, shall be transferred.—4. That the superintendants of the Bank form a Committee, in conjunction with the Commissioners, to revise the regulations and ordinances of said Bank, to make the necessary alterations in them, and as improved according to the exigency of present circumstances, to present them to this city Government for its assent.

Paris, July 22.—The produce of the French Colonies is to be admitted only into the ports of Nice, Toulon, Marseilles, Cetre, Bayonne, Bourdeaux, Rochefort, La Rochelle, Nantes, L'Orient, Brest, Morlaix, St. Malo, Cherbourg, Rouen, Honfleur, Havre, Dieppe, St. Valary, on the Somme, Boulogne, Calais, Dunkirk, Ostend, and Antwerp.

The duties paid on French colonial productions is of two kinds, viz. the duty of importation and the duty of consumption. Raw sugar, for instance, pays on 5 miriagrammes (about 105lb. of the old French weight) 1 fr. 50 c. for the former duty, and 13 fr. 50 c. for the latter; in all 15 fr. A bounty of 25 francs is given on every 5 miriagrammes of refined sugar exported to foreign countries. The exportation is to take place from the above-mentioned ports only, or, by land, through Lansleburg, Versoye, Bourglibre, Strasburgh, Mayence, and Cologne.

The produce of Colonies belonging to other countries are admitted into France under the following regulations and duties, viz.—The productions of foreign colonies, enumerated in the subjoined tariff, shall pay the duties stated in that tariff.—These duties shall be paid on the arrival of the said productions, unless they are placed in actual entrepôt, in which state they cannot remain longer than one year.—The merchandise placed in entrepôt shall pay only a counter-vailing duty on importation, and shall be exempted from any duty on re-exportation.

On being removed from the entrepôt to the interior, the following duties must be paid:—

	F.	C.
Brown sugar, the 5 myriagrammes (or } 105lb. of the old French weight).... }	22	50

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES.

The Levant merchants interested in the Turkish trade, have made inquiries of Government to ascertain whether that branch of our commerce would be injured by the troubles which at present prevail in every quarter of the Ottoman Empire. A deputation from the members of the Turkey Company waited on Lord Hawkesbury, by appointment, on Tuesday, to obtain information on this subject, and to request the accommodation of one or two ships of war in case the progress made by the Insurgents should render it expedient for the Company to remove any part of English property from that quarter. His Lordship assured them, that there existed no ground of apprehension with regard to the safety of British property in the Turkish dominions; but that, as Government had generally kept up a small naval force in the Levant, he would make the necessary application to the Admiralty for the appointment of two frigates to that station, which would remain there for the protection of the trade.—His Lordship also informed the deputation that his Majesty's ministers had no reason to suppose that attempts would be made from any quarter to violate the integrity of the Turkish Empire. With regard to the concession which the Porte is reported to have made to France, of the free navigation of the Black Sea, his Lordship observed, that Government had no knowledge of any agreement to that effect having taken place; but, if the Turkish Government should think it proper to make an arrangement of this nature with the French Republic, the deputation might rest assured that no privilege would be granted to the French trader, which would not be equally enjoyed by the subjects of his Britannic Majesty.

The Princess of Orange arrived on the 19th at Brussels from London, and continued her journey the same evening for Germany.

MIDDLESEX ELECTION.

At the final close of the Poll on Thursday last, the numbers were,

For George Byng, Esq..... 3848
Sir Francis Burdett, Bart... 3207
William Mainwaring, Esq. 2936

The following are the concluding addresses of the two rival candidates.

To the Gentlemen, Clergy, and Freeholders of the County of Middlesex.

Gentlemen,

Permit me to return you my most sincere thanks, for the great exertions and support you have been pleased to give me, in the long contest in which we have been engaged.—The poll is now closed. The Sheriff having thought proper to return Mr. Byng and Sir Francis Burdett as your Representatives, as I conceive, against a majority of legal votes in my favour, it remains for me to vindicate your rights before a superior tribunal. Be assured, that I have every reason to believe that your kind intentions towards me will finally be carried into effect, and that I shall have the honour, which it is my utmost ambition to obtain, of again representing you in Parliament.—Your friendly and continued exertions on this, as well as on former occasions, will ever be deeply impressed on my mind, and I shall be happy, at all times, to prove myself,

Gentlemen,

Your faithful and devoted Servant,

W. Mainwaring.

Hanover-Square, July 29, 1802.

To the Independent and Public-spirited Freeholders of Middlesex,

Gentlemen,

Mr. Mainwaring has endeavoured to make the public believe, that our opposition to his re-election was an attack upon the Government, and that his numbers on the poll would be a justification for his political conduct.—His numbers on the poll do not, in the least, incline me to believe, that even those Freeholders of Middlesex approve his conduct, but only that some of them were not sufficiently acquainted with it. But I do acknowledge, and I wish all the Freeholders had been sooner aware of it, that an opposition to his re-election was, in effect, an opposition to any Government by secret and concealed torture.—Gentlemen, when I assert that secret imprisonment, secret trial, and secret execution, are the never failing engines of oppression and tyranny, and that innocence can have no security but by public trial, public execution, and public custody, in the face of day, and before the eyes of the country at large: when I assert this, I am conscious that I stand upon a rock from which I cannot be removed by any hired magistrates, parliaments, or kings. This is no difficult speculation; it is not confined to any particular form of government, but is equally necessary under all; for tyranny is no form of government, but the dissolution of every social tie. I repeat it, there can be no security against the ill-treatment of prisoners, there can be no possible means of hearing their complaints, or knowing their sufferings, but by publicity of custody, and free communication with their friends.—I heartily congratulate you, gentlemen, on this tedious and protracted contest, for it has given an opportunity to the independent and public-spirited Freeholders of this Metropolitan County, deliberately to declare their sentiments of the present system of torture in the dungeons of Cold Bath-Fields, and their opinion of Mr Justice Mainwaring and his humane friend,

“The steeled Gaoler, who seldom is the friend of Man.”

Gentlemen, for having done my duty in my place in Parliament against the barbarous and cruel system of secret and close imprisonment, I was stigmatized by the Lord Lieutenant of this County, and in violation of the privilege of Parliament, and of all law and decency, I was proclaimed by him throughout the land, as a person not fit to be trusted to visit or perform any office of humanity to any wretched victim within those accursed walls. Permit me to say it belonged to this same country, to wipe away this undeserved stigma, and you have done it nobly. My own share in this contest I most cheerfully undergo, assuring you, that I shall never think any personal sacrifice of mine too great to assist in restoring our country to its former freedom and blessedness: and in this declaration I beg that I may not be misunderstood. I love my family like other men; but if driven to the alternative, I had much rather that my children and posterity should be poor in a free and flourishing country, than rich in an enslaved and impoverished kingdom. I love my country well, and its tranquillity; but I had much rather it should be annihilated than enslaved.—I remain, Gentlemen, with every sentiment of respect for the Independent Freeholders of Middlesex,

Your much obliged, and

Sincerely devoted Servant,

Francis Burdett;

La Pérouse.—After the lapse of years some glimmering of information has reached Europe with respect to the fate of this French Navigator who sailed on a voyage of discovery with two frigates, and after performing part of his voyage, touched at Botany Bay. From the period of his sailing from New South Wales, no account was ever received from him. A vessel was sent from France under the command of D'Entrecasteaux in search of him, but the search was ineffectual. At length, an American ship, which had traversed the South Sea, brought to the Mauritius in February last some information, which gives strength to the conjectures that have been formed of the unfortunate Navigator's having been massacred with all his crew. We refer our readers to the following article, extracted from the Moniteur of Sunday last.

"Mauritius, Feb. 14.

"Captain Ingenold, Commander of the American ship the Charlotte, arrived from China, says, that he learnt, in his voyage to the South Sea, at the Sandwich Isles, and on the North West Coast, that before the Revolution of France, without being able to determine precisely the year, a vessel from Brest had, in the month of April, anchored in the Bay of Comshervar, a Bay, which is 54 degrees 13 minutes north, opposite Englefield Bay, in the Island called Queen Charlotte's Island.—That this vessel having a great quantity of sick, was attacked by the islanders, who got on board at the moment the crew were employed in reefing the sails; that they massacred the captain, who was on the deck, and the whole crew, with the exception of a young man, whose fate is unknown.—It is added, that the islanders destroyed the vessel, after having unloaded it. It is to be presumed that this vessel is M. La Pêrouse's, or her companion."

TO MESSRS. NARES AND BELOE,

Joint Editors and Proprietors of the British Critic.

Gentlemen,

In my former letter to you (Register, Vol. I. p. 657) I promised, that, unless you did justice to Mr. Bere, I would enter into a full and clear exposure of the motives and of the influence, from which you had acted. I am now about to fulfil that promise.

From the first dawn of the Blagdon controversy, you took a decided part with Mrs. More. You were repeatedly told, that she was a methodist, or sectarist, and you as often denied it, uniformly declaring, that, the moment she was proved to be one, you would give her up. That proof has now been produced to you. Evidence as clear as is required to produce conviction in a court of justice has been laid before you; and how have you acted in consequence thereof? By the most pitiful, the most despicable subterfuge, that a hireling pen ever had recourse to, you have found an excuse for the non fulfilment of your promise.

You have received proof of Mrs. More having constantly attended the Meeting-house of Mr. Jay at Bath, and of her having received the sacrament in the said Meeting-house, and from the hands of this Mr. Jay. Such a test was not to be got over. That she was a dissenter had been proved to you a hundred times over; but it was your business not to be convinced, and, therefore, you always boldly denied the fact, not imagining that a circumstance so very conclusive as that of taking the sacrament would ever be produced. Produced, however, it is, and that in such a way as not to be denied even by you. Thus situated, you first affect not to have time to read the documents sent you on the subject. By this you gain a respite of a month, at the end of which you come forth with what I am now going briefly to remark on.

As to your first assertion, that Mr. Jay "is not a LAYMAN," I beg leave to recommend it to the notice of the Right Rev. Prelates, who have thought proper to place you in their cathedrals. You admit Mr. Jay to be a dissenter; indeed, it is well known that he is what is called an independent, a pastor of Oliver Cromwell's sect. But, say you, "an independent is not a methodist."—And what then? What does that make as to the spirit of your promise with respect to the defence of Mrs. More? Is an independent the same as a churchman? That is the question for you to consider. The charge against Mrs. More was not her being attached to one sect more than to any other sect, but her being attached to sectarists in general, and not firmly attached to the church of England, of several of the benefices of which she had found the means of becoming the disposer. This was the charge. The word methodist was used, in the controversy, in opposition to churchmen, and not as the only term applicable to her and her followers, whom Mr. Bere does not call methodists, but "non-descripts;" and, indeed, this same term is used by all the writers on that side of the question. You have, it is true, made use of the word methodist; but, can you say, in the face of the public, that you did not make use of it merely to designate a person not firmly attached to the church? In your defence of Mrs. More you constantly spoke of her as a friend and supporter of the church: you made quotations from her works to back your assertions; and yet you now affect to make the controversy turn solely upon the question, whether she be EXCLUSIVELY a methodist, or whether she now and then mixes with other sects!—For shame, gentlemen, for shame!

Now as to the motives and the influence from which you have acted. The Thorn-ton and Wilberforces, together with the fund which those gentlemen have for the purchase of livings to be disposed of amongst the godly, have, doubtless, had their weight with you; nor did you, I believe, lose sight of this pious fund when you reviewed the book of St. Wilberforce or that of Patriot Thornton; the former about the word God and the latter about paper money. But, you were chiefly influenced by the Bishop of London and the late Lord Chancellor (both of them of some weight in church matters), and both, to your knowledge, grossly deceived respecting Mrs. More's religious tenets and practices.—Attempt not to deny, that you review books agreeably to the hints (very broad ones sometimes) you receive from those who have good things to dispose of; I assert that you do; nay, I assert, that you give characters of books directly contrary to your own opinions, when you receive, from certain quarters, directions so to do. This I assert, and I do not think you will call upon me for proof.

Here I should have stopped, had not your remark on the income of Mr. Bere called for something by way of reply. You say, that he has been “artfully and falsely” represented to be a poor curate: and then you insinuate, that the little rectorship, which he enjoys in addition to his “lucrative” curacy, renders his situation rather too good for him.—Concerning benefices, Gentlemen, you ought, methinks, to be the last men in the world to open your lips. You are gorged with benefices, livings, prebendaries, canonries, masterhips of hospitals, archdeaconries, and God knows what besides. You have, between you, more church preferment than would suffice to support, in a decent manner, twenty country clergymen; you have, between you, twenty times the church revenue of Mr. Bere. Those who have conferred it on you would, doubtless, be able to point out your merits; but, for my part, I have never heard of your theological writings; and, as to actual service in the pulpit, I am inclined to believe, that Mr. Bere has performed five times as much as both of you, who are now, and who, I believe, have always been, absentees from your livings. Such men should not speak grudgingly of a country clergyman, who happens to obtain a curacy to help out a living of £40 or £50 a year, and who is in the constant performance of his duty.

One word more. You have several times insinuated, that Mr. Bere is disaffected to the government; but, do you think, Gentlemen, that if Mr. Bere had been master of Emanuel College, he would have sent his almsmen to vote for Sir Francis Burdett? Pray, Mr. Beloe, answer me that question. Pretend not, Sir, that the men were “inveigled away by Sir Francis Burdett's people.” It was your business to see, that they were not inveigled away by any body. You have them under your care and command; you even kept the key of them. They went part of them one day and part of them the next. They could not have gone without your consent. You did not vote yourself. No: it would not have been convenient to have your name upon the poll books for Sir Francis, and you did not choose to vote for his rival, though your vote would certainly have been as good as those of your almsmen. If their votes were not good, they are all perjured, and have committed a most heinous and damnable offence, which you might have prevented, and which it was your bounden duty to prevent. The fact is, that both you and Mr. Nares are in habits of close connection with Perry of the Morning Chronicle, and with other active citizens of the same stamp, while, at the same time, you are admitted into the closets of bishops and other great authors. Far be it from me to blame you for supporting the anti-governmental candidate for Middlesex; I wish, for my part, you had done something ten thousand times more mortifying to the ministry: I should have rejoiced if you yourself had come forward and broken their windows to force them to illuminate for Sir Francis Burdett: they deserve that, and more too, at your hands; but I regret that you should accuse poor Mr. Bere of being disaffected to Government.

Before I take my leave, Gentlemen, I shall just observe to you, that, unless you publish the documents, sent you by Mr. Spencer, I shall cause those documents and this letter to be published in a hand-bill for the purpose of general distribution.

WM. CORBETT.

Pall-Mall, July 30, 1802.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

The great contest in the county of Middlesex has, at last, terminated in the complete triumph of Sir Francis Burdett. This contest, from the singular manner in which it was begun and conducted, has been regarded, by the lower orders of people, as a struggle between the magistrates and the thieves, and the result of it will have this most dreadful effect: it will embolden and increase the disorderly and dishonest part of this monstrously overgrown and profligate metropolis. In a political point of view, we, for our parts, must confess, that we cannot regard it as a subject of very deep regret. Mr. Mainwaring is certainly a worthy man and a good magistrate; but, he has not been remarkable for his courage and firmness as a member of Parliament. We well remember predicting, nearly two years ago, that he would verify the proverb of the two stools; and, were it not that law and justice have been struck at in his person, we should not be sorry, that the prediction has been fulfilled. Some of the addresses of Sir Francis Burdett contain, indeed, most inflammatory and dangerous sentiments: for instance, where he says, that the nomination of the sheriffs has been "illegally usurped from the people;" and there are several other passages, where, in forbearing to speak treason, he seems to have exercised no small degree of self-denial; but, we repeat our opinion, that even open rebellion would not be half so dangerous as the torpor, which has lately prevailed. Great fear was entertained by His Majesty's ministers, that Sir Francis would order a general illumination; and, we are informed, that considerable bodies of troops were stationed in different parts of the town to prevent the people from being forced to illuminate. Why was this? Sir Francis Burdett had as much right to order an illumination as Lord Hawkesbury and his worthy and sprightly colleague. Sir Francis's election is, at worst, not half so disgraceful to Middlesex, as their treaty is to England; nor would it have been more mortifying to be compelled to illuminate by the tenants of the Bastille, than by the myrmidons of the General Post-Office. "Oh," say the wiseacres, "but, peace was hailed by the unanimous voice of the people:" so, then, is the success of Sir Francis Burdett. The "mult of exultation and the delirium of joy," were not greater on the fatal first of October than on the 29th of July, nor was there a more general disposition to illuminate for the peace than for the election, until the Lord Mayor and Sir Richard Ford issued recommendations, which were received as the orders of government, and which were intended to be so received. Compared to the conduct of Lord Hawkesbury and his intelligent associate, Sir Francis Burdett, has, therefore, been singularly modest. Indeed, his foregoing the illumination is inexcusable. We should have liked to see him return the poisoned chalice back to the lips of the ministry. Another and better opportunity will offer itself for recording the many very interesting circumstances of this election, but, in the mean time, we cannot help saying a word as to the petition, which, it is said, Mr. Mainwaring intends to present against the return. It is our opinion, that this petition will never be presented; and, if it be, we are pretty certain, that it will fail of success. Mr. Addington already feels enough of the cares of this wicked world, without reviving the times of Wilkes and Liberty.

The news from Turkey leave but little room to doubt of the approaching downfall of that empire, of which there is every probability that France will have a large, or, at least, a profitable slice. Our Levant merchants, alarmed at the prospect of affairs at the scene of their speculations, have applied to Lord Hawkesbury on the subject, (see p. 115.). They have received for answer, that his Majesty's ministers have no reason to expect any violation of the integrity of Turkey; and that, with regard to the new and alarming privilege which the French have obtained, of navigation freely in the Black Sea, government has no knowledge of it; but, if the Turkish government should think proper to grant such privilege to the French republic, the English merchants may rest assured, that the French trader will obtain no advantage over them.—This answer is perfectly of a piece with those which were given to the several inquiries respecting Portugal and its colonies, respecting Malta, Louisiana, &c. &c. It amounts to this, that his Majesty's ministers know nothing at all of the matter, and that they dare not enquire.

Chaptal's letter, (see p. 110.) to Jourdan, the counsellor of state in Piedmont, together with the accompanying decree, seems to fix the fate of that country.—The French commercial regulations are of considerable interest, particularly as Antwerp is included amongst the ports of entry for colonial produce. It appears, that the merchants of the old French ports have used their utmost endeavours to prevent the revival of this famous emporium of trade; but they have not been able to obtain even a short delay. If the opening of the Scheldt will be so injurious to Bourdeaux, Nantz, and Havre, what will it be to Amsterdam, and what will it, in a very few years, be to London?

The American minister has informed the consuls of that country, (see p. 113.) that the Emperor of Morocco has commenced hostilities against the United States. Buonaparté has taken advantage of some squabble with these piratical states, to insinuate his intention of sending a force into Africa, which it is very probable he will do by way of a pretext for the re-occupation of Egypt. He neglects not, in the mean time, to keep up, and even to augment, his corps of Mamelukes.—Admiral De Winter, on the part of the Dutch, is, it seems, negotiating treaties with the Barbary powers; or, in other words, is settling the tribute they are to receive.

The indemnities are at last fixed upon; but the detail of the pillage has not yet been published. Buonaparté, while he seizes on Piedmont, and proscribes those of the people who were most faithful to their sovereign, compels the king of Naples to issue a proclamation, granting a general amnesty to all those who, in behalf of the French republic, had conspired against his throne and his life.

Villaret Joyeuse, with a fleet having eighteen thousand men on board, is now preparing to sail from Brest. Part of his force is destined for Louisiana under Bernadotte and Victor; the rest for St. Domingo. There was a time when a fleet with eighteen thousand men on board, in addition to 35 thousand already there, would not have sailed for the West-Indies, without some inquiries on the part of Great-Britain. But that time is past. We shall be suffered to ask no more questions, 'till we are completely surrounded; and then we shall be answered by the cannon of our enemy.

The fate of Toussaint is, as yet, undecided. It has been stated, in the London papers, that Buonaparté has resolved to bring him to trial for rebellion. We hardly think this. It would be very unwise. Such a proceeding would do too much honour to so mean an offender.

LONDON,

LONDON, July 31 to August 7, 1802.

[129]

TO THE EDITOR.

Stockholm, July 5, 1802.

Sir,—We are informed here, although not officially, that the British Cabinet has now thought proper to confirm the condemnation of our convoy.

Perhaps you may remember, Sir, that during the sittings of the Diet of Northkoping we represented to your ministry, "that the deed by which they should condemn our convoy would serve as a standard, around which the insulated sovereigns of Europe and America would rally in their own defence, or to protect the property of their trading subjects:" we at the same time proposed reconciliation, and offered an arrangement, the terms of which were much less humiliating to your naval pride than are those of your late conventions with Russia. The advances of our Court were treated with indifference; and you have seen your predictions in so far realized.

During the American and late war, your ministers have upon every occasion arrogantly insulted Sweden and Denmark, and constantly cringed to Russia. Catherine made your complaisance subservient to her own projects; her successor, as soon as he saw your arrogance to the weaker and your management with the great, disdained your politics; and actuated by a principle of heroic probity, he determined to detach himself from your influence.

But Paul I. never intended to countenance the usurpations of France; nor would he have been governed by her intrigues.

The death of this brave Prince (which you, and not Buonaparté, will soon have serious cause to lament), and the conversation which you held out as having been held between Count de Coteschaubey and our minister Baron Stedingk, at Petersburg, have it seems encouraged your Cabinet finally to confirm the condemnation of our property! Confiding in your presumed ascendancy over the late Emperor, you took our convoy; and, depending upon the friendship of his son, you have now condemned it.

The result of your presumed ascendancy over Paul is known; the effects of your confidence in the friendship of Alexander will by and by appear in more quarters than one.

You make us, as you say, accede to your convention with Russia—"that we," Sweden, "may not be insulated and left alone." That we shall not be left alone to ourselves, you have taken special care: but forcing your old friends and allies into other hands in the manner you have done, that is, by condemning the fair trading property of the one and seizing the territory of the other, may you not insulate yourselves from the good of the moral and political world? Believe, Sir, an impartial Swede, who has for these many years looked at the public world,—that you, I mean the British nation, will soon have to regret your late and present system of policy towards the weaker states! You have driven us all into the holdfast clutches of your enemies; and the avidity with which these powers have taken us up from almost your legs, to put us in a civil manner under their own feet, should not escape your notice.

You will not expect that we can be much interested in the reputation of those men who have brought about our dependency, and who have now ratified our bondage; however, when we see, that the same infatuation which lost the political existence of so many continental states, has now seized the British nation itself, we cannot resist an awful anxiety. Since the day the treaty of Luneville was signed, measures the most efficacious, that talents unshackled by either principle or morality can devise, have been and are arranging, to form against the British empire—such a combination of power as the world has yet never seen united in one cause. Sweden and Denmark, with the dominion of the Baltic, are driven by you under the orders of Russia; the King of Prussia who detests the British ministry (although he reveres your venerable sovereign) has acted as mediating negotiator between Alexander and Buonaparté—arranged the division of Germany, what they call the organization of Italy and Turkey; an orderly republic in Persia; and, as a matter of course, the deliverance of Hindostan. That America may not in anywise embarrass the operations of the coalition, Jefferson is invited to be a party; and, should he keep his feet, the American shipping will join the French at the Cape, or at the Isle de France, as soon as things are ripe. Admiral Lord Nelson's campaign in the Baltic has shewn to Russia the means of shutting that sea against the naval power of the world: the submission of, and alliance with, Toussaint's blacks in St. Domingo gives Buonaparté the absolute command of the West-Indies; the evacuation of Malta and Minorca gives him the command of the Dardanelles, and the sovereignty of the Mediterranean, (for what will you do there more than in the Baltic without a port or anchorage?) And, at the gates of the Seraglio, he can demand the keys of Cairo, Damascus, and Bassoria. The Russian army is now in full march to Ispahan, and may soon be encamped in the delightful plains of Cubal Pajab; the Tartarian chiefs from Korsá by Bokira to Grand Thibet are in alliance or connexion with Russia—the Russian officer (a Swede) who drew up the plan of the conquest of Persia, and had it approved of in Paris about twelve months ago, is now, with two of our engineers, who are in the service of the Port, surveying Persia and the western and northern frontiers of Hindostan; the orders for artillery and arms from here to Holland and France, to be carried to the Cape, Batavia, and Pegu, are immense. In short, we presume, that as you cannot pretend to save Jamaica when Buonaparté is sovereign lord of the whole Island of St. Domingo, no more can you protect your eastern possessions when Russia and France are jointly masters of the Dardanelles, and governors of Persia.

We are not angry with you on account of our convoy only; but that you have suffered Russia and France to join hands and enslave the world, is a terrible consideration. You had Malta, the Cape, and might have had Sweden and Denmark with the Baltic open: in what could intrigue or open hostility have helped your enemies? Who can now prevent the junction of their forces and resist their powers? That these two mighty empires may quarrel when they are in contact, is very probable; but they will, in all likelihood, subdue the world first; and it can be no very pleasant prospect to you, nor to us, that our countries and possessions shall be ravaged and laid waste by their future contentions.

Buonaparté amuses you with rivalry in trade and national improvement: if you believe him you will not long be his rival in power.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Sir Francis Burdett having, in an address to the Middlesex Electors, obtruded his political sentiments, in a most offensive garb, on the public, I conceive it will not be considered as either uncandid or illiberal to analyze this curious production. He begins by endeavouring to invalidate the opinion, which he says, Mr. Mainwaring has endeavoured to impress on the public, that, the opposition to his re-election, was in fact, an attack on the government. I have not read many of Mr. Mainwaring's advertisements on this occasion, or heard any of his speeches; but, admitting the fact, can Sir Francis, or any of his supporters say, that there was no latent hostility, no secret enmity to the government, which urged him to the contest? In what act, let me ask, of his whole political life has he manifested any affection? any attachment? and, I will say, any loyalty towards it? Has he not on all, and, on every occasion, displayed the most inveterate hatred, the most implacable rancour against it? Did not O'Connor, the infamous O'Connor, the very high-priest of treason, the most deadly foe of England, did not this arch-rebel, though animated with the most rancorous enmity, declare, that he loved this very detested country, merely because it had given birth to Sir Francis Burdett? With such a man, so loved, and so distinguished, opposition to any government, which is supported by wise laws, and which possesses sufficient energy to enforce them, must be a fixed and leading principle: it will force itself into all his words, into all his actions, and, cast a dark and ominous shade over his whole conduct. I therefore have a right to concur, and I do most heartily concur in the opinion, that a virulent hatred to the government, which protects even him, was the grand and first object of the contest. But, I will confute him from his own confession. I will bring forward the opinion of this philanthropic patriot to his own conviction. He has asserted indirectly and by implication, and a perusal of his letter will bear me out, that the government of this country is a government of tyranny and oppression, of secret and concealed torture. This has always been the burden of his parliamentary effusions, and is now become that of his electioneering compositions. After these insinuations, too gross, and too palpable to be mistaken, he declares his opposition to have been to such a government, thereby convicting himself in the fullest manner; for the first part of his letter will evidently bear the construction, of a denial to the opinion, which he asserts Mr. Mainwaring to have been endeavouring to impress on the public mind. He avows his opposition to have been to "any government by secret " and concealed torture." Is it the governments of Turkey, France, or Prussia which he opposes? I have not heard that either of these despotic powers have ever experienced any of his venomous attacks. The question is therefore reduced to one point. It can be no other than the government under which he lives; under which his person, his property, and even his tongue, his lips, and his pen are free. Grateful patriot! This I suppose is patriotic consistency; or, may we not rather say, that in the heat of jacobinical rancour, consistency was forgotten and truth involuntarily forced its way.

He says, that, the number of voters who have given their suffrages to Mr. Mainwaring, is no proof to him, that they approve his political conduct. Sir Francis has been rather unfortunate in thus making numbers the test of approbation, and, furnishes another proof of the imbecility of the mind, which could suffer the heated impulse of an imprisoned moment to prevail over prudence; I will examine this matter, and try him by his own test, on the score of political virtue.

Out of 6143 votes, Sir Francis has a majority of 271, after a contest of unprecedented length, and in which, until the last two or three days, Mr. Mainwaring had a majority nearly double that of Sir Francis's. Report declares that this majority was not obtained in a way, which a high sense of honour could easily justify. It is said, that, a few out of a considerable number of doubtful voters, were artfully and purposely brought forward to vote for Mr. Mainwaring, who objected to them, as being, in his opinion, illegal; but, that either Sir Francis, or his friends, expressed a conviction, of their legality. Mr. Mainwaring, like other honest men, who are dupes to the artful, was caught in the snare, and the votes were accordingly admitted. A precedent being thus established, the whole body immediately came forward, and turned the scale in favour of the triumphant candidate. This speaks for itself, it needs no comment. Setting aside the votes thus obtained, I apprehend Sir Francis would have little cause to triumph in his supposed political superiority in the opinion of the electors; and, taking his own test as a criterion of the political merits of Mr. Mainwaring and himself, in the public opinion, it will appear that Mr. Mainwaring is considered by the county of Middlesex, as the most proper person to represent them.

Sir Francis highly elated by his success, and, in a moment of exultation and tumult of joy, undoubtedly considers himself as a most sublime patriot, and as the idol of the mob. Envious distinction!—I will allow him to be so; and, recurring again to his own test, assert, that Mr. Mainwaring is inferior only to him, in the proportion of 3207 to 2936, the numbers on the poll. By the same rule (his own) Sir Francis is infinitely inferior to Mr. Byng in political merit, as the latter gentleman has a majority over Sir Francis of no less than 641; a majority over Sir Francis, greater than his over Mr. Mainwaring. I conclude, still adhering to his own test, that this is no small proof of the real sentiments of the county, on the political virtues of Sir Francis Burdett. If the votes alluded to, should ultimately prove null, what will become of his political virtues. I will tell him; they will sink to the Bathos. Is this circumstance of the doubtful votes a fact, or is it not? If it is false, let Sir Francis Burdett come forth, in conscious virtue bold, and publicly deny it. It will wipe off one of the stigmas which this election has fixed upon him.

But, the most serious charge I have against him is, the attempt he has made in this letter, to insinuate that government has had recourse to secret execution. This is so black and diabolical an insinuation, that no power of language can sufficiently mark its infamy. Does he mean to say, that prisoners have been secretly executed without a trial? Can he have the effrontery to assert it? Let him bring forward his proofs; proofs clearly substantiated. I dare him to do it. But no; he cannot; he dare not; and, the attempt to fix such a crime on the government, is to the full as atrocious as the actual commission of it, and merits the strongest, and most pointed reprobation. Can measures, sanctioned by Parliament and approved by a vast majority of the country; measures, evidently adopted for the security of our persons, our properties, and our laws, be called tyranny and oppression? It has been the happy lot of this country, to possess a minister, whose great and comprehensive mind was competent to the difficulties of our situation; by whose effective and decisive measures, the disaffected have been crushed, and compelled to hide their diminished heads; and, it will reflect the most resplendent lustre on the British character to the latest posterity, that the people had the wisdom to approve, and the fortitude to support them. Sir Francis need not be told, that by these insinuations, he is highly reflecting on the Parliament; which he probably intends. The measures which have prevented the seditious from disturbing the peace and good order of the country, and for whose sufferings, though justly inflicted, he feels such a tender regard, were approved in Parliament; and dares he censure its decree? It really excites something like a smile to observe how very limited is the loving-kindness of this tender-hearted philanthropist. It has never come to my knowledge, that he has extended it to any other criminals. Did he ever bring before the House the cause of the widow or the orphan, unconnected with politics? or of some unfortunate wretch, languishing in prison, rather through his own misfortunes, or the villainy of others, than from any crimes? Did he ever from the purse, which now so readily overflows; did he ever glad the heart of the unfortunate debtor, and restore him to his afflicted and starving family, and to society? Let him satisfactorily answer these questions, before he makes a parade of his philanthropic humanity, in behalf of acquitted felons and the pests of society.

He says, he loves his country, and its tranquillity. What a prostitution of the noblest of all principles! Our patriotic philanthropist proves this, by advocating the cause of its bitterest enemies. Is it love for our country to display, on every occasion, the most rooted animosity to its constitution and government? Is it love for our country to take a decided part with the seditious and disaffected? Is it love for our country, to treat with contempt the laws, and its administrators? Away with such hypocritical cant. If this be love of our country, I confess I have none of it. Sir Francis may again assert it; but, where is the credulous fool who will believe it.

The whole tenor of this letter is of so seditious and inflammatory a description, and marks so strongly the rancorous and Catalinian mind of the writer, that it cannot be too strongly reprobated, or too conspicuously held up, to the detestation of the country.

TO THE FRIEND OF MR. HUSKISSON.

Fall-Mall, 3d Aug. 1802.

Sir, Having been contradicted by you (see Register, p. 65) with respect to Mr. Huskisson's commercial connexions, I have naturally been led to pursue my inquiries relative thereto, and, in answer to your positive assertion, that Mr. Huskisson has "never been, either directly or indirectly, connected with any commercial establishment, of any description, in any quarter of the world," I have now positively and publicly to assert, that, the assignees of Boyd and Benfield, bankrupts, found, in the accounts of the said bankrupts, a balance of between twenty and thirty thousand pounds against your friend Mr. Huskisson, which money was paid by Mr. Huskisson (out of what fund I know not) to the said assignees.—Now, Sir, where the balance was so great, what must have been the amount of the account current? What must have been the magnitude of the transactions? They must surely have amounted to "a connexion, either direct or indirect, with a commercial establishment?" And the fact does, I am afraid, clearly prove you to have been deceived. Give me leave to hope, Sir, that you will clear this matter up; that you will tell us how your friend came to be involved in this great concern, while he was under secretary of state, (for such you will have him to have been) in the office of that acute and disinterested gentleman, Mr. Henry Dundas; and, that you will also have the complaisance to inform us, whence the money came to discharge the balance due to Boyd and Benfield. In re-tracing Mr. Huskisson, we find him, in 1793, a garçon apothicaire at Paris; in 1794 and 1795 we find him a clerk in the alien office, on a salary of about three hundred a year; in 1796 he becomes under secretary of state, at a salary of 2,000 a year, in which situation the bankruptcy of Boyd and Co. overtook him. All the money he had ever received in his whole life could not have amounted to more than five or six thousand pounds, and as to his savings they must have been very small indeed. Pray tell us, therefore, where he got the twenty thousand pounds to pay to the assignees of Boyd and Benfield.—This is no private matter, Sir; Mr. Huskisson is a public man; he is resolved to be a public man; his friend, Mr. Dundas, will thrust him forward. Defeated at Dover, his tutelar deity carries him off to the Highlands of Scotland. I am to be compelled to submit to laws of his making, and he shall be compelled to submit to my investigation of the character and conduct of himself and his patron.—In my next I shall inquire into the probable connexion between the transactions with Boyd and Benfield, and late transactions at Dover, and in the Scotch boroughs.

I am, Sir, your most humble servant,

WM. COBBETT.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

DIET OF PRESBOURG.

First sitting, May 6, 1802.—The sitting was opened by a speech from one of the members, Simsey, Knight of the Order of St. Stephen, in which he reminded the States of the duties imposed on them by their convocation. A deputation was then charged to repair to the Archduke Palatine, sitting with the Magnates of the Kingdom in another hall, and to announce to his Royal Highness, that the States had obeyed the orders of his Majesty in repairing to their posts. The Archduke Palatine replied by another deputation, composed of Magnates, and assured the States of his attachment, good wishes, and satisfaction. The States made choice of the members who were to repair to Vienna, in order to invite their Imperial Majesties to honour the Diet with their presence. A discussion took place, on the manner in which their Majesties were to be received, on the interior organization of the sittings, and on the division of the labour.—The sitting then rose.

Second sitting, May 11.—Report of the deputation sent to Vienna. The States were then engaged with some details on lodging the members. The sitting then rose.

Third sitting, May 13.—The speech addressed to their Majesties the preceding evening, on their arrival at Presbourg, was read.—His Majesty entered the hall of the assembly.—His appearance was celebrated by several orators, among whom was Count Plafly. The Emperor addressed the States as follows:

“It is needless to call to your remembrance here what no one can be ignorant of, viz. that the first years of our reign were destined through necessity, to the maintenance of a cruel war, and that all our thoughts, which it would have been agreeable to us to employ in the calmness of peace to the prosperity of our States, were entirely absorbed by the care of preserving the Monarchy entire, and securing, against inevitable dissolution, the bonds which unite so many people faithful to our person. For this reason the Diets which we then convoked had no other, and could have no other object than to deliberate on the means of removing the danger and defending the dignity of the Throne. In this we not only were assisted by your counsels, but we experienced also the efficacy of your support; for, when the chances of war permitted the enemy to penetrate at two different times into our Hereditary States of Germany, you spared no expense to collect always with incredible speed a new army fit for the operations of war, which aspired after nothing but danger and glory, and which never hesitated, under the direction and by the example of our well-beloved brother, your Duke Palatine, to sacrifice themselves for us and for the Monarchy.

“The remembrance of this generous devotion will never be effaced from our memory; and we recollect also, and with no less satisfaction, that not only some, but all of you, inspired by the most affecting love for us and for your country, were not satisfied with granting the subsidies in men, money, and provisions decreed by the States, but by a free and spontaneous movement you made a sacrifice to the public cause of all the means which were in your power. But, notwithstanding the cares which the war required, we never ceased, as much as circumstances would permit, to turn our attention to the internal happiness of our States; and we ought, indeed, to say, that those whom you appointed to act in concert with us discharged worthily, and agreeably to our royal will, the task imposed upon them, by devising and proposing every thing that could tend to maintain and promote the public welfare. Now that we are freed from the cares of war, our paternal solicitude, though claimed by every part of the public administration, ought, however, to be particularly directed towards the means which tend to guarantee external security, which is the basis of all civil existence; for, as has been proved by the recent dangers of the war, it is impossible to enjoy one's property unless it be secured from foreign incursions. This security can be effectually acquired only by keeping in readiness all the means necessary for its defence, and these means themselves can be acquired only by efforts and sacrifices.

"We shall not enter into any farther explanations. We have the certainty of being understood, and the confidence that your dispositions can never be any other, than those which you have always testified, even in the most difficult conjunctures—it is with this confidence that we signify to you our royal will, and the wishes which we judge useful to the public prosperity. After the sentiments which are well known to us, and which animate both the heart of a beloved brother, and that of all orders of the state, we have no doubt that you, gentlemen, will all make it a duty to deliberate with that gravity, which is suited to the importance of the object, and with that celerity, which will cause every thing that may be more particularly interesting to the internal prosperity, to be immediately discussed with success.

"In regard to us, we have, and never will have any thing so much at heart as to labour, as we are obliged, that we may rest on solid bases, and transmit untouched to our successors, the maintenance, dignity, and happiness of the kingdom of Hungary, of that kingdom which we have always considered as one of our firmest supports, both in regard to the numerous advantages we derive from its soil, and of the noble sentiments and warlike ardour by which the inhabitants are animated. Persuaded then, as we are, of the attachment of all orders of the state, and convinced of the share we shall have in the glory and affectionate remembrance of posterity, we wish, gentlemen, that you may all and each of you be assured of our Imperial and Royal clemency."

Then followed a speech from the Archduke Palatine, and a declaration of attachment in the name of the States.

When the Emperor had retired, the Archduke Palatine made known, through the organ of the Prothonotary of the kingdom, the propositions which were to be the object of the deliberations of the Diet. These propositions were, 1st, To provide that the regular militia of the kingdom of Hungary should be always complete. 2d. To increase the price of salt, it being known that the ordinary revenue of two millions of florins is not sufficient to cover the expenses of the state.

The States having deliberated upon the propositions of the Emperor, agreed, upon proof of the present state of the Hungarian legions, to pay the precise sum required in augmentation, in consideration of a free exportation of its productions being granted to Hungary, not only for the Hereditary States, but every foreign country whatever. The answer of the Emperor, communicated by the Archduke, stated that the number of troops should be according to the capitulation of 1790 and 1791, and to be raised by conscription; that two millions of florins were necessary for present expenses; and that he must consult with the States before he could grant the demand with respect to trade in its full extent. This answer being discussed, it was finally agreed, that the number of troops to complete the Hungarian army should be granted until the next Diet, the operation of raising them to be in proportion to the population; and should circumstances require a greater force, the point to be settled with the States in a Diet convened for the purpose. This plan being communicated to the Archduke Palatine, he in a few moments after announced his assent to it.

Proclamation made by Ricbepaise, General in Chief of the Army of Guadaloupe, to the Inhabitants of that Colony.

Citizens! I hasten to announce to you, that the French Revolution has at length reached its ultimate degree of power and stability. The definitive peace has just reconciled all the nations of Europe; and you see, by the articles of that solemn compact, how advantageous the stipulations have been in favour of the Mother-Country. Know further, that the government which has sent me, actuated by its profound wisdom, has nearly brought to perfection, in the course of two years, the work of public felicity. Its power is not to be shaken, because it resides in a well-founded confidence in the regard of good Citizens, and in the affection and energy of the armies, which is respected by the Cabinet of every Sovereign, and blessed by all the children of the Republic.—The warriors whom I have introduced among you, are part of those on whose victories was raised, on the 18th Brumaire, the new constitutional edifice. Go, said the French Government, to them, elevate your glory to the highest pitch, by triumphing over the last opposition to its authority in distant countries. There you will have less enemies to conquer than errors to correct—your presence will dissipate them. The inhabitants of Guadaloupe have offered their tribute of courage, by preventing the destruction of their country. There is in the profession of arms a happy sympathy, which unites by the ties of honour all the defenders of their country. They desire to become the associates of your reputation; they hope to find in you brothers, and soon the ancient bonds which attached them to the common centre, will be confirmed by you.—It is my duty, Citizens, to realize this hope; it is also the wish of my heart to do so. Those brave soldiers who have so many times confronted death against the enemies of France, are only here as the protectors of your homes, and as models of virtuous warriors and Frenchmen, like yourselves. The act of authority of their chief, will be assurances of your happiness. You will anticipate their effects by your voluntary return to good order, by an entire submission to the government which I represent, and by the oblivion of animosity; but if the important ministry I am come to fulfil among you, should fail in producing universal conviction, and if there should any remain who are so senseless as to disregard the legitimate power of the government, the natural vengeance, which has been so long restrained, will overwhelm them.—Disgrace and death will be their portion.—The present proclamation shall be printed, published, affixed, and sent to the Communes.—Done at Pointe-à-Pitre, the 17th Floréal, 10th year of the French Republic, one and indivisible.

Richepanse.

Head-Quarters at the Cape, June 11, 1802.

Citizens,—That Toussaint conspired, you will be able to judge by the annexed letter to Citizen Fontaine. I could not compromise the tranquillity of the colony. I arrested him, made him embark, and sent him to France, where he must render an account of his conduct to the French Government. In another letter, addressed to Citizen Fontaine, he loads General Christophe with invective, and complains that General Dessalines had abandoned him.—He had prohibited Sylla from laying down his arms, and forbid the cultivators to labour in any other plantations than those adapted to their own subsistence.—He had sent one of his accomplices to General Dessalines, to engage him to break his good faith. General Dessalines declared it to me.—He relied much at St. Marc, on Manisset. He is arrested.—I have proceeded with severity against this great criminal; and I ordered the Generals of division of the army, to compel by force all the cultivators who are yet in arms in the mountains, to return.—The cultivators are not so culpable as those who lead them astray. In consequence, every commandant of the National Guard, every officer, every manager or proprietor, who shall be found assembled in arms, shall be immediately shot.—As to the commune of Ennery, I order it to be disarmed immediately, for having been so tardy in submitting.—General Brunet will see this order executed.—The Chief of the Etat Major will print, publish, and post up the present order, with the letter of Gen. Toussaint, and circulate it throughout the army and the colony.

Leclerc.

Copy of a Letter of the Ex-general Toussaint Louverture, to Citizen Fontaine.

Quarter of Louverture, May 27, 1802.

You send me no news, Citizen. Remain at the Cape as long as you can.—It is said General Leclerc is ill at Tortue: be particular in informing me relative to that subject.—We shall see . . . for the a . . . of the news. As to the corn, which we must have as before, it cannot be sent till they have passed the Saona, in order to know the point where it can be placed in safety.—If you see the General in Chief, be sure to tell him that the cultivators will no longer obey me. They wish to labour at Hericourt, which the manager ought not to suffer.—Try if you can gain some person near the General in Chief, in order to render D . . . free:—he will be very useful to me by his credit, as to news and otherwise.—Tell Gengembre that he must not quit Le Borgne, where the cultivators must not labour.—Direct to the habitation of Najac.

The Hague, July 22.—It is said that the Government of State has summoned the Legislative Assembly to hold an extraordinary meeting on the 2d of August ensuing:—General Macdonald, it is expected, will have the command of the French troops in this Republic, in the room of General Victor, who, it is said, goes out to Louisiana, as Commander in Chief and Governor General.

July 23.—The Commercial Treaty, which is negotiating, as we are informed, with England, will doubtless introduce some modifications of the prohibitory system which now prevails. Experience has sufficiently shewn that prohibitions do not prevent the introduction of foreign articles of manufacture. If these modifications of the system of prohibition, which all well-informed merchants desire, be adopted, they will give a greater extension to Canal Navigation. It is to be hoped these observations will not escape the vigilant eye of Government.—Moniteur.

The Minister of Marine thus closes his Letter to the Maritime Prefect of Brest:—"I am fully convinced of this principle, that the Colonies should exist only for the benefit of the mother country, and particularly for its commerce, hence the report I made to the First Consul on the propriety of reviving the regulations of the Decree of the month of August, 1784. But that these regulations should be followed, it is indispensable that the French commerce should be exerted in supplying our colonies, in order that none of them may be left destitute; for it would be the height of injustice to reserve their commerce exclusively for the mother country, if the commerce of the latter did not provide that their produce should not be abandoned and regularly exchanged against articles of French industry. The commerce of France is very naturally about to be directed to her great colonies, but those of the second order must not be neglected. I fix its attention in a peculiar manner on Tobago and Cayenne, the former of which yields about 12,000,000 of livres produce, and Cayenne only requires commercial activity to arrive at a very high degree of splendour.

"The commerce of France will perceive it to be its interest, to establish connections and correspondence, and to direct its operations on these important colonies, so that returning the whole of their produce, they may be certain of receiving by a regular exchange, whatever their taste or wants may require."

July 25.—Rear-Admiral Gantheaume is appointed Maritime Prefect of the sixth district.—Citizen Ducis, Judge of the Criminal Tribunal of Appeal at Paris, is appointed Commissary of Justice at St. Domingo.—The Commissary of Commercial Relations of the Batavian Republic, residing at Nantes, has announced that he has been informed by a dispatch from the Secretary of State of his Government, that the Bank of Amsterdam is re-established on its ancient footing, and conformable to the mode of its primitive institution.—We learn from the frontiers of Russia, that a numerous army is assembled there, probably for the purpose of re-establishing tranquillity in Wallachia.

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Horse-Guards, July 7, 1802.

The Commander in Chief is pleased to approve of general officers commanding districts, granting leave of absence to officers from this period to the 10th of March next (when, in conformity to his Majesty's regulations, all officers are to be present with their respective regiments), under the following limitations and restrictions; and in the event of regiments being in stations not composing parts of military districts under the command of general officers, it is his Royal Highness's pleasure, that the officers commanding shall be at liberty to use their discretion in extending the indulgence of leave of absence, under the same restrictions, to the officers of their respective regiments:—Half the field-officers, captains, and subaltern officers, shall be always present with their regiments.—General officers commanding in districts, or the colonels or field officers in command of regiments (as the case may be), may grant leave of absence to such other officers, whose private affairs require it, taking care always to detain, or from time to time to call in, a sufficient number of officers to do the duty of the regiment or battalion, in case it should be so situated as to require the attendance of more officers than those before mentioned, which are directed to be constantly present.—It is to be observed, that no officer (except in the performance of duty, or for the purpose of joining his regiment) is to quit the United Kingdom, without having first received his Majesty's special permission for so doing.—The officers appointed to carry on the recruiting service, shall not be included in the number hereby fixed for the constant duty of the regiment, or battalion, or by the number of those who shall be further called in by the commanding officer for that duty.—That the monthly return of such regiment and battalion be made up, and transmitted as ordered; and that the commanding officer, by whom each return shall be signed, do carefully examine the same, as he is to be responsible that they are in every respect conformable to the regulations before-mentioned.—That the number of officers hereby ordered to be present, shall remain with their commands until they shall be relieved; and that the commanding officer be enjoined not to permit them to absent themselves from duty on which they are employed, except in cases of great emergency, and then but for two days only; and all leaves so granted are to be signified in the next return, with the reasons for granting them.—It is to be understood, that although commanding officers are permitted by this order to use with discretion this indulgence to officers under their command, yet that the commanding officer hath not hereby a right to absent himself, neither is it meant that he should quit the quarters of his regiment, not even for two days, without leave obtained from the general officer commanding in the district, or in the event of the regiment being out of districts, without making application to head quarters.

By order of his Royal Highness the Commander in Chief,

Harry Calvert, Adj. Gen. of the Forces.

EAST-INDIES.

The following official Letter from Major-General Campbell, commanding the forces in the ceded districts, to the Government of Madras, has just been received via Bombay.

To John Chaunier, Esq. Chief Secretary to the Government, Fort St. George.

Sir,—I have great satisfaction in reporting, for the information of the Right Hon. the Governor in Council, the following particulars relative to the operation against Timakull, which have happily terminated in the fall of that fort, and chastisement of its rebel defenders. Immediately after the affair of the 20th inst. I detached Major Strachan, Captain Noble, and Mr. Deputy Commissary Best, to Gooty, to prepare such heavy guns as the place afforded. On a minute inspection, only one iron twelve, one iron and one brass nine-pounder, were found fit for our purpose. By the strenuous exertions of the garrison, these guns were brought down from the rock, and 250 rounds of ammunition for each, with carriages, and the articles necessary to keep them in order, were got ready; and with this supply the Major and party arrived in camp on the 26th. Fascines and gabions had been made here; and in the night of the 29th, a battery for six guns, against the north-west curtain of the lower fort, was constructed by Captain Crosdill, of Artillery; and another for three guns against the east face of the fort and citadel, by

Lieut. Fitchet, of his Majesty's 73d regiment: the guns were also got into them, and at a quarter past six o'clock yesterday morning, both opened with the best possible effect. In the course of the day, the fire of Lieut. Fitchet's battery effected a practicable breach in the lower wall, and at the same time opened the face of the citadel; while that from Capt. Crosdill's made a breach in the curtain sufficiently wide for a company to enter abreast.—These desirable objects being attained, the line turned out at half past three in the afternoon, and the storming parties were formed in the following order: that for the north-west breach under Lieutenant Colonel Davis, seconded by Major Strachan, consisting of the flank and two battalion companies of his Majesty's 73d regiment; one company of the 2d battalion of the 4th regiment; and four companies of the 1st battalion of the 12th regiment, native, flanked by forty volunteer dismounted dragoons of his Majesty's 25th regiment: that for the eastern breach, under Captain Robert Munro, consisted of three battalion companies of his Majesty's 73d regiment; the flank companies of the 2d battalion of the 4th regiment, and two companies of the 2d battalion of the 15th regiment, native infantry. At a quarter before four o'clock the troops were ordered to advance, and in half an hour were completely masters of the place, the rebels having quitted the works, and retreated to their well-built houses, where they for some time individually defended themselves: most of them were, however, killed, and of those who fled, but very few, if any, escaped the cavalry, who surrounded the fort. To the honour of the troops, I must beg leave to add, that every woman and child was humanely spared, only two of the former, and none of the latter, having fallen, even from accidental shot. The wound formerly received by Lieutenant-Colonel Moneyppenny, deprived me of his valuable services on the present occasion; but his place was most ably filled by Lieutenant-Colonel Davis; and though it is difficult to discriminate where all have behaved in a manner so honourable to themselves, with such perfect unanimity, and so much to my entire satisfaction, I yet feel it my duty to point out to his lordship's notice, Lieutenant-Colonel Moneyppenny, Lieutenant-Col. Davis, Major Strachan, Capt. Robert Munro, apt. Crosdill, Capt. Noble, and Lieut. Fitchet, as officers whose zeal and ability have shone conspicuous throughout, and to whose exertions I am particularly indebted.

Much praise is due to my Aid-de-Camp, Captain Read, whose zeal and activity, during our various operations against the place, were unremitted. Nor can I pass over in silence the meritorious conduct of Lieut. Maclean, of his Majesty's 25th light dragoons, who on the several attacks of the 14th, 20th, and 30th inst., stepped voluntarily forward to accompany Major Strachan. —The conduct of Mr. Deputy Commissary Best has also been much to my satisfaction. —It gives me the most heart-felt pleasure to add, that not a life has been lost on this occasion, and that the accompanying return (not received), of wounded, will be found to contain but very few. The officers and most of the men formerly wounded, are doing well.—A minute examination of the fort, and the knowledge since obtained, enables me to add, that the attack made by Major Strachan, on the 14th inst. was by no means more spirited than judicious, for determined resistance must long ere that have been the fixed intention of the rebels, as it is now ascertained that the several gates were previously built up.—The Potal, or Killedar, of Timakul, has been hanged, but the women, children, and such of the wounded rebels as were collected after the assault of yesterday, have been permitted to depart.—It is my intention to destroy the whole of the fort, and I feel confident that this example will effectually restore the tranquillity of the Adoni Province.

I have the honour to be, &c.

TO THE EDITOR.

Baltimore, June 14, 1802.

Dear Sir.—I begin to think, that a peace was necessary; for your country seems to be destitute of that superior order of men, who are qualified to wield the arms and resources of a great and powerful nation, in the manner the war required, and against such a foe as you had to contend with. Perhaps the ministers were conscious of this imbecility, and availed themselves of the moment of victory to obtain the best terms they could. There are men who have not minds strong enough to meet unmoved the storms of war, who are nevertheless well qualified to direct the operations of peace. This appears to be the character of Mr. Pitt, who, with no want of personal courage, has betrayed much political pusillanimity. During the whole of the war, the burthen of all his orations was peace; and, the man who fights for peace will certainly be beaten by him who fights for glory.

On this side of the water we are in daily expectation of hearing that a large body of Frenchmen have landed at New Orleans, to take possession of Louisiana. Notwithstanding all the quibbling of their partizans to the contrary, as soon as the bloody business of Guadaloupe and St. Domingo is dispatched, they will be ready to embrace their ancient allies with a fraternal hug. This idea you may safely conclude gave us all the horrors: I say, all, because, a few mercenary jacobins excepted, the French have very few real friends in the United States. Honest men always detested them, and knaves begin to suspect that Buonaparté is rather unfriendly to the great cause of universal insurrection.

The time seems to be approaching, when the citizens of these States will be punished for their former attachment to France. If the Corsican sends a considerable number of his armed slaves, to fraternize with the south-in and western States, at a time when the whole country is divided by the most bitter animosities, and are ready to cut one-another's throats, without his invitation, a good providence only can save us. Whether this interposition will be evidenced by paralyzing the arms, and confounding the councils of our enemies, or by raising up some powerful friend and ally, must be left to the Almighty Being, whose councils are as unsearchable as they are wise.

The evils of this French vicinage may not appear in their full magnitude for a few years, but to me they seem inevitable. For Frenchmen never remained long at peace with any neighbouring nation, which was too proud to submit to their controul. But whenever this misfortune occurs, the dispassionate spectator will, I am afraid, be obliged to acknowledge, that it has been merited by the United States.

Probably one of the first manœuvres of the French, after they are settled in Louisiana, will be to tamper with the savage tribes bordering on Canada, with the white inhabitants of our western territories, and with their own countrymen settled in Canada, in order to prepare the way for the invasion of that province. This, doubtless, will be their first attempt, as the easiest mode of virtually subjugating the United States, and one in which the enemies of Great-Britain, scattered through the country, will more readily co-operate.

To prevent this disaster, immediate attention should be paid by the British Government to the state of Canada; the friendship of the savages should be conciliated by all possible means; and the military posts should be well fortified and garrisoned; in short, the country should be placed in such an attitude of defence, as to discourage the attempt. The enemy will then confine his machinations to the United States, for he must be engaged in mischief: and here I trust he will meet with a complete discomfiture, if we partake of your assistance at a proper crisis. Although your ministry seem to have lost sight of the awful and ambitious character of your enemy, as well as of your own real superiority, if we judge from the terms of the treaty of peace, they can hardly be so blind as not to see the danger that will threaten Canada, when the French are possessed of the banks of the Mississippi. When these possessed Canada formerly, they spread their military posts from the St. Lawrence to the former river, proceeding from north to south; they have always regretted the loss of that country; and they will now strive to recover it from you, by proceeding from south to north.

The removal of federalists, and the promotion of democrats, seems to be the order of the day. Jefferson seems determined not to leave a man of his enemies in office—and as soon as they are displaced, the jacobin editors of newspapers dress up the poor ex-officers like devils, to frighten the ignorant herd. This recalls to my mind the transactions of former times; when to prepare the way for independence, the British Government and all its servants were calumniated and vilified to the utmost; and I am disposed to view the present democratic tricks as an apt exemplification of the lex talionis.

There is a formidable schism among the members of the reigning sect. Aaron Burr, the Vice-President, has done some acts to excite the jealousy of its leaders. He declines their company; he has given his vote, in some cases, in opposition to their measures; and he has been heard to express himself irreverently of their financial talents. He has taken some pains to suppress the history of Adams' administration, written by an English jacobin, and he is accused of harbouring a design to supplant Jefferson at the next election; all which you will read in some of the pamphlets published here. Besides, they think he has too much independence and firmness of mind, as well as soundness of intellects, to continue long under their tutelage; for this reason they begin to suspect that he is a scoundrel, and unworthy of the favours of the sovereign people. At the next election, therefore, Citizen Burr must be either President of the United States, or nothing; and indeed, aut Caesar, aut Nihil, is a motto well suited to his ambitious mind. You know that he is a man of great industry, of infinite art and address, and must agree with me that unless his enemies are uncommonly active, it is not improbable, he will tumble their idol, mammoth, from his throne.

The federalists, however, suspect Burr; and, to acknowledge a sad truth, not only the next election, but every other political event in this country, will, it is to be feared, depend upon the views and interests of Buonaparté: we are, as usual bold in dulations, but, if Buonaparté's friendship, or rather his forbearance, is to be purchased only by the continuation of Jefferson in power, in power he will continue.

In perusing Sir F. Eden's Letters on the Peace with Buonaparté (which you were so good as to send me) I was particularly struck with the great decrease of British shipping, employed in the fisheries from 1790 to 1800, which was a diminution of more than 40,000 tons; as well as with the comparative state of the tonnage of British and foreign vessels, cleared outwards, from England and Scotland to the United States of America, in 1789, and the eleven following years. The first year was about the time our Navigation Act took place. At this time the British tonnage to the United States was more than 72,000 tons, and the foreign (or American) 29,000 tons: in 1792, before you had felt the effects of the war, and solely by the operation of our navigation law, your tonnage had fallen down to 51,000, and ours, by a gradual increase, had risen to near 60,000; and, still more, in 1800 the former had sunk to 14,000, and the latter had swelled to the enormous amount of 110,000 tons! Think of this, ye sages of the British Senate, and if you can account for the phenomenon on any other principle than the superior policy of my country, it is more than I can!

I am yours, &c.

* * * * *

P.S. June 17.—Since writing the foregoing I have read with indignation that you have suffered a second time by an illuminating mob, and that some of the servants of the General Post-Office were concerned in the outrages. It is ungenerous in the administration, that, not satisfied with making knaves and fools dance and sing, to celebrate the humiliation of Old England, and their own dishonour, they will not suffer honest men to look sad at the same time. Upon my word, this is a trait of sansculottism, unworthy the "defenders of religion and social order."

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

It was our intention to have entered into a refutation of certain political doctrines, which Sir Francis Burdett has published and pasted through the county of Middlesex; but, upon closer examination, we find them to proceed upon notions so directly subversive of the laws and government of the country, that any controversy with him must necessarily have for its object, to prove the inexpediency of destroying the monarchy of England. To reason with such a man would be absurd: he must be treated with silent contempt, or be combated with weapons very different from a pen. While, however, we declare our abhorrence of the principles and conduct of the man, who, in alluding to the British government, speaks of "liars, magistrates, parliaments, and kings;" while we detest and loath Sir Francis Burdett, while we would trample upon him, for his false, base, and insolent insinuations and assertions respecting his and our sovereign, we are by no means inclined to join in the clamorous lamentations of those, who regret his success merely because it is a triumph over the ministry, who have, in the Middlesex election, met with no more than a just punishment for their conduct towards Mr. Baker, whose only offence was having voted against that deed of everlasting disgrace, the treaty of Amiens. The ministers and their peace-loving partizans, so far from having reason to complain of Sir Francis, are the only people in the whole world who have not a right to complain of him. The arts he has made use of have been borrowed from them, and from them alone. In order to carry the measure which was to secure them in their places, they first obtained, by the grossest and most shameful misrepresentations, the applause of the vile and ignorant rabble; and then, with the most cool and unblushing assurance, they boasted of that applause as the unanimous voice of the nation, though they well knew that the voice of every man of sense and of public spirit was against them. Shall such men complain of the foul play of Sir Francis Burdett? What! shall those, who, at the signing of the preliminaries, announced, through the news-papers, that our allies were maintained in their integrity, as before the war; those who affected to regard the fall in the price of provisions as a consequence of the peace; those who obtained, by treaty, the evacuation of Egypt by the French; those who asserted Mr. Windham to be the enemy of "all peace, whatever its conditions;" those who represented the opponents of the peace as the members of a conspiracy, formed for the purpose of supplanting the ministers; shall those, in short, who, for the sake of retaining their places, have had recourse to every trick calculated to deceive the ignorant and the listless, shall such men complain of misrepresentation? Sir Francis Burdett's advertisements are replete with falsehood and malice; but are they more so than the ministerial paragraphs of the True Briton? Are they more false and malicious than the article, entitled "General Orders," to which the slave Heriot had the audacity to affix the name of Lord Grenville? Are they more detestably base and wicked than the paragraph, in which the same slave, represented the editor of this work as being an American, and that too for the sole purpose of exciting against him the fury of the ministerial mob? Did the placards of Sir Francis tend to disturb the peace of the city more than those of Sir John Eamer and Sir Richard Ford? Have the thieves and fools who aided his cause, and graced his triumph, been more noisy, insolent, or riotous, than those who enforced Mr. Addington's and Lord Hawkesbury's illuminations? One evil act does not, indeed, justify another; but, every where, except in courts of justice, at least, the accusing of the guilty should be confined to the innocent. The present ministers have set an example of misrepresentation, which will not soon be forgotten; they have eagerly availed themselves of the assistance of the mob, and some of the subalterns in office, detected in the art of enforcing their illuminations, they have retained, and still do retain, in the pay of the public, notwithstanding they have been fully convicted of the crime, for which they were committed to jail. And, shall these men complain of mobs and riots?

Mr. Addington, the honest Mr. Addington, or, as Buonaparté calls him, the respectable Mr. Addington, has taken into his family that lucrative place the clerkship of the pells.

From the man who has been constantly harping upon economy; from the man who gave up Malta, the Cape, Porto Ferrajo, and one half of the West India colonies; from the man who left the French in possession of Belgium, who consented to the opening of the Scheldt, who winked at the cession of Louisiana; from the man who abandoned the allies of England, and who gave up the honours of her flag; from the man who left the royalists of La Vendée to the knives of their pursuers, while he sent Napper Tandy in triumph to France; from the man who has done all these things under the pretext of economy, under the pretext of "husbanding our resources," from such a man one might have expected a different disposition of the clerkship of the pells. The sang-froid, with which he must have calculated on this occasion, would have done honour to the oldest Rabbi of the Synagogue. He would have taken the place to himself, but the doctrine of chances had taught him that his son's life would sell for more than his own; he, therefore, boldly sets decency at defiance, and bestows £3,000 a year for life upon a boy only TWELVE years of age!

The history of this country, from Edgar to George the Third, does not (with the exception of Mr. Dundas) furnish an instance of a minister, who, in so short a space of time, has ever seized on so much of the public wealth as Mr. Addington. He was hardly nominated to the ministry before he contrived to obtain both house and land in the Royal Park of Richmond, a thing totally unprecedented. It was what a man of a noble family might, indeed, have asked; but, considering the origin and progress of Mr. Addington, one is really confounded at the hardihood of his covetousness. His brother-in-law, Mr. Bragge, he found in a place of £1200 a year; this was immediately changed for one worth £6000. His brother, Mr. Hiley Addington, filled a place of £1600; this was immediately changed for one of £4000. This last-mentioned change is strikingly characteristic of the Addingtons: it was from a Lord to a Secretary of the Treasury. Other men seek honours; these nothing but money. Mr. Hiley has, indeed, lately cast off the Secretary, and re-assumed the Lord; but it is pretty well understood, that this counter-revolution has not been produced by any want of attention to interest. What good thing is in reserve for Mr. Hiley Addington we know not; but we should not be at all surprised to hear that he had taken priest's orders, for the purpose of succeeding to the Bishoprick of Durham. It is possible, indeed, that Mr. Hiley might not be quite learned enough for a dignity of this sort; but the Premier would hardly be discouraged by this circumstance, when he is told, (which we assure him is a fact), that Buonaparté has lately put his uncle to school, in order to qualify him for the archbishoprick of Lyons. It has, doubtless, escaped this "tender father," that in loading his infant son with public money, he is also loading him with public odium; and that the three-score years, on which he so fondly counts, will be three-score years of reproach and contempt. Some high-minded romantic fathers would have taken this into consideration; but Mr. Addington remembers the promise: "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." Give him security that his son shall never want money, and he'll engage that he shall never dispute with you for any thing else. In making the modest calculation of sixty years salary for his son, it never occurred to him, perhaps, that the placeman might cut-live the place. This is, however, possible; and if the affairs of the nation continue to be conducted by such men as himself, it is very probable too.—As a sort of palliation of this odious instance of rapacity, it is given out from the treasury, that the Clerkship of the Pells was offered to Mr. Pitt. What! The man on whose life the destiny of the world was once thought to hang, has, then, been offered a place which is now filled by a child, who is daily seen playing at marbles under the cloyster of Westminster Abbey! Tell it not in Gath! Publish it not in the streets of Askelon!

On the subject of Foreign Politics little can be said with certainty. Some of the daily papers have questioned the veracity of our statements respecting the proceeding of the Levant merchants; but, as we never advance any thing as fact, without the very best authority, we trust it is unnecessary for us to repeat what we stated on this head, in the Register, p. 116, on the truth of which the reader may place perfect reliance. We have never given into the notion of an immediate overthrow of the Turkish Empire: from the best information that we possess (and perhaps we have as good as any body), it appears that it is rapidly declining; and, in such a case, a total dissolution is often the work of a few months; but we are well aware, that it is not to be destroyed in an hour, nor should we be at all surprised, if it were to out-live many of those monarchies, which are generally thought to be in no sort of danger.

The letter from Stockholm, (Register, p. 120), will excite no more than a contemptuous smile from the Edens, the Beekes, and the rest of that race of politicians, who look to our inland navigation as the "only legitimate means of defence;" but, we would beg these gentlemen, before they absolutely laugh at these gigantic projects, to reflect a little on what they have really seen come to pass in the course of the last ten years. Had they been told, ten years ago, that, before the month of May, 1802, Gustavus would be assassinated, Leopold poisoned, the Stadtholder ejected, the Pope dethroned and carried into exile, Paul I. eased of his life, the King of Sardinia dethroned, the Dukes of Tuscany, Modena, and Parma, driven from their dominions; had they been told what would befall Holland, Belgium, Switzerland, Geneva, Germany, Venice, Lombardy, Piedmont, Genoa, Malta, Spain, and Portugal; had they been told, only six years ago, that France would attack Egypt with an army of 40,000 men, conveyed in 368 transports, 13 ships of the line, and 6 frigates; had these things been predicted ten years ago, would not the gentlemen of the inland-navigation have smiled? Nay, have they not, from the first dawn of the French Revolution to the present hour, treated with contempt (real or affected) all the apprehensions which have been entertained respecting the successive projects of France? With these inland-navigation gentlemen experience is useless. What the French have done is, with them, no proof of what they are able or willing to do. We do, indeed, by no means assert, that the vast and astonishing projects, mentioned by our correspondent, are really entertained; and, if they are, we are still less positive as to their practicability; but we are decidedly of opinion, that there is a general inclination in the powers of the continent, to combine against this country. They envy us our wealth; and the contempt which they necessarily entertain for our administration, encourages them to form schemes for diminishing that wealth. These schemes may sometimes be wild; but, as far as we can pretend to judge, the invasion of Egypt and Syria, by France alone, while at war with half Europe, was not an undertaking of less difficulty than the invasion of Hindostan would, with the aid of Russia, be at this time.

There are several French decrees, which we have not been able to insert in this sheet. There is also an address of the representatives of the Italian Republic to their President, Buonaparté, who has made them a very affectionate and fatherly reply, but in which he has said nothing that any human being can understand. Mere sounding words to amuse the world in general and his slaves in particular. The Consul Cambacérès has notified to the Legislative Body, that he is about to lay before them the result of the appeal to the people, relative to the Consulship for life. The solemn mummery of the Consuls and Legislators, on this topic, has driven the Jacobins almost to madness. At Paris they are obliged to stifle, and even to disguise all appearance of, their rage; but, in London, they indulge in it to excess. The violence of it is, however, beginning to abate, and has, in some instances, already settled down into a sober pathetic melancholy, that vents itself in strains like the following, which, for the amusement of our readers, we copy from the Morning Chronicle of yesterday:—"It will be seen from the letter of our correspondent, that the system of surveillance is kept up in Paris in a manner utterly repugnant to all the maxims and habits of a free people. It is a system, destructive not merely of rational liberty, but of the security of private life—of all the charities of domestic enjoyment. No man can ever mention the present government of France without regret; for after a struggle of ten years, in which the eyes of mankind were fixed on them, it is surely a most humiliating consideration that no one grand object has been effected, and that the contest for liberty is yet to be renewed; the struggle of the French for liberty was, at one time, interesting to the world; its importance has now disappeared, and we have nothing left but the disgusting picture of a debased and prostrate people."—Such, then, is the result of the French revolution! Such is the final consequence of the constitution, which that great and far-seeing statesman, Mr. CHARLES FOX, declared to be "the most stupendous monument of human wisdom." He is now gone to view, with the naked eye, the happy effects of his favourite doctrine of cashiering kings. He will, however, return just as wise and as loyal as he went.

Our intelligence from America (see p. 147) is very interesting, and may be relied on as perfectly correct. When we look round the world, and see the tremendous storms which are, in every quarter, gathering against this country, and when, to meet all these dangers, we behold nothing but the selfish, low-minded, feeble, and inexperienced Mr. Addington, we cannot help regarding it as doomed to destruction. We are aware that the charge of despondency will be brought against us; that we shall be accused of borrowing the sentiments entertained by the opponents of every former peace, since the reign of Queen Anne, which sentiments have uniformly proved to be erroneous. We beg leave to deny this latter position; for, though Sir Frederick Eden has triumphed at what he is pleased to term the failure of Lord Shelburne's prediction, that "when America was given up, the sun of Britain would set for ever," we think that the present relative situation of America goes very far to confirm that prediction. But, if it were true, that the opponents of every preceding peace have been mistaken in their opinions, does it necessarily follow that those who have opposed the present peace are also mistaken? To maintain this, with the slightest degree of plausibility, it must first be proved, that the situation of England, considered in relation with her principal enemy, is not very different from what it was at any former peace. "Till this position be established; 'till it be made appear, that the actual possession of Belgium and great part of Italy, with Holland, Switzerland, and Spain, as provinces, together with the command of the Amazons and the Mississippi; 'till it be proved, that these numerous acquisitions to France are not at all dangerous to Great-Britain, though America is, at the same time, rivalling her in point of merchant shipping and seamen; until it be fully and fairly proved, that this distribution of national power is nothing extraordinary in the history of England, every argument grounded upon the failure of former predictions must be totally inapplicable to the question. Let those, therefore, who would dissipate our fears for our country, lay aside this evasive mode of reply, and show us how we shall be able to resist our gigantic enemy, when she has got firm hold of all her possessions; when she has over-awed America, and established a regular intercourse with the mines of Spain.

PUBLIC PAPERS.

Letter to the Holy Father, from those New French Bishops who have occupied Episcopal Sees without being instituted by the Holy See.

"Most Holy Father, having been appointed by the First Consul Bishop of —, I have nothing more at heart than to be able entirely to extirpate every remnant of that discord which was the inevitable consequence of the French revolution. In order, therefore, that no doubt may remain in the mind of your holiness, as to my intentions, I sincerely declare that I freely abandon what is called the Civil Constitution of the Clergy; that I admit, and will admit, that I profess, and will profess, the dispositions and articles of the New Convention made between your holiness and the French government, and that I will render true obedience to your holiness and your successors.—I pray that your holiness will consider this as my invariable resolution, that you will regard me as one of the most obedient sons of the church, and that you will deign to grant me that canonical institution which I humbly request. I also humbly request your holiness's apostolic benediction, as a precious pledge of Christian charity towards me."

Decree of Absolution and Dispensation granted by the Cardinal Legate to those of the New French Bishops who, without the Apostolic Institution of the Holy See, have occupied Episcopal Sees.

To Claude François-Marie Primat, formerly occupying the See of Cambrai, now that of Lyons; to Jean-Claude Le Blanc De Beaulieu, occupying the See of Rouen; to Jean François Perrier, commonly called Bishop of Puy-de-Dôme; to Claude Lecoz, occupying the See of Rennes; and to Jean Baptiste Saurine, commonly called Bishop of Landes; is expedited a form of grace subscribed by his Eminence the Cardinal Legate, and sealed with his seal, which decree will be sent to each of them, by the most Reverend the Bishop of Orleans, and of which they will signify their reception, and that they will conform to it.

"We Jean-Baptiste Caprara, Cardinal Priest of the Holy Roman Church, of the title of Saint Onuphre, Legate à Latere from our Holy Father Pope Pius VII and the Holy See, to the First Consul of the French Republic, Seeing that the Reverend N. N. [here insert the name, surname, and archiepiscopal, or episcopal see] has abandoned the episcopal see which he had occupied without the institution of the holy see, and that he has entirely renounced the government of that church, and that moreover, he has promised obedience and due submission to the Sovereign Pontiff, and that he has declared that he will adhere and submit to the judgments which the Holy See shall pronounce respecting the Ecclesiastical Affairs of France, We, in quality of Legate à Latere of his Holiness and the Holy See, by virtue of the Apostolic Authority, which has been specially and expressly conferred upon us, do absolve the said N. N. who adheres to the unity of the Catholic church, and do declare him absolved in utroque foro from all sentence, censure, and ecclesiastical penalty whatsoever, so far as the same can be pronounced by men, which he may have incurred, imposing upon him as a penance that he recite once the seven penitential Psalms, and considering him as obliged to preserve with sedulous care unity and peace.

TO MR. HERIOT,

The Editor of the True Briton.

Sir,—Having observed in your paper certain insinuations, tending to diminish the respect due to the rank and character of his Royal Highness the Duke of Kent, I thought it my duty to obtain the information necessary to defeat your purposes.

You have insinuated, that his Royal Highness has introduced a system of rigour, heretofore unknown to the garrison, which has now the honour to be under his command. That he compels the officers, in the burning climate of Gibraltar, to go buttoned up from the waist-band to the chin; that he harrasses the soldiers with exercise; and, in short, that he has turned things upside-down and caused the garrison sorely to lament the death of the late governor.

The truth is, that his Royal Highness found the garrison of Gibraltar in a state of indiscipline dishonourable to the service. The staff-officers were in the almost continual neglect not only of their dress but of their duty: the latter, indeed, is inseparable from the former. Their offices were become, in a great degree, sinecures, not for want of employment, but for want of a vigilant commander. Amongst the soldiers (I might say some, at least, of the officers also) drunkenness prevailed to an extent almost incredible. A want of cleanliness and care was visible in the quarters and in the hospitals. The duty, when not totally neglected, was every where performed in a slovenly manner. The stores and magazines were exposed to damage and to speculation. The inhabitants were, in many instances, wantonly vexed, insulted, and exposed to extortion. Many of the most important as well as most lucrative appointments had, by some means, been monopolized by one family, and had long been exercised by deputation.

That the correction of these monstrous abuses should draw forth the malignant insinuations of the idle, the drunken, and the avaricious, is no wonder; nor is it so very surprising, that a London news-printer should be found willing to propagate those insinuations; but, it certainly behoves his Majesty's ministers to prevent the types, which were purchased with the public money, from being employed for the purpose of exposing the sons of their Royal Master to ridicule, contempt, and hatred.

I shall take some future opportunity of speaking more in detail of the abuses, which his Royal Highness has done away, and of the salutary regulations he has introduced: in the mean time I cannot help cautioning you, Mr. Heriot, not to place too much reliance on the final effect of abusing certain members of the Royal Family, notwithstanding the encouraging example of the printer, on whom a pension was bestowed, and is, I believe, yet annually paid, for no other service than that of libelling the Heir Apparent.

I am, &c.

The Editor of this Work has been positively assured, by persons on whose word he places implicit reliance, that Mr. Courts was confined by illness, at Petersham, during the continuance of the Middlesex election; that he never advanced, nor was ever asked to advance, a shilling on account of the said election, and that neither he nor his house ever advanced any money to Sir Francis Burdett on any account whatever; that Mr. Courts has always lived upon good terms with Sir Francis, but has widely differed from him in politics; that, though the former might, in the early part of the contest, ask for a few votes for his son-in-law, he desisted the moment he perceived the violent turn which the election took; and that, instead of enjoying the triumph, as it is called, it is to him a source of great vexation and trouble of mind.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Milan, June 30.

*The Legislative Body to Citizen Buonaparté,
First Consul of the French Republic, and

"Citizen President,—The Legislative Body assembled on the 24th of June. This solemn event is one benefit more added to all those which you have heaped upon the Italian people, and a fresh title which you have acquired to their gratitude. Doubtless it is glorious to found a republic by the force of arms; but it is not less so to preserve it by useful laws and institutions. Such is your design—such is the wish of the people—and it is also a sacred duty incumbent upon us.

“Organs of the sentiments of the people, we express to you, Citizen President, the public gratitude for the happiness you have procured us, and that which you still further promise us. This happiness, which is your production, will form one of the grandest monuments of your glory in the eyes of posterity.

“Vaccari, President.

“Rangone, Secretary.”

The First Consul of the French Republic, President of the Italian Republic, to the Legislative Body of the Italian Republic.

“I have seen, with a lively satisfaction, the union of the Legislative Body. You must, in the first Session, form the basis of the Administration. The first budget which has been prepared in Italy will be presented to you. The receipts, the expenses, and the public debt, equally require a stable and uniform system.

“An object which you will prove to be not less important, is the law which will be presented to you respecting the Military Conscriptions; a national army can alone assure to the Republic internal tranquillity and external respect. A neighbouring state, which possesses neither the population nor the wealth of the Republic, has already formed an army which has often acquired glory, and placed it during a long period in the rank of considerable powers.

“The Legislative Body will not forget that the Republic ought to be the first power of Italy.

“The Legislative Body cannot better testify the truth of the sentiment which it expresses, than in devoting all its efforts to the consolidation of the State, and the principles which must assure its glory and its grandeur.”

Paris.—Council of State. Extract from the Register of Deliberation—sitting of the 27th of July, 1802.

Opinions upon the different questions relative to the execution of the Senatus Consultum granting an amnesty for the crime of emigration.

On the report of the Section of Legislation, to which Regnier had been added, the following questions were taken into consideration.

I. Those individuals provisionally or definitively erased since the 20th of October, 1800, to be called upon to submit to the conditions of the amnesty.

II. Are those accused of emigration, and not definitively erased, who have died previous to its publication, to be considered as amnestied?

III. Are those who, living at the time the amnesty was published, died before the 23d September, 1802, without having fulfilled the conditions imposed by the Senatus Consultum, to be considered as amnestied?

IV. Are foreigners accused of emigration, to be called upon to submit to the conditions of the amnesty?

The Council of State is of opinion, with respect to the first question, that it is answered by the first article of the Senatus Consultum—“An amnesty is granted for the crime of emigration to every individual accused of it, and not definitively erased.” As the provisional erasure from the list was also a definitive erasure, it is evident it must mean the same thing as an erasure properly so called. They must submit to the conditions prescribed by the arrêté applying to them: those of the amnesty do not apply to them.

With respect to the second question, the Council of State is of opinion, that the amnesty having been principally granted in favour of the families of emigrants, it is entirely conformable to the spirit of the Senatus Consultum to extend its grace to the heirs of the accused, when death has put it out of the power of the accused himself to profit by it.

If he had lived, he would have been entitled to partake of the benefits granted by the 17th article of the Senatus Consultum. How then can we refuse the same grace to his children, who have lived in the Republic, and who were born before the emigration?

It is well understood, that this cannot apply to the heirs of those individuals who are comprised in the exceptions contained in the 10th article of the Senatus Consultum. Those individuals could never have personally profited by the amnesty, if they had been living at the moment of its publication; their heirs cannot, therefore, partake of the same powerful considerations which operate in favour of the heirs of others.

With respect to the third question, the benefits of the amnesty are only lost in case the emigrant neglects to fulfil its conditions before the 23d of Sept. 1801. If, therefore, he dies before the expiration of the period granted for that purpose, his right, which is not extinct, passes to his heir, who is not excluded the benefit of the amnesty until the moment when the deceased himself would have been excluded.

It must be supposed here, as on the preceding question, that the deceased was not comprized in any of the exceptions contained in the 10th article of the Senatus Consultum.

It is to be observed, that most of the conditions imposed by the Senatus Consultum upon emigrants, are inapplicable to their heirs. It is therefore sufficient, if the latter, before the 23d September, shall present themselves before the Prefect of their Department, and having proved the death of the emigrant, they shall receive a certificate of amnesty.

With regard to the fourth question, as foreigners cannot be guilty of the offence, the amnesty cannot apply to them.

Secretary to the Council of State.

Message, July 29, 1802, of the Consuls of the Republic to the Conservative Senate.

"Senators,—On the 6th of May last, the Tribune expressed a wish that a striking pledge of national gratitude might be given to the First Consul. That wish was applauded by the Legislative Body, and repeated by a spontaneous movement of the Citizens.

"The Senate raised its thoughts still higher; and in the accomplishment of that wish, it hoped to find the sure means of giving to the government that stability which alone can multiply the resources of the nation, establish confidence without and credit within, inspire allies, discourage enemies, extinguish the flames of war, permit the enjoyment of the fruits of peace, and leave to future wisdom the task of executing every thing that can be conceived as contributing to the happiness of a free people.

"The First Consul was of opinion that the circumstances of his first nomination prevented him from accepting the proposed re-election, unless it should be specifically conferred by the French people, thereby giving a proof of their attachment to, and permanent confidence in, the magistrate who had been the object of their first choice.

"In this manner we have thought it our duty to carry into execution the ideas of the Senate.

"The French people have given their answer; the government has received from almost all the Departments, the acts which contain the expression of the will of the people. It is to the Senate we have thought in this new case, that it belongs to collect and to promulgate the wishes of the people. We have therefore ordered the Minister of the Interior to place at the disposal of the Senate, the Registers in which those votes are contained.

"We invite the Senate to take those measures which shall seem to its wisdom the most proper, for the purpose of stating the result.

"The Second Consul, Cambacérès.

"By the Second Consul,

"The Secretary of State, H. B. Maret."

The Audience of the Corps Diplomatique was interrupted on the 3d August by the introduction of the Conservative Senate.—Citizen Barthélemy, the President, spoke as follows:

"Citizen First Consul,—The French, grateful for the immense services you have rendered to them, wish that the First Magistracy of the State should be irrevocably placed in your hands. In thus conferring it upon you for life, they only express the opinion of the Senate, as stated in its Senatus Consultum of the 8th of May. The Nation, by this solemn act of gratitude, confides to you the task of consolidating our institutions.

"A new career commences for the First Consul—after prodigies of valour and military talents, he has terminated the war, and obtained every where the most honourable conditions of peace. The French people under his auspices have assumed the attitude and character of true greatness.—He is the Pacificator of Nations, and the Restorer of France. His name alone is a tower of strength.

"Already an administration of less than three years has almost made us forget that epoch of anarchy and calamities which seemed to have dried up the sources of public prosperity.

"But evils yet remain to be healed, and inquietudes to be dissipated. The French people, after having astonished the world by warlike exploits, expect of you, Citizen First Consul, all the benefits of that peace which you have procured for them.

"If seeds of discord still exist, the Proclamation of the Perpetual Consulate of Buonaparté will dissipate them. Every one will now rally round him. His powerful genius will support and preserve all. He exists only for the prosperity and the happiness of the French people. His constant efforts will be directed to increase the national glory and national greatness. What nation, in fact, better deserves happiness, and of what people more enlightened, or more sensible, can he desire the esteem and attachment?

“The Conservative Senate will associate itself with all the generous maxims of Government. It will second, by all the means in its power, every amelioration which shall have for its end the prevention of the return of those evils by which we have been so long afflicted, and the extension and consolidation of those benefits which you have conferred upon us. It is its duty also to contribute to the accomplishment of the wishes of the people, which have been manifested in a manner so honourable to their zeal and their discernment.

“The Senatus Consultum which the Senate in a body now present to you, Citizen First Consul, contains the expression of its own gratitude. The organ of the sovereign will, it was of opinion, could not better fulfil the intentions of the French people, than by calling in the aid of the arts to perpetuate the remembrance of this memorable event.”

After this address, Citizen Barthelemy, the President, read the Act, of which the following is the tenor.

Senatus Consultum. Extract from the Registers of the Conservative Senate of the 2d of August, 1802.

The Conservative Senate, consisting of the number of members prescribed by the 90th article of the Constitution; deliberating upon the message of the Consuls of the Republic, of the 29th ult.; after having heard the report of the special Committee, charged with the verification of the Registers of the Votes given by the French people; seeing the Procès-Verbal prepared by the special Committee, and which states, that 3,577,259 citizens have given their suffrages, and that 3,568,885 citizens have voted, that Napoleon Buonaparté should be appointed Consul for Life; considering that the Senate, established by the Constitution as the organ of the people, in every thing in which the social compact is interested, ought to manifest in a splendid manner the national gratitude towards the conquering and pacificating hero, and to proclaim solemnly that it is the will of the French people to give to the government every necessary stability and independence, in order to ensure the prosperity and glory of the Republic, decrees as follows:

Art. I. The French people do appoint, and the Senate do proclaim, Napoleon Buonaparté First Consul for life.

II. A statue of peace, holding in one hand the laurel of victory, and in the other the decree of the Senate, shall attest to posterity the gratitude of the nation.

III. The Senate shall convey to the First Consul the expression of the confidence, the love, and the admiration of the French people.

(Signed) Barthelemy, President.

Vaubois and Fargues, Secretaries.

By the Conservative Senate, the Secretary General, (Signed) Cauchy.

The First Consul replied as follows:

“Senators,—The life of a citizen belongs to his country. The people of France wish that the whole of mine should be consecrated to their service, and I obey.—In giving me this new, this permanent pledge of their confidence, they have imposed upon me the duty of maintaining the system of the laws and institutions of the Republic.—By my efforts, by your co-operation, Citizen Senators, and that of the Constituted Authorities, and by the confidence and will of this immense people, the liberty, equality, and prosperity of the people of France will be secured from all the accidents which arise from the uncertainty of futurity. The best people shall, as they deserve, be the most happy, and their happiness shall contribute to that of all Europe.

“Content with having been called by the order of him from whom every thing emanates, to bring back upon the earth justice, order, and equality, I shall hear my last hour sound without regret, and without any uneasiness about the opinion of future generations.

“Senators, receive my thanks for this solemn proceeding. The desire of the Senate has expressed the wish of the people of France, and is thereby more strongly connected with whatever remains to be done for the happiness of the people of France. It is very gratifying to me, to be assured of this by the speech of so distinguished a president.”

The Members of the Senate then retired.

Circular Letter of the Minister of the Interior to the Prefects of the different Departments, dated Paris, 4th August.

"I send you, Citizen Prefect, the Senatus Consultum, which proclaims the will of the French people. You will cause it to be proclaimed throughout the whole of your Department on the 15th of August. That day shall hereafter be consecrated by the recollection of great events. It will recall to our posterity the recollection of the memorable epocha of public happiness, when the consciences of the people were set at peace, and when the people of France exercised the greatest act of sovereignty ever exercised by any nation.

"The 15th of August is at once the anniversary of the birth-day of the Chief Consul, of the signature of the Concordat, and the day on which the people of France, wishing to secure and perpetuate their happiness, have connected its duration with that of the glorious career of Napoleon Buonaparté.

"What pleasing recollections to excite the enthusiasm of the French people! What a concurrence of great events to awaken in every heart those generous sentiments which characterize the French nation!

"Let this great day be celebrated by acts of benevolence. I invite you, Citizen Prefect, to consecrate the whole of it to happiness, by uniting in marriage those individuals who are most eminent for their virtue.

(Signed) "Chaptal."

Paris, Aug. 5.—Extract from the Registers of the Deliberations of the Council of State, of the Sitting of August 4.

Project of a Senatus Consultum for organizing the Constitution.

TITLE I.

Art. 1. Each jurisdiction of a Justice of the Peace has a Cantonal Assembly.—2. Each communal circuit or district of Sub-prefecture, has an Electoral College for the circuit.—3. Each department has an Electoral College for the department.

TITLE II.—Of the Cantonal Assemblies.

4. The Assembly of the Canton is composed of all the Citizens domiciliated in the Canton, and inscribed on the commune list of the circuit.—From the epoch when the communal lists ought to be renewed in the terms of the Constitution, the Assembly of the Canton shall be composed of all the Citizens domiciliated in the Canton, and enjoying the rights of Citizenship.—5. The First Consul nominates the President of the Cantonal Assembly.—His functions continue for five years, and he may be re-appointed indefinitely.

—He is assisted by four Inspectors; two of them being the oldest, and the other two the persons paying most taxes among the Citizens having a right to vote in the Cantonal Assembly.—The President and four Inspectors appoint the Secretary.—6. The Assembly of the Canton, divides itself into Sections for performing the operations belonging to it.—At the first convocation of each Assembly, its organization and forms of proceeding shall be determined by a regulation issued by the Government.—7. The President of the Cantonal Assembly appoints the Presidents of the Sections.—Their functions terminate with each Sectionary Assembly.—They are, each of them, assisted by two Inspectors, the one being the eldest, and the other the most heavily taxed, of the Citizens having a right to vote in the section.—8. The Cantonal Assembly returns two Citizens out of whom the First Consul chooses the Justice of the Peace for the Canton.—It, in like manner, returns two citizens for each vacant place of suppleant to the Justices of Peace.—9. The Justices of the Peace and their suppleants are appointed for ten years.—10. In cities containing 5000 persons, the Cantonal Assembly presents two Citizens for each seat in the Municipal Council. In cities where there may be several Justices of the Peace, or several Cantonal Assemblies, each assembly will, in like manner, present two Citizens for each seat in the Municipal Council.—11. The Members of the Municipal Council are taken by each Cantonal Assembly, from a list of a hundred of the persons paying most taxes in the Canton. This list shall be executed and printed by order of the Prefect.—12. The Municipal Councils are renewed in the proportion of one half every ten years.—13. The First Consul chooses the Mayors and Assistants in the Municipal Councils. They are to be five years in office, and may be re-appointed.—14. The Cantonal Assembly nominates to the Electoral College of the Circuit the number of members assigned to it, in proportion to the number of citizens of which it is composed.—15. It nominates to the Electoral College of the Department, from a list hereinafter referred to, the number of members assigned to it.—16. The members of the Electoral Colleges must be domiciliated in the respective circuits and departments.—17. The Government convokes the Cantonal Assemblies, fixes the time of their sitting, and the object of their meeting.

TITLE III.—Electoral Colleges.

18. The Electoral Colleges of the circuits have one member for every 500 domiciliated inhabitants of the circuit.—The number of members cannot, however, exceed 200, nor fall below 120.—19. The Department Electoral Colleges have one member for every 1000 domiciliated inhabitants in the department; but notwithstanding, these members cannot be more than 300, nor fewer than 200.—20. The members of the Electoral Colleges are appointed for life.—21. If a member of an Electoral College is denounced to the Government as having permitted any act contrary to the dictates of honour or the interests of the country, the Government invites the College to manifest its opinion thereon. Three-fourths of the votes are necessary to make a denounced member lose his place in the College.—22. A Member loses his seat in the Electoral Colleges for the same cause which would deprive him of the rights of citizenship.—He also loses when, without any legitimate obstruction, he absents himself from three successive meetings.—23. The First Consul appoints the Presidents of the Electoral Colleges on each session.—The Police of the Electoral College when assembled is exclusively under the direction of the President.—24. The Electoral Colleges appoint, at the commencement of each session, two Inspectors and a Secretary.—25. In order to the formation of the Electoral Colleges of department, there shall be drawn up in each department, under the orders of the Minister of Finance, a list of 600 Citizens, who are most heavily assessed to the land tax, the tax on moveables, the tax on luxury, and the tax on licences.—To the amount of the contribution must be added in the departmental domicile, such sum as may be proved to be paid in other parts of the territory of France or the colonies. This list shall be printed.—26. The Cantonal Assembly will select from this list the Members to be appointed to the Electoral College of the department.—27. The First Consul may add to the Electoral Colleges of Circuit, ten Members chosen from among the Citizens belonging to the Legion of Honour, or who have performed public services.—He may add to each Electoral College of department twenty Citizens, ten of whom to be taken from the thirty most heavily taxed in the department; and ten others, either from the Members of the Legion of Honour, or Citizens who have performed public services.—He is not limited to precise periods in making these nominations.—28. The Electoral Colleges of circuit present to the First Consul two Citizens domiciliated in the circuit for each vacant seat in the Council of the circuit.—Of those Citizens, one at least must, of necessity, be chosen from among the members of the Electoral College which appoints him.—The Councils of circuit are removed by thirds, once in five years.—29. The Electoral Colleges of circuit present at each meeting two Citizens to form part of the list, from which are to be chosen the Members of the Tribunal.—Of these Citizens, one, at least, must necessarily belong to the College which presents him.—Both of them may be chosen from persons not residing in the department.—30. The Electorate Colleges of the Departments present to the First Consul two Citizens domiciliated in each Department for every place vacant in the Council-General of the Department.—One of these Citizens, at least, must necessarily be taken from the Electoral College which presents him.—The renovation of the Councils General of the Departments takes place by thirds every five years.—31. The Electoral Colleges of the Departments present at each meeting two Citizens to form the list from which the Members of the Senate are named.—

One of them, at least, must necessarily be taken from the College which presents him, and they both may be taken from the Department.—They are to have the age and the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution.—32. The Electoral Colleges of the Departments and Circuits present each two citizens domiciliated in the department, in order to form a list from which the Members of the Deputation to the Legislative Body are to be named.—One of these citizens is necessarily to be taken from the college which presents him.—There must be three times as many different candidates on the list formed by the combination of the presentations of the Electoral Colleges of the Departments and Circuits as there are vacant places.—33. The same person may be a Member of a Council of Commune and of an Electoral College of Circuit or Department.—The same person cannot, however, be at the same time Member of a College of Circuit and College of Department.—34. The members of the Legislative Body and of the Tribunal cannot attend the sittings of the Electoral College to which they belong.—All the other public functionaries have a right to attend and to vote.—35. No Cantonal Assembly shall proceed to nominate to the places that belong to it in an Electoral College, until these places are reduced to two-thirds.—36. The Electoral Colleges can assemble only in consequence of an act of convocation emanating from the government, and in the places assigned to them.—They can take cognizance of the subjects only for which they are assembled, nor can they prolong their sittings beyond the time fixed by the act of Convocation.—If they exceed these limits, the government possesses the right of dissolving them.—37. The Electorate Colleges can neither directly or indirectly, nor under any pretext whatsoever, hold any intercourse with each other.—38. The dissolution of an Electoral Body necessarily leads to the renewal of all its Members.

TITLE IV.—Of the Consuls.

39. The Consuls are for life. They are members of the Senate, and act as Presidents.—40. The Second and Third Consuls are appointed by the Senate on the presentation of the First.—41. For this purpose when any of the two places become vacant, the First Consul presents to the Senate a first person. If he is not appointed, he presents a second, and if the second is not accepted, he presents a third, who is of necessity appointed.—42. When the First Consul thinks proper, he appoints a Citizen to succeed him after his death, according to the forms prescribed in the preceding article.—43. The Citizen appointed to succeed the First Consul takes an oath to the Republic, to be administered by the First Consul, assisted by the Second and Third Consuls, in the presence of the Senate, the Ministers, the Council of State, the Legislative Body, the Tribunal, the Tribunal of Cassation, the Archbishops, Bishops, Presidents of the Tribunals of Appeal, the Presidents of the Electoral Colleges, the Presidents of the Cantonal Assemblies, the Grand Officers of the Legion of Honour, and the Mayors of the 24 principal Cities of the Republic.—The Secretary of State draws up the Procès-Verbal of the administration of the oath.—44. The oath is in these terms.—“I swear to maintain the Constitution, to respect the liberty of conscience, to oppose the return of feudal institutions; never to make war but for the defence and glory of the Republic; and not to employ the power wherewith I shall be invested, but for the happiness of the people, from whom and for whom I shall have received it.”—45. Having taken this oath, he takes his seat in the Senate immediately after the Third Consul.—46. The First Consul may deposit, among the archives of Government, his wish as to the nomination of a successor, to be presented to the Senate after his death.—47. In this case, he summonses the attendance of the Second and Third Consuls, the Ministers and Presidents of the sections of the Council of State. In their presence he delivers to the Secretary of State the paper sealed with his seal, and in which his wish is recorded. This paper is subscribed by all those who are present at the transaction. The Secretary of State deposits it among the archives of Government in the presence of the Ministers and Presidents of the sections of the Council of State.—48. The First Consul may withdraw this deposit, observing the formalities prescribed in the preceding article.—49. After the death of the First Consul, if his choice has remained in deposit, the paper containing it is withdrawn from the archives of Government by the Secretary of State, in the presence of the Ministers and Presidents of the sections of the Council of State; their authenticity and identity being ascertained in the presence of the Second and Third Consuls. It is addressed to the Senate by a message from the Government, with a copy of the Procès-Verbal, certifying the deposit, the identity, and authenticity.—50. If the person, presented by the First Consul, is not appointed, the Second and the Third Consuls present one each; in case of neither of these being nominated, they each make another presentation, and one of the two must of necessity be appointed.—51. If the First Consul leaves no presentation, the Second and Third Consuls make their presentations separate, one first, one second, and if neither obtains the nomination, they make a third, from which the Senate must of necessity nominate.—52. In every case, the presentations and nomination must be completed within twenty-four hours after the death of the First Consul.—53. The law determines for the life of each First Consul the state of the expenditure of Government.

TITLE V.—Of the Senate.

54. The Senate regulates, by an Organic Senatus Consultum—1st. The Constitution of the Colonies.—2d. Every thing not provided for by the Constitution, and which may yet be necessary to its operation.—3d. It explains those Articles of the Constitution which admit of different interpretations.—55. The Senate, by Acts, entitled Senatus Consulta—1st. Suspends for five years the functions of Juries in the Departments where that measure may be necessary.—2d. Proclaims, when circumstances require it, certain Departments out of the protection of the Constitution.—3d. Determines the time when the individuals arrested in virtue of the 46th Article of the Constitution, are to be brought before the Tribunals, in such cases where they are not brought to trial in ten days from the period of their arrest.—4th. Annuls the judgments of the civil and criminal tribunals when dangerous to the safety of the State.—5th. Dissolves the Legislative Body and Tribunal.—6th. Appoints the Consuls.—56. The Organic Senatus Consulta and Ordinary Senatus Consulta are deliberated upon by the Senate, on the initiative of the Government.—A simple majority suffices for a Senatus Consulta. Two thirds of the votes of the Members present are necessary for an organic Senatus Consultum.—57. The projects of the Senatus Consultum, adopted in consequence of articles 54 and 55, are discussed in a Privy Council, composed of the Consuls, two Ministers, two Senators, two Counsellors of State, and two grand Officers of the Legion of Honour.—At each meeting the First Consul appoints the Members who are to compose the Privy Council.—58. The First Consul ratifies the Treaties of Peace and Alliance, after taking the advice of the Privy Council. Before he promulgates them, he communicates them to the Senate.—59. The act of the nomination of a Member of the Legislative Body, of the Tribunal, and of the Tribunal of Cassation, is entitled Arrêté.—60. The acts of the Senate, relative to its police and internal administration, are entitled Deliberation.—61. In the course of the year 11, he will proceed to the nomination of 14 Citizens, to complete the number of 80 Senators, fixed by the 15th article of the Constitution.—This nomination shall be made by the Senate, on the presentation of the First Consul, who shall, for that purpose, select three persons from the list of Citizens chosen by the Electorate Colleges.—62. The Members of the Grand Council of the Legion of Honour are Members of the Senate, whatever may be their age.—63. The First Consul may besides nominate to the Senate, without the previous presentation of the Electoral Colleges of the Departments, Citizens distinguished for their services and their talents, on these conditions, however, that they shall be of the age required by the Constitution, and that the number of Senators shall not exceed 120.—64. The Senators may be Consuls, Ministers, Members of the Legion of Honour, Inspectors of Public Instruction, or employed on extraordinary and temporary Missions.—65. The Senate appoints each year two of its Members to perform the duty of Secretaries.—66. The Ministers have seats in the Senate, but no deliberative voice, unless they are Senators.

TITLE VI.—Of the Counsellors of State.

67. The Counsellors of State shall never exceed the number of fifty.—68. The Council of State is divided into sections.—69. The Ministers have rank, seats, and votes in the Council of State.

TITLE VII.—Of the Legislative Body.

70. Each department shall have a number of Members proportioned to the extent of its population, conformable to the annexed table.—71. All the Members of the Legislative Body, belonging to the same deputation, are to be nominated at once.—72. The departments of the Republic are divided into five series, conformable to the annexed table.—73. The present Deputies are classed according to these five series.—74. They shall be renewed in the year to which the series, including the department to which they are attached, shall be referred.—75. The Deputies nominated in the year 10 shall, however, complete their five years.—76. The Government convokes, adjourns, and prorogues, the Legislative Body.

TITLE VIII.—Of the Tribunal.

77. From and after the year 13, the Tribunal shall be reduced to 50 Members.—One half of the 50 shall go out every three years. Until this reduction be completed, the Members who go out shall not be replaced.—The Tribunal is divided into Sections.—78. The Legislative Body and the Tribunal are to be wholly renewed, immediately on their dissolution by the Senate.

TITLE IX.—Of Justice and the Tribunal.

79. There shall be a Grand Judge, Minister of Justice.—80. He has a distinguished place in the Senate and the Council of State.—81. He presides in the Tribunal of Cassation and the Tribunals of Appeal, when the Government judges it proper.—82. He has the right of vigilance and superintendence over the Tribunals and Justices of Peace.—83. The Tribunal of Cassation, when he sits as President, has the right of censure and discipline over the Tribunals of Appeal and the Criminal Tribunals. He may, on serious complaints, suspend the Judges from their functions, and send them before a Judge, to give an account of their conduct.—84. The Tribunals of Appeal have the right of superintendence over the Civil Tribunals within their jurisdiction, and the Civil Tribunals over the Justices of Peace of their District.—85. The Commissioners of Government to the Tribunal of Cassation, superintends the Commissioners to the Tribunals of Appeal and the Criminal Tribunals.—The Commissioners to the Tribunals of Appeal superintend the Commissioners to the Inferior Tribunals.—86. The Members of the Tribunal of Legislation are appointed by the Senate on the presentation of the First Consul.—The First Consul presents three Candidates for each vacant place.

TITLE X.—Right of Pardoning.

87. The First Consul has the right of pardoning.—He exercises it after the deliberation of a Privy Council, composed of the Grand Judge, two Ministers, two Councils, and two Members of the Tribunal of Cassation.—The Council of State having, on the reference of the Consuls, discussed the above project, approve of it, and agree that it shall be presented to the Consuls in due form.

J. G. LOCRE, Secretary General of the Council of State.

Approved, BUONAPARTE, First Consul.
By order of the First Consul,

H. B. MARET, Secretary of State.

The project of the Organic Senatus Consultum was carried to the Conservative Senate by the Counsellors of State, Regnier, Portalis, and Dessolles, Orators of the Government, and adopted by the Senate in its sitting of this day.

Buonaparté, First Consul, in the name of the French people, proclaims as a law of the Republic, the Senatus Consulte, of which the following is the tenor :

Senatus Consulte for organizing the Constitution. Extract from the Registers of the Conservative Senate of the 14th of August, 1802.

The Conservative Senate, consisting of the number of members prescribed by the 90th Article of the Constitution ; having seen the message of the Consuls of the Republic dated this day, announcing the sending of three orators of government, charged to present to the Senate a project of a Senatus Consulte for organizing the constitution ; having seen the said project of Senatus Consulte, presented to the Senate by Citizens Regnier, Portalis, and Dessolles, councillors of state appointed for that purpose by an Arrêté of the First Consul of the Republic, of the same date ; after having heard the orators of government respecting the motives of the said project ; deliberating on the report of its special committee appointed in the sitting of the 30th ult. decrees as follows : the present Senatus Consulte shall be transmitted by a message to the Consuls of the Republic.

(Signed) Barthélemy, President.

Fauvois and Fargues, Secretaires.

By the Conservative Senate,

The Secretary-General, Cauchy,

[Then follows a table of the number of deputies to be chosen by each department to the legislative body, amounting in the whole to 300. Also a table of the departments of the Republic, divided into five series.]

Let the present Senatus Consulte, sealed with the seal of state, be inserted in the bulletin of laws, and inscribed in the registers of the judiciary and administrative authorities, and the minister of justice is charged with the superintendence of its publication.

The following most infamous Article is taken from the Paris Paper, the Moniteur, of the 9th August.

"The Times, which is said to be under ministerial inspection, is filled with perpetual invectives against France. Two of its four pages are every day employed in giving currency to the grossest calumnies. All that imagination can depict, that is low, vile, and base, is by that miserable Paper attributed to the French government. What is its end? Who pays it? What does it wish to effect?

"A French Journal edited by some miserable emigrants, the remnant of the most impure, a vile refuse, without country, without honour, sullied with crimes which it is not in the power of any Amnesty to wash away, outdoes even the Times."

"Eleven bishops, presided over by the atrocious bishop of Arras, rebels to their country and to the church, have assembled in London. They print libels against the bishops and the French clergy; they injure the government and the Pope, who have re-established the peace of the gospel amongst 40 millions of christians

"The Isle of Jersey is full of Brigands, condemned to death by the tribunals for crimes committed subsequent to the peace; for assassinations, robberies, and ill practices of an incendiary.

"The treaty of Amiens stipulates, that persons accused of crimes, of murder, for instance, shall be respectively delivered up. The assassins who are at Jersey are, on the contrary, received. They depart from thence unmolested, in fishing boats, disembarked on our coasts, assassinate the richest proprietors, and burn the stacks of corn and the barns.

"Georges wears openly at London his red ribband, as a recompense for the infernal machine which destroyed a part of Paris, and killed thirty women and children, or peaceable citizens. This special protection authorizes a belief, that if he had succeeded he would have been honoured with the Order of the Garter.

"Let us make some reflexions on this strange conduct of our neighbours.

"When two great nations make peace, is it for the purpose of reciprocally exciting troubles, or to engage and pay for crimes? Is it for the purpose of giving money and protection to all men who wish to trouble the state? And as to the liberty of the press, is a country to be at liberty to speak of a nation, friendly, and newly reconciled, in a manner which they durst not speak of a government against whom they were prosecuting a deadly war?

"Is not one nation responsible to another nation for all the acts and all the conduct of its citizens? Do not acts of parliament even prohibit allied governments, or their ambassadors, to be insulted?

"It is said that Richelieu, under Louis XIII. assisted the revolution in England, and contributed to bring Charles the First to the scaffold. M. de Choiseul, and after him, the ministers of Louis XVI. doubtless excited the insurrection in America. The late English ministry have had their revenge: they excited the massacres of September, and influenced their movements, by means of which Louis XVI. perished on the scaffold, and by means of which our principal manufacturing cities, such as Lyons, were destroyed.

"It is still wished that this series of movements and influence, which has been productive of such calamitous consequences to both states, for so many ages, should be prolonged? Would it not be more reasonable, and more conformable to the results of experience, to make use of the reciprocal influence of proper commercial relations, as the means of protecting commerce, of preventing the fabrication of false money, and opposing a refuge to criminals?

"Besides, what result can the English government expect, from fomenting the troubles of the church? from receiving and vomiting back upon our territory the brigands of the Cotes-du-Nord and Morbihan, covered with the blood of the best and richest proprietors of those unfortunate departments, from spreading by every means, instead of severely repressing, all the calumnies circulated by English writers, or by the French press at London. Do they not know that the French government is now more solidly established than the English government? And do they think that reciprocity will be difficult for the French government.

"What would be the effect of such an exchange of injuries, of the influence of insurrectional committees, of the protection and encouragement granted to assassins?

What would be gained to civilization, to the commerce and the happiness of both nations?

"Either the English government authorizes and tolerates those public and private crimes, in which case it cannot be said that such conduct is consistent with British generosity, civilization, and honour; or it cannot prevent them, in which case it does not deserve the name of a government; above all, if it does not possess the means of repressing assassination and calumny, and protecting social order?"—Moniteur.

The Gazette Extraordinary of Madrid has announced, that his Excellency Charles Caracciolo, Duke of St. Theodore, Marquis de Capriglia, &c. &c. &c. Ambassador Extraordinary of his Majesty the King of the Two Sicilies, espoused on the 16th of July, with all the pomp and ceremonies usual in Spain, and in the name of the Hereditary Prince of the Two Sicilies, the Infanta Donna Maria Isabella, Princess of Spain.

Bern, July 22.—The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic in Helvetia has addressed the following letter, dated July 18, to the Landamman and Stadtholders of the Helvetic Republic.

"Citizens Landamman and Stadtholders, you requested of me, by the letter which you did me the honour to address to me, dated the 13th of July, to give you some information as to the considerations which formed the motive of the resolution taken and answered by the First Consul, to withdraw immediately into France the French battalions which he had permitted to remain in Helvetia since the peace, and you request me to petition the First Consul to postpone the execution of that resolution until the Helvetic Ministry at Paris had transmitted to you the information which you had charged them to procure respecting that subject. The First Consul thinking, Citizens Landamman and Stadtholders, that the government of Helvetia will find in the virtue of the Helvetic people, now more united with respect to the principles of its political organization, sufficient resources to maintain public order and tranquillity in Helvetia, such are the considerations which have influenced the determination of the First Consul; you ought therefore to regard this resolution as a pledge of his confidence in the wisdom of the Helvetic people, and in the intentions of its Government, as well as of his repugnance to intermeddle in the domestic affairs of other nations.—Accept, Citizens Landamman and Stadtholders, my sentiments of consideration.

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES.

The following pithy proceedings in Jamaica are exceedingly well calculated for exercising the speculative faculties of politicians.

Jamaica, Kingston, June 17, 1802.—Tuesday the General Assembly of this island met agreeably to Proclamation, and his Honour the Lieutenant-Governor having been acquainted therewith, a message was sent commanding their attendance in the Council Chamber, when his Honour was pleased to open the Sessions with the following Speech:

"Gentlemen of the Council, Mr. Speaker, and Gentlemen of the Assembly,—It is with much reluctance that I have felt myself obliged to call you together at this season of the year, but the importance of the object will, I trust, sufficiently point out to you the necessity of the measure. I am at the same time happy that it affords me an opportunity of congratulating you upon the return of the blessings of peace, by the signing of the Definitive Treaty.

"Mr. Speaker, and Gentlemen of the Assembly,—You will, I hope, with your usual patriotism and liberality, take into your consideration, the peculiar circumstances in which this island is at present placed, and make a full provision for the exigencies of the service accordingly.

"Gentlemen of the Council, Mr. Speaker, and Gentlemen of the Assembly,—I shall direct the necessary papers to be laid before you, in order to explain the nature of the communications which I have had from his Majesty's ministers, upon the subject of the present meeting."

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

It is a maxim in courts of justice, that the criminal who impudently sets up a justification, thereby forfeits those pretensions, which he otherwise might have, to mercy: we cannot, therefore, but be surprised, that the modest and meek Mr. Addington should have attempted publicly to justify his seizure on the clerkship of the pells. He has (see True Briton of the 11th inst.) cited the conduct of Sir Robert Walpole, and of the old Lord Holland, as precedents in his favour. The former, he says, gave this very clerkship to his son, then a minor, and the latter gave the clerkship of the Irish pells to the present Charles Fox, who was also under age at the time. To have made out his case he should have proved, that his claims, whether as to birth, consequence, or public services, were equal to those of Sir Robert or of Lord Holland. As to disinterestedness, few persons, we believe, will deny that his pretensions may be quite as well founded as those of the famous Lord Holland; but, with respect to birth, to parliamentary weight, or to public services, what resemblance is there between Mr. Addington and the rival of Lord Chatham? And, as to Sir Robert Walpole, to draw a comparison between Mr. Addington and him is, perhaps, the most outrageous insult that ever was offered to the understanding of a public, even the most senseless or forbearing. Sir Robert Walpole was a gentleman of an ancient and opulent family; of great influence in the parliament and in the nation, as well from his talents as his connexions, the whole of which influence he most sedulously and jealously employed, for many years, with the view of securing the succession of the House of Brunswick to the throne of these kingdoms; he came into office as prime minister with thirty years distinguished services already performed, and he brought with him a weight and consequence, without which the Government could not, at that time, have existed. Such is the man whom Mr. Addington thinks he has a right to emulate in point of remuneration. Supposing, however, that he were perfectly upon a footing with Sir Robert Walpole and Lord Holland, it remains for him to prove, that their disposition of the sinecures in question was not unjustifiable. He has hunted through the long list of ministers, and has been able to find but two precedents for his conduct. How comes he to have followed the example of Lord Holland in preference to that of Mr. Pitt? He says, the place was offered to Mr. Pitt. That we can readily believe. It would, perhaps, not have been very safe to omit the compliment. Nor, do we suppose, that he finally took the good thing into his own family, without Mr. Pitt's consent and advice, for which, as well as for the refusal to take it himself, it requires no great sagacity to discover a very sufficient reason, without having recourse to the romantic motives of disinterestedness and friendship. We cannot quit this subject without pointing out the contrast between the conduct of the Premier and that of the Bishop of London. The rich living of St. James's has lately fallen in the gift of his lordship, who has several nephews in the church, all of them of excellent character and talents. On one of these gentlemen he might, without incurring any blame, without exciting any envy, have conferred this valuable preferment. He, doubtless, would have wished to do it; but, justly considering the interests of the church and of religion as of greater importance than those of his family, he has bestowed it, not on a relation, not on a favourite of the court, not an old friend or acquaintance, but on a gentleman, who was known to him only as a clergyman, exemplary in his character, and famed above all others for the eloquence and effect of his sermons.—Were it not too late, we would say to Mr. Addington: “Go thou and do likewise.”

In looking abroad, the first thing we have perceived, since our last sheet, is, the actual promotion of Buonaparté's uncle to the archbishoprick of Lyons. We stated, (p. 154) that this poor peasant had been put to school by his nephew, in order to fit him for his meditated dignity; but, we hardly imagined, that, at his age, he would have made so rapid a progress in his studies. Were we not restrained by motives of delicacy, we should have no scruple in proposing to Mr. Addington to send to France for the tutor of uncle Fesche; for, not to mention the particular and most important object, at which we hinted at the top of page 154, this sort of telegraphic tutorship must, by the present ministry, be considered as of infinite moment to the well-being of the state.

Of the supplement to the French constitution, (see p. 165) what shall we, what can we say? There is no analysing such an unintelligible mass of words. The change it introduces is another step towards establishing a new dynasty, towards raising the house of Buonaparté to the throne of the Bourbons; but, as to the state of liberty, or slavery, in France, it will produce not the least alteration. If it makes any variation in the prospect of other nations, it renders it more gloomy; because it, in some slight degree, strengthens and consolidates the government of Buonaparté, and thereby tears one verse from the chapter of accidents, to which alone, this country in particular, can possibly look for hope. The London papers, especially those of the republican stamp, have, in the new constitution, found a fertile subject of complaint and abuse. We can readily account for their clamour, and we are persuaded that Buonaparté will excuse it, when he considers, that he has completely blasted all their doctrines and their projects. They are now obliged to confess, that the predictions of Mr. Burke are fulfilled; and, as if on purpose to cap the climax of their disgrace, their great leader, Mr. Fox, arrived in France on the very day that the last stone of the "stupendous monument of human wisdom and human happiness," was levelled with the earth. There may it lie for ever! Far be it from us to extol the character or conduct of Buonaparté: they are too deeply stained with blasphemy and with blood: but, (leaving his usurpation out of sight) as far as relates to France itself, as far as relates to the people over whom he has obtained command, we must say, that his late acts merit commendation; of the truth of which, the clamours of our republican prints furnish a most satisfactory proof. They blame and abuse him, not for his tyranny, but for having ceased to exercise it against the royalists exclusively; not for what he has withheld from the church, but for what he has restored to it; not for his hypocrisy, but for his no longer being an open blasphemer; not for his having sanctioned past acts of plunder, but for his having forbidden them for the future; not for his keeping the Bourbons from the throne, but for having mounted it himself.

It has been stated in the ministerial prints, that the Emperor of Russia has not given his assent to the convention lately concluded at Paris between France and Prussia, having for its object a new partition of dominion in Germany. We believe, that the contrary of this is the fact; and we shall not be at all surprised to see Hanover once more an object of solicitude. England has abandoned the Continent, and can expect to retain no influence in any part of it; nay, we sincerely believe that Mr. Addington and his colleagues know no more of what is passing in the cabinets of Berlin, Petersburg, or Paris, than of what is passing in the moon.

From the language of the French official paper, we should suppose, that Buonaparté had some design to make war upon the Barbary States. If he does it, it will be with a view to colonize them, which would be no difficult matter. As to any prevention from us, or from the other neighbouring powers, that is out of the question. The very mention of a new rupture with France would drive Mr. Addington from his place, and he has not half finished his royal mansion in Richmond Park yet. Besides, the pulse of the nation beats high against the "atrocious horde of pirates." It is curious, and not less disgusting than curious, to hear those, who were loud for "peace on any terms" with France, now crying out for war against the poor despicable states of Barbary. The ministers would, doubtless, wish to adhere to our ancient policy with respect to those states; that is, to support them against the other maritime powers; but they well know, that they would not dare to act upon that policy; and, should France make the request, it is, with us, matter of serious doubt, whether "the respectable" Mr. Addington and his colleagues, would not send a British squadron to assist Buonaparté in his projected invasion. The supposition carries, indeed, their complaisance and our humiliation pretty far; but, what may we not suppose, after what we have seen actually take place? We do not see the necessity of our co-operation in any project against the piratical states; but, if it be absolutely necessary, and if it be made the sine qua non of a continuation of peace with France, we have no hesitation to say, that it will not be refused by the present ministers. The invasion of these states, made part of a project laid before the Directory at the time the invasion of Egypt was in agitation; and, it is by no means impossible, that this project may be revived. That Buonaparté intends to re-occupy Egypt there can be no doubt; but, without taking that object into view, the conquest of the Barbary States has quite sufficient charms for the nation who has always had a strong desire to exclude us totally from the Mediterranean, and who well knows, that, completely cut off from all communication with the coast of Africa, we should soon find the rock of Gibraltar untenable. We are aware, that the spinning-jenny politicians, will reply, "so much the better!" Doctors Priestley and Price succeeded (as the former says) in convincing Lord Shelburne, that England ought to have no foreign possessions at all; and Sir George Saville frankly acknowledged, that he would have proposed the giving up of Gibraltar, only he found the proposition too unpopular, and that "the people had a foolish prejudice against yielding what they called "the honours of the country."* This foolish prejudice is now happily removed; and, we may safely conclude, that if Gibraltar has not yet been yielded, it is only because it has not yet been asked.

It is said, that the American minister, Mr. Livingston, has applied to the French government to obtain a delay, at least, in the colonization of Louisiana and the Floridas. We think it is very likely, that this application has been made. We know it was made in February last, to the government of both France and Spain, though it is very difficult to perceive why it should have been made to the latter. The answer then was, as we dare say it now will be, very equivocal. It is, indeed, no very grateful request to make to any power. Why should America solicit France to abstain from taking possession of, and colonizing, territories unquestionably her own? The language of Mr. President Jefferson, being plainly understood, will be this: "I am your friend; my partizans are your friends: more than one half of the people of the 'United States are your friends. You have, moreover, the noisy half, and noise has more influence in a republic than sense; you have the poor half, and the poor are much bolder than the rich; you have the roguish half, and the rogues in my country are much more active than honest men. But, though you have all the noise, poverty, and roguery; all the deception, boldness, and vigilance, on your side; though a great majority of the American citizens love you better than the British, they all love their own persons and property better than they love you. And, you must know, that they are deeply impressed with the notion, that if you take complete possession of Louisiana and the Floridas, you will serve them as you have served Belgium, Switzerland, Holland, &c. &c. This is, undoubtedly, an erroneous persuasion; nevertheless they have imbibed it, and when they once take up a notion, they are not easily prevailed upon to cast it away. This being the case, they will be extremely jealous of you; the partisans of England, who are all upon the qui vive, will take advantage of the favourable opportunity; a clamour will be raised against you from one end of the country to the other; your staunch partizans will not, indeed, desert to the enemy, but they will grow timid; I myself shall be compelled to put on the garb of enmity towards you, and, notwithstanding this, I shall, at the next election, be compelled to give way to a partisan of England, who, very probably,

"may avail himself of the anger of the people against you, to obtain their consent to an alliance offensive and defensive with Great-Britain, which would completely baffle all the glorious projects by which you intend to render the world happy under the domination of France." We do not say, that Mr. Livingston will, in the name of his master, make use of these very words; but, if ever the papers should be published, it will certainly be found, that we have here given the substance of his statement. What reply Talleyrand may make him it is difficult to say. Ours would be this: "It is something new in diplomatic history for a nation to solicit another not to make use of its own territory. It is strange, too, that the reason assigned for this sacrifice should be the danger of offending a people, who love us, by going to settle in the vicinage of that people! If they are really our friends, they will rejoice at our approach; if not, that approach will not lose us their friendship. As to the danger of throwing our present partizans into the opposite scale, and finally producing an alliance between America and Great-Britain, were it possible for the former nation to propose the measure, the latter dares not accede to it. She can have no war for many years. In England war is become synonymous with evil, and peace with good. This the Americans will soon perceive, and, well knowing, that they cannot support a war with us alone, even in the heart of their own continent (to say nothing of the speedy destruction of their maritime towns) they will have the sense to hold their tongues, and think themselves very fortunate, not only if we settle our own territory, but if we should content ourselves with a trifling encroachment on theirs."—Such, we believe, will be the substance of the negotiation. It is not impossible, however, that Jefferson may obtain a mitigation of the project of the First Consul, who will, for a time, probably be satisfied with occupying the mouth and the western bank of the Mississippi, leaving the Floridas untouched for a while. The projects of France are so great and so numerous, that it is absolutely impossible to undertake them all at once, and none will suffer less from delay than that which is connected with the colonization of Louisiana and the Floridas.

There is one enemy in America, of whom Buonaparté does not seem to have any knowledge, but who is, nevertheless, more formidable than the United States: we mean GENERAL BOWLES, the Director General of the four nations of Indians, inhabiting the eastern borders of the mouth of the Mississippi. They do, indeed, extend their boundaries over great part of West and a portion of East Florida. About six weeks ago, it was stated in the London papers, that Bowles had been taken by the Spaniards, and put to death. We contradicted this statement at the time. It is now discovered, that he is alive, and has vessels cruising against the Spaniards. By turning to the Register, Vol. I. p. 735 and 736, it will be perceived, that he had long had vessels cruising against the Spaniards, and that he had established a Court of Admiralty, for the trial of Prize Causes, at the Bay of Espiritu Santo, which he had made his principal place of rendezvous and residence. This is the enemy whom Buonaparté would have to fear in his American project; but Bowles, unfortunately, is upon bad terms with the Americans, and, without their aid, he must soon be driven back, especially if he obtains neither arms nor ammunition from this country, which he certainly will not. He is the lawful chief of a people as independent in the eye of the law of nations as the English or the French; yet, so brave are our ministers when they have Buonaparté at their back, that we shall be much surprized, if they do not, upon the first request, or rather order, of the Consul, send out instructions for the capture and condemnation of Bowles's vessels, and for the punishment of his seamen as pirates.

It is truly curious to observe with what wonderful zeal and unanimity the newspapers of London have united to repel the attack made on themselves and the ministry by Buonaparté's official paper, (see p. 179); just as if this was the first time, that the Consul had endeavoured to curtail the freedom of the British press! Most of the newspapers (the ministerial ones in particular) highly applauded the abuse which the Moniteur bestowed on the opposers of the peace. Its observations, though replete with venom and falsehood, then met with the "hearty concurrence" of the very persons who now are, or affect to be, mortally offended. This is, in fact, a little passionate squabble between Buonaparté and his bosom friends, with which we and our readers have, thank God, nothing to do. That this squabble should, however, depress the funds three per cent. is a circumstance which alone might give us a tolerable idea of "the blessings of peace." This fact, which cannot be disguised, has fully discovered the dependence of this nation on the will of Buonaparté. Credit is to preserve us; but what is to preserve that credit if the value of the funds depend upon the whim of our enemy? If a pain in the head, or a curtain-lecture, at Malmaison, may, at any time, spread bankruptcy through the city of London?

PUBLIC PAPERS.

At the Court at Weymouth, Aug. 16, Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

His Majesty in Council was this day pleased to order the Right Hon. the Lord High Chancellor to issue Writs for proroguing the Parliament, which was appointed to meet on Tuesday the 21st day of this instant August, to Tuesday the 5th day of October next; and also for proroguing the Convocations of Canterbury and York, which were appointed to meet on Wednesday the 1st day of September next, to Wednesday the 6th day of October next.

At the Court at Weymouth, August 15, Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

Whereas by an Act passed in the last Session of Parliament, intituled "An Act for enabling his Majesty to permit the Importation and Exportation of certain Goods and Commodities into and from the Port of Road Harbour, in the Island of Tortola, until the 1st day of July, 1803, and from thence until six weeks after the commencement of the then next Session of Parliament:" It is declared to be expedient that certain articles, goods, and commodities, enumerated in certain acts passed in the twenty-seventh, thirty-second, and thirty-third years of his Majesty's reign, should be permitted by his Majesty, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to be imported from countries and plantations in America, and the West-Indies, belonging to, or under the dominion of any foreign European sovereign or state, into the Port of Road Harbour, in the Island of Tortola, one of the Virgin Islands, and to be exported from thence to this kingdom, in the same manner, and subject to the same duties, rules, regulations, conditions, and restrictions, and to the same penalties and forfeitures for the breach thereof, as are provided with respect to the Port of Nassau, in the Island of New Providence, one of the Bahama Islands, in the said acts, or in any other act or acts of Parliament, for amending or continuing the same, and subject to such other rules, regulations, conditions, and restrictions, as shall be directed by his Majesty, by and with the advice aforesaid; and it is enacted, that from and after the passing of the said act, and until the 1st day of July, 1803, and from thence until six weeks after the commencement of the next Session of Parliament, it shall and may be lawful for his Majesty, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to permit the importation into the said Port of Road Harbour, in the island of Tortola, one of the Virgin Islands, and the exportation from thence to this kingdom of all such articles, goods, and commodities, as are permitted by the said acts to be imported into the said Port of Nassau, in the Island of New Providence, one of the Bahama Islands, and to be exported from thence to this kingdom; and that such articles, goods, and commodities shall and may be imported and exported in the same manner, and shall be subject to the same duties, and entitled to the same drawback, and shall be subject to the same rules, regulations, conditions, and restrictions, and to the same penalties and forfeitures for the breach thereof as are provided in the said acts, or any of them, respecting such importation into the said Port of Nassau, in the Island of New Providence, and the exportation from thence to this kingdom, and shall be subject to such other rules, regulations, conditions, and restrictions as shall from time to time be directed by his Majesty, by and with the advice aforesaid; his Majesty is thereupon pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to permit, and doth by his order in Council permit, during the time limited by the said act, the importation into the said port of Road Harbour, in the Island of Tortola, one of the Virgin Islands, from countries and plantations in America and the West-Indies, belonging to or under the dominion of any foreign European sovereign or state, of all such articles, goods, and commodities enumerated in the said above recited acts, passed in the twenty-seventh, thirty-second, and thirty-third years of his Majesty's reign, as are permitted by the said acts to be imported into the said port of Nassau, in the Island of New Providence, one of the Bahama Islands, and also the exportation thereof from the said port of Road Harbour, in the Island of Tortola aforesaid, in the same manner, and subject to the same duties, rules, regulations, conditions, and restrictions, and to the same penalties and forfeitures for the breach thereof, as are provided in the said acts, or any of them, respecting such importation into the said port of Nassau, in the Island of New Providence, and the exportation from thence to this kingdom, and subject also to the conditions, rules, and regulations herein-after mentioned; that is to say, that before any sugar or coffee, the produce of Tortola and its dependencies, shall be permitted or suffered to be shipped or laden on board any ship or vessel, each and every package shall be stamped or marked by the proper officer of the customs, in Roman letters, of not less than two inches in length, with the words British Pn.; that all sugar and coffee, not being the produce of any of the British plantations, islands, or territories, shall, upon importation into Road Harbour, be laid on land and examined, and shall be deposited in safe and secure warehouses under the joint locks of his Majesty and the owner or proprietor of such sugar or coffee, and the same shall not be afterwards shipped or laden on board any ship or vessel, unless directly from such warehouses, (upon due entry thereof being first made), under the care and inspection of the proper officer of the customs; and before any such sugar or coffee shall be permitted or suffered to be shipped or laden on board any ship or vessel, each and every package shall be stamped or marked by the proper officer of the customs, in Roman letters, of not less than two inches in length, with the word Foreign, and shall also be numbered progressively; and the Right Honourable the Lords Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury, and the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, are to give the necessary directions herein as to them may respectively appertain.

Steph. Cottrell.

TO THE RIGHT HON. WM. PITT.

Sir,—As I am pretty sure you never read the True Briton, and as I have the vanity to hope, that you do read this Register, I take the liberty to make a few extracts from that paper, that you may be informed of the danger to which your reputation is exposed.

True Briton, 12th Aug.—“It is positively asserted that the office of Clerk of the Pells. vacant by the death of Colonel BARRE, was offered to Mr. PITT, and declined. The Minister, after having made this laudable offering at the Shrine of Public Virtue, naturally consulted the feelings of a parent, and bestowed it on his eldest son.”—In the same paper of the 13th instant you are called “the greatest and brightest character that this, or any other nation ever possessed.” And further on: “A minister, whose vigorous mind, comprehensive genius, and sublime patriotism are balanced only by his private and unsullied worth, and by a disinterestedness, which has no parallel in the annals of mankind.”—In the same paper of the 14th instant, you are called, “the man who conciliates the admiration of all nations, and must continue to be that of all posterity while civilized society has existence.”—Having exhausted the powers of prose, your eulogist, in his paper of the 18th, has recourse to poetry; as thus:

“Hail, virtuous Son of CHATHAM, hail;
“May angels guard thy breast,
“And thro’ life’s boisterous sea still sail,
“By Britain’s sons caress’d.

“But when the Lord of Life thinks fit
“To claim thee for his own,
“May thy just soul, O, WILLIAM PITT,
“Inhabit near his throne!”

The poor creature who promulgates this hyperbolic flattery, this execrable nonsense, thinks he is assisting not only to support your character generally, but, in particular, to preserve it in its state of exaltation above that of Mr. Addington; but, if not for your own sake, yet, for the sake of your friends, pray, Sir, order your valet to silence this canting sycophant. To be puffed like posture-masters, or play-actors, may, for aught I know or care, be no degradation to the Foxes or the Russells; but to you, Sir, it certainly is, and as such it is felt by all those whose friendship is worth your possessing.

I am, Sir,
Your most humble
and most obedient servant,

WM. COBBETT.

Pall-Mall, 10th Aug. 1802.

 FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

 MINISTER OF THE MARINE.

The General in Chief to the Minister of the Marine.

Head-quarters at Basse Terre, Guadeloupe,
18 Messidor, year 10, (July 7.)

Citizen Minister,—I have ordered that the members of the Provisional Council established in Guadeloupe on the 29th Vendémiaire should proceed to France, that they may be at the disposition of the government. They will arrive at Brest on board the Fougoux, which sails to-morrow, with the exception of Citizen Danois, who before our arrival had gone to the United States of America. I have given the same orders with regard to a great many inhabitants of the colony. The latter, though they did not act so conspicuous a part in the events which have lately happened in Guadeloupe, nevertheless took a very active part. The explanations which their defence must render necessary, will contribute much to inform the government of the stability which the revolt of the 29th Vendémiaire would have acquired, if its fatal effects had not been prevented by the victories of the French troops.

I have the honour to salute you,

RICHEPANSE.

The General in Chief to the Minister of the Marine.

Head-quarters at Basse Terre, 18 Messidor, year 10 (July 7.)

Citizen Minister,—The French soldiers, after having combatted the black troops, after having witnessed the barbarous treatment their wounded companions received, who were horribly mutilated in the field of battle, could not have seen such a man in their ranks without the most painful sensations and the best grounded mistrust. I have felt the same sentiment. I was of opinion their exclusion from the military profession, which they have disgraced, on which they have long built plans of independence, and which furnished them the means of oppressing the whites, was the first and the most necessary step to the re-establishment of order. I therefore have not included in the new formation of the divisions of the army any man of colour, except a small number for the baggage and provision department, and about 150 mechanics of different kinds for the corps of miners. I have ordered the greatest part of the black officers attached to the army of Guadeloupe before the arrival of the expedition to proceed to France in the Redoubtable and Fougoux. Those who took a part in the revolt have been shot, or have made their escape. I shall shut up all those who remain in retired places or in the neighbouring islands, and all who are arrested shall experience the same treatment. The removal of these individuals will greatly contribute to the permanence of good order, which cannot exist but by the presence and exertion of the European troops.

I have the honour to salute you,

RICHEPANSE.

The General in Chief to the Minister of the Marine.

Head-quarters Basse Terre, Guadeloupe,
19 Messidor, year 10 (July 8.)

Citizen Minister,—My last dispatches concerning affairs in Guadeloupe were dated 9 Prairial (May 29), at which time all my military operations of importance had terminated by the capture of Matouba. The troops have since had only to pursue the remnant of rebels, inaccessible to all the means of persuasion, and incapable of returning to their duty. Nothing but the death of these wretches could put a stop to conflagration and the murder of the whites in the colony. The assassinations, and the devastations which have fallen upon some proprietors, excite in my bosom the most painful sensations. But I must consider, as a fortunate event for the regeneration of the colony, the resolution taken by the people of colour to oppose the disembarkation of the army. It is certain that they flew to arms from a suspicion that the object of my mission was to reduce the whole body of black troops, and to compel a part of them to submit again to the labours of cultivation. They were likewise animated with a hope that Toussaint would be able to maintain his authority in Saint-Domingo. They were aware that the troops composing the expedition sent from France were very few in number. Now that security and tranquillity are completely re-established, all the ideas of agricultural and commercial prosperity begin to spring up. The obstacles to this prosperity arose from the ambition of the leaders of the armed force, from the license of a numerous body of troops, and from the habits of idleness and pillage of the common negroes. 15,000 have returned to their habitation, where they will be subjected to a just and severe discipline. The officers, subalterns, and men of the army have conducted themselves in this campaign like French soldiers. Courage, discipline, and attachment to the government. These are the virtues they had never ceased to display in a war which left them no alternative but to conquer. I will send you the names of those deserving particular praise; and I implore your friendly solicitude in favour of the widows and orphans left by those who have fallen in the field of battle, or who have died of their wounds. I subjoin a list (which is, alas! too numerous) of those brave men.

I have the honour to salute you,

RICHEPANSÉ.

America, New-York, July 9. Captain Jackson informs us, that one of the Bowles's privateers had lately taken a Spanish brig bound from Havannah for St. Augustine, valued at 40,000*l.* sterling; for the same privateer had also captured a Spanish schooner loaded with flour; both of which were sent into a port on the west side of Cuba, the name of which Captain Jackson does not recollect.—We are happy to learn from every quarter to which our inquiries have extended, that the crops this year, particularly of wheat and other small grain, are very extensive and uncommonly exuberant. A cargo of new wheat, grown in Talbot county, was brought over yesterday in the Easton packet, and readily commanded 9*s.* 6*d.* per bushel; a price by no means disencouraging to the farmer.—In many parts the wheat harvest has turned out more heavy than in any one year for the last twelve; and although the demand for flour, the staple of the middle states, is not now so great as when the seed was last fall committed to the earth, yet the augmentation in quantity, we hope, will amply compensate the farmer for the declension in price. Should wheat even fall to one dollar a bushel, our millers will in that case grind for the European market; and if double the quantity of grain be produced, as is the case in many districts, our country will probably reap the same advantage from this source of wealth the present, as she did the last.

Petersburgh, July 13.—The Count de Panin having resolved to visit successively the different States of Europe, has determined to begin with Sweden. Arrived in Finland, he was visited by the Count de Klingspor, who, after expressing surprise at his taking the road through Finland, which offered nothing to satisfy the wants, or gratify the curiosity of a traveller, advised him to proceed to Stockholm by water. This was refused by the Count de Panin, and the Count de Klingspor retired, but a few minutes after wrote to the Count de Panin, informing him that it was the desire of the King of Sweden, that his Excellency should not continue his journey through the kingdom. With this desire the Count de Panin complied. It was observable, that after the peace between England and Denmark, Sweden claimed an indemnity of Russia, under the pretence of having fitted out armaments, at considerable expense, for the defence of the Sound, but that the demand was rejected at the time the Count de Panin was minister. The Count de Panin returned to Russia, and informed the Emperor of what had happened; who answered, "I desire you to believe that I consider the insult you have met with as an offence directed against my own person." It is not yet known what will be the result of this affair, which has become very serious.

Proclamation of the Council of Execution of the Helvetic Republic to the Helvetic People.

Citizens of Helvetia, The French Government approves of the use you have made of your independence; and the first pledge it gives you of its esteem, is that of declaring its readiness to withdraw its troops from Helvetia. The Council of Execution has accepted of this offer.—That great act of justice, on the part of the First Consul, should call forth all your gratitude to so generous an ally. Without him, and without these troops, that are now about to depart from you, you again would have been a prey to all the horrors of anarchy.—Now he thinks you may be relieved from the expenses which the necessity of maintaining a foreign army, had imposed upon you. Agriculture, industry, and commerce, will again flourish amongst you, under the shade of peace. The Citizens shall reap the fruits of those blessings, without being obliged to part with them: and the father of a family, retiring to his habitation at night, will feel with pleasure, that it contains none but his own children; every Swiss will see himself surrounded by his countrymen alone.—But the departure of foreign troops from your country, should above all things be a cause of thanksgiving to you. You, who are stung with grief at beholding this land, so celebrated for the glorious battles of our forefathers, become a theatre of war for neighbouring states: you who mourned when you thought you had no longer a national will left sufficient to restrain factions, nor a government able to support itself, should now rejoice; you should open your hearts to confidence. The independence of your country, acknowledged in the stipulations of Luneville, now obtains that privilege in substance. Helvetia again enjoys her national manners, and her ancient liberty.—But know on what conditions you are to have the blessings of independence; and what duties the confidence of the French government, and the confidence of your own government, impose on you. They command you to observe peace and concord. They require of you the sacrifice of all those regrets, of all those hopes and desires, which are no longer compatible with the existing order of things. They call on you in an imperious manner to rally round the constitution, and the government which it establishes; for it is only according to the constitution, and by the government, that liberty and independence can be preserved. In supporting these, you will be able to continue a nation; in abandoning them, you must perish. They wish that the author of every attempt against the actual state of things, may be punished in an exemplary manner. Such is the national will; such is the intention declared by the First Consul on withdrawing his troops. Citizens, there exists among the governments of Europe, a compact for the maintenance of peace, order, and those principles which preserve every political society.—Too long have the Swiss disturbed foreign powers with their dissensions; and if, now that those powers are disposed to take some interest in our destinies, any disorders should rise up amongst us, we must expect to see the same powers, for the sake of their safety, taking up arms against us.—We here declare ourselves to be the guarantees for the will of the people, consecrated by the constitution, and we have pledged ourselves to the French government, that the peace shall not be disturbed in Switzerland. Prudence in council; celerity in execution; justice to all; prompt severity against the factious and the disturbers of public tranquillity; these are, and shall ever be, the rule of our conduct.

The Landamman, President of the Council of Execution—Dolder.

The Secretary General—Motsson.

Vienna, July 26.—The decree of the imperial commission, relative to the indemnities, is to the following effect:

“On the part of his Majesty Francis II. Emperor of the Romans, our most gracious Sovereign, to the illustrious counsellors, envoys and ministers of the electors, princes and states of the holy Roman empire at the general diet. The essential object of the conclusum most humbly submitted on the 2d of October to his Imperial Majesty, and ratified by him on the 7th of November last, was to fix and determine in a precise manner the mode of co-operation of the states of the empire to the fulfilment of the peace. The moment is arrived, when the extraordinary deputation of the empire, appointed constitutionally, and according to the accustomed forms of the deliberations of the diet, and agreed to by his Imperial Majesty, ought to assemble to attain this important end, and to answer by the scrupulous accomplishment of the important duties imposed upon it, the particular confidence which the Emperor and the empire have placed in its enlightened wisdom and its patriotism. In order to this, his Imperial Majesty, in virtue of the authority vested in him, as supreme chief of the empire, orders that the states which are to form a part of the said deputation, do send, as soon as possible, their sub-delegates to the imperial city of Ratisbon, which has been considered in concert with the French government, the most suitable place for holding the congress, and that the full powers furnished by the empire to the said deputation, for the purpose of definitively regulating and terminating the work of peace, be expedited conformably to the conclusum ratified by his Majesty, and submitted according to custom to the imperial sanction. In consequence of these dispositions, his Imperial Majesty has already given the most precise orders to the counsellor Schraut, appointed by him in his quality of a state of the empire electoral sub-delegate of Bohemia, to proceed without delay from Paris to Ratisbon; and he has appointed as his minister plenipotentiary, in his quality of supreme chief of the empire, the Baron de Hugel, privy counsellor and imperial commissary at the general diet.”

This decree was expedited on the 23d to Ratisbon. The Baron de Hugel received his instructions immediately. M. de Schraut, who is at Paris, will find his at Ratisbon on his arrival in that city.

Munster, July 27.—Our government has issued the following proclamation relative to the entrance of the Prussian troops into this country: "We, grand dean and canon of the cathedral of Munster, vested with the sovereign authority, &c. &c.—The sovereign chapter, in taking the reins of government, has had no other object in view but the happiness of the inhabitants; and it presumes to flatter itself, that every body being convinced of this truth will repose unlimited confidence in the advice and orders of the sovereign chapter. Strong in this conviction it orders the inhabitants of whatever rank soever to comport themselves tranquilly upon the entrance of the Prussian troops, to give a good reception to the soldiers, who shall be billeted upon them, to prevent their wants, to abstain from all political reflections, and not to take the law into their own hands, in cases where any difficulties may arise between the inhabitants and the soldiers; but to carry their complaints, without delay, either before the civil officers, or the military officers, and to refer them to their judgment; and in case they shall not think justice done them by such judgment, to prefer new complaints to a superior officer, and in no case to take the proceedings in their own hands. Upon conforming himself strictly to this proclamation, every inhabitant shall enjoy peace and tranquillity; but on departing from it he may expect to be punished by his superiors. The sovereign chapter, bound by its duty, and the love it bears the inhabitants, to make this proclamation public, will not neglect to use extreme vigilance to procure for them solid and durable happiness. In order that the present proclamation may be made known to all the inhabitants, it shall be printed and read from the pulpit, posted up in every convenient place, and a copy sent to all the authorities.

Paris, 14th. Aug.—Memorial of the Engravers and Printers employed at the Manufactories of Printed Cottons in the City of Rouen, to the First Consul of the French Republic.

General First Consul.—If there be a principle at present generally agreed upon, it is, that the power and true greatness of empires are the patrimony of the industrious and commercial nations. England more than any other nation presents a model worthy of imitation. This empire, consisting of a territory of but small extent, and containing scarcely more than ten millions of individuals, possesses, notwithstanding, a marked preponderance in the commercial system of the whole world. Far from the war having proved disastrous to this power, amidst the calamities of the nations of the continent, she has established a domination of such colossal magnitude, that for a long period no nation can enter into competition with her.

France, more than any other power, seemed destined, by the genius of her inhabitants and her position, to excite that competition, to balance the value of the products of industry, and to maintain the contest in every thing which relates to the perfection of any production; and this merit is allowed to her by the unequivocal suffrages of all nations. But the cause which paralyzes our industry and our commerce, originates in circumstances of, perhaps, a more powerful operation than any which have been hitherto alledged.

The French government, almost incessantly occupied, during six years, with its own political dissensions, and having to carry on a war at home and abroad, could but little employ itself in examining these circumstances, and in preventing their effects. The epoch of a general peace induced a hope of less disastrous consequences. We make bold to inform you, citizen general, that it is of extreme urgency that you should fix your attention upon the city of Rouen and the department. Our manufacturing industry is on the verge of ruin, if speedy measures do not stop the decay produced by false theories, and the spirit of the commercial system.

Some have ventured to assert, that French industry can be carried to the highest perfection only by the stimulus of a rival industry. Were then is this rival-ship to be found? Is it in the execution of the processes for completing the products of our industry, or in the want of the raw materials necessary to this perfection? Is it in the channels of consumption for a commerce as yet but of very small extent, from the want of confidence? or, in a word, is it, from a more fatal consequence, in the little national spirit possessed by Frenchmen?

Foreign industry, and particularly that of our powerful rival, enjoys a degree of protection too little regarded by the French merchant, and which, though hitherto overlooked, has rendered it predominant. Ours, on the contrary, compelled to trust to its own efforts, exhibits only decay and complete depression. On the one side there is an abundance of raw materials, and at moderate prices : and immense capitals, and resources always presented by the public banks, enable the manufacturer to attempt and to support every speculation. On the other, those materials are scarce and very dear ; capital is not advanced for the promotion of our manufactures, but at a ruinous interest ; in a word, an exchange destructive of commerce and confidence dries up every source of national prosperity ; every thing makes in favour of the rivals of our manufacturing industry, and we must speedily be involved in total ruin!—Yet there are persons who can maintain that France must have the advantage in a competition where the means are so unequal!

We hold the same opinion as to the perfection of the objects of industry ; but what signifies the value of things, if the sale is not certain, and if the nation gives greater advantages to foreign products? Our reflections are fixed on the present state of affairs. Scarcely has maritime peace been proclaimed, when the introduction of merchandize commences, the French warehouses are over stocked, our manufactures languish, and forebode general ruin. The French soil has not rejected the foreign commodities ; avarice and extortion have favoured their circulation. See what is the result. The productions of industry incumber the warehouses of our manufactures ; labour is repressed ; workshops are shut up ; thousands of workmen are thrown out of employment, without even a prospect of being able to gain wherewith to support their numerous families.

This is but an imperfect view of the picture. Let us consider the future. By-and-by, if such a system does not cease, if French commerce prefer the products of foreign nations, if our manufactories and workshops receive no encouragement, all is over. All the shops are shut, manufacturing industry abandoned, talents paralyzed, and thousands of citizens, with their families, reduced to the most frightful poverty ! While we are representing to you our fears and alarms, there is not a fourth part of us in a state of activity. Every day witnesses many unfortunate men swelling the list of victims. Those who are yet retained, are retained only in consideration of old services, and they are threatened soon to share those calamities with which that class are afflicted, if the government does not speedily remedy the evil.

This is not all. Our hands once become idle, a thousand other states participate our misfortunes by a necessary consequence ; our inaction stops their labours ; every thing is linked together in a state ; if you dam up a brook at the source, the fertile plains it watered are struck with barrenness.

We are exposing, General Consul, great and touching truths. Oh ! that you could hear the cries of want, the sighs, and the despair of the families of our unfortunate companions ! They are absolutely naked, and can see nothing before them but more profound distress.

General Consul, we expect, from your solicitude, a period to those miseries which weigh upon us in so terrible a manner. A few moments more, and our important city will possess no more workmen ; many of them will be devoured by want and misery. Disgust, and offers from foreigners, will have caused the emigration of the rest ! What powerful considerations !

We have spoken the truth ; government is worthy to hear it. We hope that the First Magistrate of the Republic will turn his paternal regard towards one of the most industrious departments, to the workshops of our manufacturers, that their labours may receive encouragement ! The workman asks only one favour, that his hands may be constantly employed, that his work may suffice for supplying his wants. Then his wishes will be accomplished.

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES.

The depredations committed by the mobs in the West of England, under pretext of a want of work, are stated as follows in the Gazette of the 17th instant.

April 22d last, a large hay-rick ; and a few days afterwards, a dog kennel and oar-rick belonging to Mr. Warren, of Warminster, Wilts, was wilfully and maliciously set on fire.—May 20, the cart of Mr. Bayley of Calstone-Mills, near Devizes, returning from Warminster, was stopped on the Downs (by five men, four of whom had their faces disguised, and a sixth man holding their coats at a distance), and the driver compelled to leave the cart whilst the men cut and otherwise injured the cloths therein.—June 23, a gun was fired in the night into the window of a house occupied by a workman of Messrs. Bleek and Strode at Warminster : About the same time a rick of hay belonging to Mr. Dunn, of Trowbridge, was wilfully and maliciously set on fire.—June 26, a large rick of hay belonging to Messrs. T. and M. Tugwell, of Bradford, was also wilfully and maliciously set on fire; and a threatening letter was, about the same time, put under the door of the workshops of, and addressed to the said Messrs. T. and M. Tugwell.—June 29, in the night a gun was fired into the chamber of the dwelling-house of Mr. Henry Wansley, of Warminster, in the county of Wilts.—July 6, in the night, a gun was fired into the house of Mr. John Jones, and another immediately afterwards, into the house of — Baker, both workmen to Mr. Henry Wansley; and the same night a gun was fired into the house of Mr. Stancomb, manufacturer, at Trowbridge.—July 13, in the night, a barn, stable, &c. the property of Mr. G. Warren, manufacturer, at Warminster, was wilfully and maliciously set fire to, and wholly consumed;—and an anonymous letter was sent to another manufacturer at Warminster about this time, threatening, by Almighty God, to have his life within a month.—July 14, in the night, the factory of Messrs. Jones, Hart, Jones, and Co. at Staverton, near Bradford, was attacked by an armed body of men, who fired many rounds of bullets, slugs, &c. which demolished the windows, and did other damage.—July 16, this night Clifford Mill and premises, near Beckington, Somerset, the property of Mr. Newton, was wilfully and maliciously set on fire and wholly destroyed.—July 22, the mills at Littleton, in the parish of Steeple Ashton, Wilts, belonging to Mr. Nash, of Trowbridge, were attacked by an armed body of men (many of whom had their faces blackened), and who wilfully and maliciously set fire to, and wholly destroyed the same, with the machinery and stock in trade therein to a very considerable amount, after which they went away threatening destruction to other mills.—July 24, this night two ricks of hay, the property of Mr. Newman, manufacturer, of Melksham, were wilfully and maliciously set on fire.—July 28, The factory at Staverton, belonging to Messrs. Jones, and Co., was again attacked by an armed body of men, who fired from three different parts at the sentinel on duty.—July 29, in the night, a dwelling-house situate at Bearfield, near Bradford, the property of John Jones, Esq. was wilfully and maliciously set on fire and destroyed.

Edinburgh, 14th August.—The election of sixteen Peers, to represent the Peerage of Scotland in the Imperial Parliament, took place on Tuesday, when the numbers were, for

Lord Eglington	59	Lord Aboyne	56
— Stair	53	Marquis Tweeddale	54
— Glasgow	53	Lord Strathmore	53
— Dalhousie	57	— Elgin	53
— Northesk	57	— Cathcart	52
— Bredalbane	57	— Napier	52
— Cassellis	57	— Dumfries	51
— Balcarras	56	— Somerville	50

There were only two other candidates, viz. Lord Lauderdale, who had 24 votes; and Lord Elphinstone, who had 37. Lord Kinnaird gave one vote for the Earl of Buchan; and the Duke of Argyle voted for the Earl of Eglington only.

All the old Peers are re-elected, with the exception of Lord Torpichen, who is succeeded by Lord Balcarras.

The proxies were, the Prince of Wales, as Duke of Rothsay to Lord Cassellis; Duke of Argyle, to Earl of Eglington; Earl of Errol, to Earl of Glasgow; Earl of Dundonald, to Earl of Lauderdale; Earl of Hyndford, to Earl of Stair; Lord Cathcart, to Lord Napier.

Before the election began, the Earl of Lauderdale protested against such Peers as had been created British Peers since the Union, 1707; to which protest Lord Semple adhered.

The election began about twelve o'clock, and was not terminated till after five in the afternoon. The place of election (the picture gallery of the palace) was crowded in an unusual manner. A great number of ladies and persons of distinction were present. When the election was concluded, their lordships retired to the Tontine Tavern, where an elegant entertainment was provided, at which his Royal Highness Monsieur and suite, General Vyse and the Staff, and many other persons of distinction were present. The evening concluded with a ball in the assembly rooms.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

To constitute a politician, it formerly required a large stock of information as well as a considerable share of acuteness; it was necessary to know the extent, population and resources, warlike and pecuniary, of each of the principal states of Europe, and to obtain some acquaintance with the characters, interests, dispositions, and views of the different sovereigns, as well as of their respective ministers, and of the political parties in each state. This is no longer the case: the whole science is now reduced to the capacity of learning the will of Buonaparté. That will is, indeed, sometimes very difficult to ascertain with precision; but, when you have ascertained it, you may place perfect reliance on seeing its dictates obeyed. This remark, which we made more circumstantially on a former occasion, has been fully verified in the effects lately produced by Buonaparté's attack on the English ministers and the English press. The article in the Moniteur (inserted in the Register, p. 180) contains the most infamous libel on the ministers and government of this country, that, perhaps, ever was published in the world.* It accuses the last ministry of exciting the massacres of September, of causing the manufacturing cities to be destroyed, and of influencing the movements by which the King was brought to the scaffold. The present ministers it accuses of hiring the pages of the English newspaper, called The Times, and of employing them to circulate the grossest calumnies against the rulers of France. It accuses them of receiving French robbers and assassins, of harbouring them at Jersey, and of sending them to make predatory incursions, to rob, murder, and to burn houses, on the coasts of France. It accuses them of giving their special protection to the person, whom it chooses to regard as the inventor of the infernal machine, and this, too, as a recompense for that invention. To cap this climax of most impudent and atrocious falsehoods, it insinuates, that, if the infernal machine had succeeded in killing the First Consul, the assassin would have been created a Knight of the Garter!

As to hiring the proprietor of The Times, we shall say but little. Once to have hired such a man merits everlasting suspicion and reproach; and, to say the truth, we believe that the Times is, to this moment, as much in the pay of government as the True Briton is. But, while we candidly confess our belief, that the articles in the Times, which have given such offence to Buonaparté, were, if not dictated, approved of, by the ministers, we are far from acknowledging that those articles were not true, and proper to be published. There are, in this country, hundreds and thousands of traitors, whose whole time is spent in endeavours to produce the subversion of the government; and, is it not the duty of ministers to endeavour to counteract them? And how can they do this more effectually, than by showing the people what has been produced by a subversion of government in France? By drawing a comparison between the monarchy and the republic, between Louis XVI and Buonaparté, between the wooden shoes of 1789 and the fetters of 1802?

It is not, however, for the sake of exposing the impudence and insolence of the upstart Corsican that we have introduced these remarks, but for the purpose of showing how completely he has brought our government to his feet. And here we must beg leave to premise, that the newspapers called the True Briton and the Sun are, in some sort, the property of the ministers. They are, at any rate, as absolutely at their command as the Moniteur is at the command of Buonaparté. This being acknowledged, (and we believe no body will deny it) the language of these two papers will enable the world to judge of the effect which the threats of the Consul has produced on the British ministry.

As the menacing Moniteur arrived late at night, the article of which we have been speaking was, of course, inserted in the True Briton before the editor had an opportunity of receiving his instructions from the treasury; and, as the attack on the ministers (particularly Mr. Pitt) was inserted, it was thought necessary to insert also something by way of defence. This defence was not, indeed, very spirited; but it contradicted the falsehoods of the Moniteur, and took the liberty to remind Buonaparté, that, if England did really hire the assassins of September, he would do well to ask Fouché and other persons, concerned in the massacres, and now in the government, what became of the wages. Before the next morning, however, the ministers had had time to convey their instructions, and the tone of the True Briton instantly changed. We shall copy this second article at length.

"The more we reflect upon the article which we had yesterday occasion to animadvert upon, the more we see grounds for supposing that it could not have been inserted in The Moniteur with the knowledge or consent of the French government." [Not so much as a hint of this sort was given the day before.] "We are the more inclined to indulge in this opinion, when we recollect, that some time ago an article appeared in the same paper, in which justice was, in some degree, done to the

"talents and virtues of the late minister. We can hardly suppose it possible that the men who thus had magnanimity enough to pay just homage to one who had so lately been their enemy, would condescend to authorize the publication, in the face of Europe, and of the civilized world, of assertions at once so mean and so groundless. But even if the French government chose, which we still believe improbable, to vent its spleen against the man who conciliates the admiration of all nations, and must continue to be that of all posterity, while civilized society has existence, why should it indulge in invectives against the present ministers of this country? Men who have established peace between the two nations with a candour and sincerity of conduct, which must entitle them to the respect and esteem of all mankind—who have produced a reconciliation at which both nations so warmly and sincerely rejoiced, and which it is so much the interest of both to render complete and permanent. For the expression of any hostile sentiments, we are certain there can be no reasonable grounds, and therefore it is that we are bound to believe any member of the French government incapable of entertaining it. The article in question we are inclined, 'upon the whole,' to think the offspring merely of some malevolent writer in the French journal, who either gratifies his personal feelings, or has some interested end to answer, by an attempt to disturb the good understanding which prevails between two governments, upon whose pacific dispositions so entirely depend the tranquillity and happiness of the world."

Such was the reply to the false, malicious, impudent, and insolent article in the Moniteur! It is not upon the language of a French and an English newspaper that we are commenting, but upon that of Buonaparté and Talleyrand, on one side, and of Mr. Addington and Lord Hawkesbury, on the other. These poor men may endeavour to disguise their and our disgrace, but all their endeavours will be in vain. Every politician, every man of common information, in Europe and America, knows that such an article could not have been inserted in the Moniteur, without the express command of Buonaparté. The ministers know it as well as Sir John Brute knew that his wife was in the closet; but, like Sir John, they know too, that their antagonist wears a sword; and, if we are not misinformed, he has, upon this occasion, reminded them of that awful circumstance, in terms too explicit to be misunderstood.

But, what are the views of Buonaparté? His views are, first to silence the English press, as far as relates to himself, family, and government; and, second, to sink still lower, in the eyes of the world, the character of the English government and nation. In the latter he has succeeded to the full extent of his wishes; but, the news-printers affect to believe, that he will never succeed in the former, which, in their eyes, is far the most valuable of the two. As to the honour of the nation, its character for good faith, for fortitude, for generosity, for valour, and for loyalty, that they will yield you with little reluctance; but the liberty of the press! the "palladium of freemen!" the "birth-right of Britons!" this precious possession they are determined to enjoy. To a certain extent they may. They will have full liberty to ridicule, condemn, and abuse every person and institution belonging to the church or the state of this kingdom; and, as to foreign states, they may freely revile all those which are not closely connected with France. With respect to those that are so connected they must be cautious; and, should they have the folly to attack France herself, their fate is not at all difficult to be foreseen. If, however, they are a little cramped in this quarter, they will be amply compensated by the unlimited swing which Buonaparté will allow them against all the powers which he may wish to destroy.

The knights of the quill have talked of the impossibility of silencing them; and some of them have gone so far as to challenge Buonaparté to meet them in Westminster Hall. Are they aware of the probable consequence of this challenge, should the hero of Acre accept of it? Are they certain what would be the verdict of a pacific jury, if told by the attorney-general, that the licentiousness of the press, if suffered to remain unpunished, would inevitably produce another war with France? Another "extended, expensive, and bloody war!" A war that would again raise the quartern loaf to eighteen pence, and compel the minister to re-impose the income tax! We do not ask the knights of the quill, whether a jury would not, under such a persuasion, give a verdict of guilty against a man who should censure Buonaparté; but we ask them, whether they are quite sure, that such a verdict would not fall upon any one whom the consul might choose to have punished for printing and publishing the Lord's Prayer, the Apostle's Creed, or the Decalogue? There would, indeed, be Lord Ellenborough to place the broad and impenetrable shield of his integrity between the innocent printer and the wrath of Buonaparté; but, if a man can, merely by holding his tongue, save his lordship the trouble, it may be full as well to do it.

The truth is, that the liberty of the press, as far as relates to Buonaparté or to his government, is completely at an end. The news-printers may, for a little while, vent their anger in puns and fables; but, even in these they will gradually become more and more timid, till, at last, not one person in ten thousand will be able to discover who or what is the object of their satire. Nor, are we certain, that this circumstance, in itself considered, ought to excite much regret. Nine-tenths of the censure bestowed on Buonaparté by the English prints, is levelled against his good, and not against his evil, deeds; and, if it has any rational object, it is to create a thousand tyrants in France by the destruction of one despot. Those whose silly factious heads are filled with lofty notions about the liberty of the press we leave to mourn over the dumb-founded columns of the news-papers; for our parts, we should not be sorry to behold the complete destruction of that which has been the most efficacious instrument of destruction, which has filled the world with falsehood, hypocrisy, atheism, and rebellion; but the worst of it is, this dreadful instrument, this truly "infernal machine," will still be employed against every body and thing, except Buonaparté and his government.

The knights of the quill, in order to justify their animadversions on the Consul and his measures, remind him of the greater liberties, which they formerly took with the Bourbons and the monarchical government of France, without ever having produced any complaints from that quarter, much less recrimination and threats of hostility. What answer Buonaparté will make to this we know not: ours is ready: "You will now learn, then, that lawful kings are not the most overbearing of mortals; and, while the liberties you took with the Bourbons cannot possibly be a justification for your taking liberties with him who has driven the Bourbons from their throne, it may not be amiss for you to reflect, how far the scandalous misrepresentations and falsehoods, propagated by the English press, against the monarchical government of France, may have contributed towards the destruction of that government, the exaltation of Buonaparté, and, of course, your present humiliation."

We are very anxious to enable our readers to form a correct opinion as to the feelings produced in His Majesty's ministers by the bullying paragraphs of Buonaparté, and, for this purpose, we shall again have recourse to the True Briton. In that paper of the 10th of August appeared the supplement to the consular constitution, followed by certain comments from which we shall extract several passages. On the 13th came the Moniteur containing the reproaches respecting the press, &c. Since that, there has appeared, in the True Briton, another set of comments on the change in the French constitution, not only completely unsaying all that had before been said in the very same paper, but strongly censuring those who had taken the liberty to animadvert on the said constitutional change. That these two sets of comments may the more easily be compared, we shall insert them directly after each other, begging the reader, before he enters on the perusal of them, to fortify his breast, lest it should burst with indignation against the men, who have brought on their country such indelible disgrace.

Comments, in the True Briton, PREVIOUS to the Receipt of the menacing Article, in the Moniteur.

"Buonaparté was seated on the throne of the Bourbons. He promised every thing; he swore to preserve this new form of government, without deterioration. Scarcely a week had elapsed, before he altered a considerable part of its fundamental principles; and, on the remonstrance of Sieyès, he placed his sword on the written copy, and asked whether any person could dispute the power which that instrument could enforce?"

* * * * *

"Since that period, the constitution was but a name, the First Consul every thing.

"The present constitution is, therefore, the sole offspring of the First Consul's brain, and it may be observed, respecting it, that he has shewn in its organization a total ignorance of every kind of legislative principles.

* * * * *

"It must not, however, be supposed, that the constitution which we now present to our readers, has been a sudden ebullition from the restless and impetuous temper of this man. We are warranted in asserting that it has been the fruit of, at least, six weeks vast meditation; it was kept in embryo till the votes could be collected respecting his nomination for life, and when that point was decided (which his bayonets rendered almost certain) it was popped on the kind public, as an evidence of the gratitude and wisdom of their modern Solomon.

* * * * *

"This constitution was presented to the French nation, in a manner that argues an utter contempt of public opinion. Some change was expected by the people, but it was hoped it would be a change from military despotism to civil authority. On the contrary, it was ushered to their notice amidst the thunders of martial power, and it was adopted by the Conservative Senate of France, the only remaining wretched depository of papular authority, on the very same day on which it was presented to their consideration. This event proves either that it was above their capacity, it being of divine origin, or that they were such timid slaves (not forgetting their 1200l. per annum), as to adopt it without discussion. O wretched and degraded senate! to what a hapless condition has the terror of military apparatus reduced you! O wretched people, who have shed the blood of thousands, for a principle you can never obtain! Like Ixion, you have seized a phantom instead of a substance, and while you calumniated the rest of mankind as slaves, you have proved yourselves unworthy of that freedom, for which you have disturbed the peace of all mankind; the peace of nations, who would have known happiness, had they never known your crimes.

"Senators of France! the Roman senate, after the usurpation of Octavius, became a farce and a pageant. The old forms were preserved, amidst the career of despotism. 'What a collection' (said Tiberius, the last time he was in the senate) 'of willing slaves.'"

Comments, in the True Briton, AFTER the Receipt of the menacing Article in the Moniteur.

"In resuming our remarks upon the new Constitution of France, we cannot but observe, that it has been discussed, or rather abused, with considerable violence, by some of our cotemporary journalists. It appears to us that the distinction between the internal policy and the exterior relations of France, has not been sufficiently marked and preserved in many of these discussions. That the vehement advocate for liberty should declaim against the present system of government in France, is by no means surprising; but that such a spirit should lead to gross invectives against that country, or its chief magistrate, is greatly to be lamented. Whether France now possesses the only government which is suited to her disposition or her character, is a question that may be calmly discussed without violence and without agitation.—Why direct the grossest invectives against the chief magistrate of the French Republic, for doing that, which it remains yet to be proved, is not an act beneficial to the French Nation? Liberty in the hands of those who know not how to enjoy it, can only degenerate into anarchy—and the only remedy for anarchy, is the strong arm of power. Governments are good or bad only in proportion as they are adapted to the respective characters of the people who are subject to them. It is evident, that if the British constitution was suddenly transplanted into Turkey or Persia, it could not take root in either of those countries, because no soil could there be found analogous to its properties and its habits. The fundamental error of most of the speculatists upon government, has consisted in beginning with theory instead of experience. * * * * *

"Whether the present constitution of France is calculated to promote the comfort and happiness of the individuals of that nation, time only can determine; but when compared with the monstrous systems of democratical, or of oligarchical tyranny which have preceded it, the people of France have certainly reason to congratulate themselves on the change. More has unquestionably been done under the present system to conciliate the feelings of the heart, and increase the stock of domestic comfort, than under any system which preceded it since the revolution.

"This subject may be considered in many different points of view, but let it be discussed with temper and with moderation. To mix with the discussions, invectives and reproaches, breathing in some degree a spirit of hostility, is unnecessary and improper, impolitic and unjust. The government of France, become more consecrated, and surrounded with pacific emblems, offers an additional security for the permanence of the peace. To blend therefore remarks upon the constitution of France with invectives which can only wound and irritate, betrays a spirit inconsistent with that peace which this country has promised to maintain, and is desirous of preserving. While France faithfully maintains, on her side, the peace which has been so happily effected between the two countries, it is obviously in the highest degree improper to make an hostile attack upon her government and her chief magistrate, which can only provoke animosity, and engender hatred."

Such has been the effects of the threats of Buonaparté! Such is the meanness, the cowardice, the undescribable wretchedness, of the British Ministry! We must once more remind our readers, that it is not the language and sentiments of a printer of news, that we have here taken the pains to lay before them; but the language and sentiments of the ministers; of those men, who, whatever they may be in point of character and talents, have, at this time, the nation's wealth, power, and reputation in their hands. Let us not comfort ourselves by hoping, that the world will confine its contempt to the Addingtons and the Hawkesburies: they are, indeed, justly entitled to the pre-eminence, but we shall all be part-takers with them: they will be despised for their ministry, and the nation because they are ministers.

The length to which this exposure has necessarily led us, will prevent our noticing, so much in detail as we intended, several other political topics.—In our last (p. 135) we observed, that the Ministers had, in their official papers, stated that the Emperor of Russia had not given his assent to the convention, concluded at Paris, in the month of June last. We, at the same time, expressed our persuasion, that exactly the contrary was the fact; and, we now find it acknowledged even in the ministerial papers, that the ratification of the said convention, by the Emperor of Russia, was received at Paris on the 2d instant. There is every reason to suppose, that this convention, which has for its object nothing less than a new-modelling of a considerable part of Europe, has been completed not only without the consent of England, but even totally without the knowledge of her ministers! The wishes of the wise-acres are, at last, fully accomplished: we are "rid of continental connexions;" almost as much so as the oysters that cling to the rocks of Marcou!

The convention, of which we are here speaking, was negotiated under the mediation of the King of Prussia. This fact, as well as that of the conclusion of the convention, was stated in the Register p. 130; so that this most important intelligence was received, and actually published in London, ten days, at least, before His Majesty's ministers had, through any other channel, heard a word of the matter! With a diplomatic department so filled, what have we not reason to expect! Some persons have, as we foresaw they would, affected to laugh at our letter from Stockholm (p. 130); but we sincerely hope, that the rest of that letter may prove less correct, than the passage which relates to the convention between France and Russia, and yet we fear that it will not; for, so adroitly have our ministers arranged our foreign concerns, that the successor of Paul I, who seemed to be raised to the throne for the express purpose of favouring our cause, is, next after Buonaparté and Jefferson, the greatest and most dangerous enemy we have in the world.

The festival of the 15th, at Paris, produced nothing worthy of remark. The addresses to the Consul were numerous; but, in their style and sentiments, they in no wise differed from what we have so often seen presented to him heretofore. There were firing of cannon, ringing of bells, singing of Te Deums, and illuminations; but then they were all ordered by an arrêt of the police, which was circulated through Paris and its environs, with as much industry and care as were the placards of those valorous knights, Sir John Eamer and Sir Richard Ford, on the eve of the illuminations in London. There was, however, some difference in the tone of the two arrêts. Fouché positively ordered the Parisians to make a general illumination, whereas we were advised to have "only one general illumination." Different men, different tastes: for our parts we have no scruple to say that we prefer the order of Fouché to the advice of the chevaliers of the Mansion-House and Bow-street. Much rather would we have been compelled to illuminate our house by a legal command, than to have had a choice in the matter, and to have our house demolished by the clerks of the Post-Office, by reptiles in the pay of government, because we thought proper to exercise that choice.* The most execrable of all tyranny is that which is exercised under the semblance of freedom.

The manufacturers of Rouen, alarmed at the rumours of a commercial treaty with England, have addressed the Consul (see page 204) on the subject. Those who draw, from the complaints made in this address, a proof of the misery of the manufacturers of France, should recollect the complaints, and even the serious riots, which are at this moment existing amongst the manufacturers of England (see p. 206). The French Minister of the Interior has published a letter to the people of Rouen, assuring them that no commercial arrangement will be made injurious to the manufactures and trade of France. To convince them that their country would not be outwitted by England, it might have been quite sufficient for him to tell them, that Lord Hawkesbury was to be our negotiator.

* The principal rioters at Mr. Cobbett's house were Charles Beloe (son of the Rev. Wm. Beloe), a clerk in the General Post-Office, and Charles Wagstaffe, another clerk in the General Post-Office. These men were put in jail, indicted, &c. convicted, and yet Lord Auckland never suspended them for a moment from their employments in his office; at least so it was declared upon oath before the court, where a letter was also produced in Lord Auckland's hand-writing, in order to prove, that the affair had in no wise injured the characters of the convicted men.

The news from St. Domingo and Guadeloupe (see p. 197) represent those islands as in a state of tranquillity. More troops had arrived at the latter, and fresh reinforcements were expected. — Admiral Villaret has at length sailed from Brest, for Martinico, it is said, with 2 ships of the line, 1 frigate, 1 corvette, and 4 brigs.—No less than 3,500 British sailors have already entered into the French service.

The American article (p. 199) which represents General Bowles as having conveyed his prizes into a port in the island of Cuba must certainly contain a very gross error. This seaport is in the bay of Espiritu Santo, which is on the west side of East Florida. Did not this blunder render the whole article suspicious, we should congratulate our readers on the important prize which Bowles is said to have taken. Forty thousand pounds will furnish him with a stock of powder and lead sufficient to give the legions of Buonaparté a reception not altogether unhandsome, nor unworthy of an independent Indian Prince.

Commissioners are about to meet in London for the purpose of making a distribution of the £600,000, which is to be paid to this country by the United States of America. The claimants are, of course, the British creditors, whose property was seized on, in the shape of debts, during the rebellion. The claims amount to £5,000,000, the correct sum to about £3,000,000; so that the creditors cannot receive much more than a sixth part of their due. A cut of a loaf, however, is better than no bread, especially to men who have fasted for six and twenty years.

PUBLIC PAPERS.

Treaty concluded between France and the Prince of Orange.

Art. I. His Highness the Prince of Nassau-Orange-Dillenburg-Dietz, formally renounces for himself and his heirs and successors, the dignity of Stadtholder of the United Provinces which now form the Batavian Republic; he also formally renounces all rights, claims, and pretensions whatsoever, which arise from the above-mentioned dignity; as likewise all domains and territorial property situated in the said Republic, or in its colonies.

II. His Highness the Prince of Nassau-Orange Dillenburg-Dietz, the Princess his consort, their children and heirs, shall enjoy all permanent or annual rents which they have in the Batavian Republic, in the same manner as other possessors of rents in the said Republic.

III. To indemnify the house of Nassau-Orange-Dillenburg-Dietz for the renunciations and cessions in the first article of the present treaty, his Highness shall receive, 1. The Bishopric and Abbey of Fulda; 2. The Abbey of Corvey; 3. The Abbey of Weingarten, with its dependencies; 4. The Imperial Town of Dormund, in Westphalia, and Ysny and Buch-horn, in Southern Swabia, with their territories and dependencies. His Highness shall possess, for ever, and in full sovereign property, for himself, his heirs and successors, the above-mentioned Bishopric and Abbeys, which shall be secularized in his favour, and the imperial towns, with all the territory belonging to them, under the condition that his Highness shall engage to satisfy the existing and acknowledged claims to certain inheritances appertaining to his house, in the course of the last century. This satisfaction shall be determined by arbitrators to be appointed by the two contracting parties.

IV. The inheritance in the New States which shall be assigned to the house of Nassau-Orange-Dillenburg-Dietz, shall be regulated in the following manner: the male line shall succeed to the exclusion of the female; but in failure of male heirs, the female shall enter into all their rights. This clause shall extend to all the legitimate offspring of his Highness the Prince in a direct line; and in case of the failure of that line, the above-mentioned territory, states, and sovereignty, shall devolve to the royal house of Prussia.

V. His Majesty the King of Prussia and the First Consul of the French Republic, in the name of the French people, reciprocally guarantee, in conjunction with his Highness the Prince of Nassau-Orange-Dillenburg-Dietz, the indemnifications of the ceded or conquered countries, as they are stipulated in this treaty.

VI. His Majesty the King of Prussia, and his Highness the Prince of Nassau-Orange-Dillenburg-Dietz, in like manner acknowledge the Batavian Republic.

VII. Immediately after the exchange of the ratifications, his Majesty the King of Prussia, and his Highness the Prince of Nassau-Orange-Dillenburg-Dietz, may take possession of the states and territories allotted to them as indemnities.

VIII. The present treaty shall be ratified by the contracting parties within 40 days, or sooner if possible.

Paris, May 24, 1802.

The following article is taken from the True Briton of the 24th instant. It is the language of those who advised and who made the peace; it was written, or, at least, approved of, by them, or some of them; and, therefore, it demands attention: it is worthy of perusal and of comment.

"since his failure at Norwich, are as male"volent as they are unjust; but no man has "been a more powerful enemy to those "persons, no man more fully deserves the

"honour of their abuse. We differ widely in some of our political opinions from Mr. Windham, but that difference of opinion can never make us cease to admire the manliness of his character, the powers of his mind, or the uprightness and disinterestedness of his conduct. Faults, as a public man, we think he has—but they are faults into which the most honourable principles betray him. Like many of the pupils of Mr. Burke's school, he will admit no exceptions to his rules, no qualification of his opinions. He reasons ably and acutely upon all points which become the subject of his reflection, but we think he often reasons and acts like a man who has deeply considered the theories upon the point in question, without having corrected the errors into which his theories lead, by an observation of the practice which is applicable to them. His speeches in the House of Commons are full of ingenuity, they charm every person who has attention and penetration enough to follow him into all the nice divisions of his argument, but they sometimes want the plain down-right common sense which alone convinces plain men—they often rather exhibit the powers of his understanding, than his just conception of things—they are thought by some persons to consist only of subtle refinements, and, perhaps, more frequently excite admiration, than enforce conviction.

"Mr. Burke and his disciples appear to us to err, chiefly by pushing their opinions to extremes—they seem to forget that there are many propositions true to a certain point, but which, beyond a fixed limit, become fallacious and absurd. It is the province of common sense and judgment to discover to what degree such propositions are just. There is no source of error more common, even among enlightened minds, than that of supposing that the reasonings applicable to the conduct of human life are as certain and invariable as the rules of arithmetic, or the principles of mathematics.

"But let it never be forgotten, that to this man and to others, who were (by those who wished to lull us into a delusive security), opprobriously termed alarmists, we owe, at this moment, perhaps our very existence as a nation; but certainly the preservation of our constitution. He will ever deserve our gratitude, and that of the whole nation, for his exertions at the period to which we refer.

"The only material point in which we differ from Mr. Windham, is in his conduct respecting the peace, and here we think his opinions were carried to an extreme. We think with him, and with almost every man in the country, that the war was just and necessary; but if, without attaining the best and most desirable objects which were looked for, there arose a crisis in which, under all considerations, the adoption of peace on reasonable terms, became more advantageous to the country than the continuance of the war, that moment ought to have been, and was, we think, wisely seized upon by his Majesty's ministers. We do not accuse him of having wished never to be at peace with France, but at the moment the treaty was signed, he thought war preferable to peace, and he thought so in our opinion without having looked into the means we possessed of carrying on the war; or, at least, without having fully weighed the sacrifices we must have made for the probable attainment of any advantages which the further prosecution of the war held out to us.

"The opinion to which we have alluded, is the only point of union between Mr. Windham and the party with which he appears lately to have connected himself.—The party is small in number, and the voice of the nation is against them.—If they ever rise into importance, it must be by the force of their abilities alone—collateral aids they have none—and amongst its ablest supporters there is a great want of those engaging and conciliatory manners which Mr. Windham possesses in so eminent a degree.

"In private life, Mr. Windham, as he is sans peur, so is he sans reproche. He is a gentleman and a scholar. His acquaintance is sought by every man who admires the manly spirit and character of an Englishman, softened, but not weakened, by urbanity and politeness. His society is courted by all those who have experienced its charms, and the warmth of his heart betrays him even into extravagant pretensions and unreasonable pursuits in the service of his friends.

"We rejoice that such a man as we have described is again elected to Parliament. —Though we may not think him a safe politician in all points—upon how many questions which may occur, may his enlightened mind most usefully display itself? Yet, to such a man, the electors of "Norwich have preferred William Smith! The last time we inquired into the state of the trade of Norwich, we were told that all the demand was for the coarsest stuffs; and they appear to have applied the rule which was meant for their crapes and muslins to the manufacture of their members of Parliament."

Amongst the various modes, which the ingenuity of man has discovered for the exercise of malevolence, none has been found more efficacious, and certainly none is more cowardly, than the one which is here employed—an affected defence of a man's character so conducted as to confirm and aggravate the charges which malice or ignorance may have preferred against it. What attacks have there been on Mr. Windham, what sneering, what abuse, in which the True Briton has not heartily joined? Has it not had recourse to a repetition of all the old fabricated quotations, such as "killings off"—"cheese pairings and candle ends"—"perish our commerce"—"hardly scratched by the war," &c. &c. ? The fact is, that the "honour of abuse" has been conferred on Mr. Windham full as frequently by the ministerial, as by the jacobin papers; and he must be a weak mortal indeed, who does not perceive, that the present eulogium on the urbanity, the politeness, the learning, the frankness, the disinterestedness, and the integrity of that gentleman, is intended merely to give the air of truth and candour to a publication, in which his "FAULTS as a PUBLIC man" are intended to be impressed on the mind of the reader. The author of this eulogium was well aware, that all the accomplishments and the virtues, which he has candidly attributed to Mr. Windham, are not sufficient to constitute a statesman, unless, in addition thereto, he possesses a due share of caution and moderation; in other words, unless his zeal be tempered with reason and with that knowledge which arises from industry and experience. Therefore it is, that, while he most heroically denies what nobody ever asserted, and candidly asserts what nobody ever denied, respecting the private character of Mr. Windham, he artfully corroborates an opinion, which he knows to be false, that this gentleman is misted by dangerous theories, that he pushes his opinions to extremes, and, in short, that, though he is an accomplished gentleman, an eloquent speaker, and a perfectly honest man, he is "not a safe politician."

This is the position, which he endeavours to establish; this is the impression, which he wishes to leave on the mind of the reader:

let us, therefore, see how it will bear the test of examination.

With regard to Mr. Windham's adopting dangerous theories, uncorrected by an observation of the practice which is applicable to them, as no particular instances of this "fault" is named or even alluded to, we are not called upon for a refutation of the charge; but, we cannot refrain from observing, that, the abolition of the Slave Trade and the reform of Parliament, the two theories which peculiarly appertain to this country, and which have been rendered famous by the terrors and mischiefs they have produced: that these wild and dangerous theories, the former of which has plunged the West-India colonies in confusion and bloodshed, while the latter had, at one time, shaken the government of the mother country to its centre; we cannot refrain from observing, that neither of these theories was either invented or adopted by Mr. Windham. The advantage, the triumph, indeed, which, on this subject, we might derive from minute comparison, we cheerfully forego; but, when these safe and discreet politicians publicly impute theoretical errors and political indiscretions, to Mr. Windham, they compel us to remind them, that the opinions of that gentleman, however they may be "pushed to extremes," have never been given in evidence as a justification of men accused of high treason!

Neither as a disciple of Burke is any specific error attributed to Mr. Windham. Falsehood always endeavours to wrap itself up in general allegations. We are mistaken, however, if Mr. Windham will disclaim any one article of the political creed of his great master, whose advice, had it not been rejected, would have preserved his country from its present disgrace. Let any man read the Memorials, presented to the late ministry by Mr. Burke; let him take a survey of what has happened since that time, and then let him decide between the disciples and the opponents of that truly great statesman. The fact is, that all men of common understanding can now clearly perceive, what Mr. Burke perceived several years ago; and, where is the man who has not, since the peace was concluded, heard it a hundred times regretted, that the advice of Mr. Burke was not adopted? Where is the man, who is not now fully convinced, that, if that advice had been followed, the house of Bourbon would now have been upon the throne, that France would have been circumscribed within her former limits, and that England would have been in the enjoyment of a safe and honourable peace? Under such circumstances, Mr. Windham can never suffer from having his opinions identified with those of Mr. Burke.

But, it is Mr. Windham's conduct respecting the peace, which, in the eyes of this writer, is most exceptionable. His opinions were here "pushed to extremes," because "he thought war preferable to peace," obtained "on reasonable terms, and more advantageous to the country than a continuance of the war." This is not sophistry, but direct falsehood. Mr. Windham denied, and still denies, that the terms of the peace were reasonable and more advantageous to the country than a continuance of the war. He asserted, and most clearly proved, that the terms of the peace were unreasonable, disgraceful, and infinitely more injurious to the country than a continuance of the war could possibly be. He did not, at the time peace was made, or at any other time, "think war preferable to peace," taking the question in the abstract; but he certainly thought that war was preferable to such a peace as had been concluded; and, if he is not willing to abide by this opinion as the test of his political knowledge and penetration, he must be wonderfully deficient in that sort of confidence which every man ought to possess; for, as far as consequences have hitherto arisen from the peace, they have fully verified his predictions. Where is the man, who has read Mr. Windham's speeches on the peace, who remembers what he has read, and who now beholds the degraded situation of this country, and who does not wish that Mr. Windham's opinion had prevailed? The Convention between Russia and France; the expedition to Algiers and Tunis; the navigation of the Black Sea; the complete subjugation of St. Domingo; the colonization of Louisiana; the critical situation of Jamaica; and, though last certainly not least, the annihilation of the liberty of the British press, as far as relates to France, or to any transaction in which France has an interest. Such are some of the consequences, which have already resulted from a peace, for the disapproving of which Mr. Windham is accused of "pushing his opinions to extremes," of being "an unsafe politician!"

What is said respecting the party, with whom Mr. Windham has acted in opposing the peace, is equally disingenuous with the rest of the article. That this party is small in number, though great in abilities, we know; but, we are by no means disposed to allow, that "the voice of the nation is against them." The wisdom and loyalty of the nation is with them: its folly and disloyalty are, indeed, against them, and, we are sorry to be obliged to confess, that their adversaries are, at present, more powerful than their friends. The writer in the True Briton does not, however, appear to perceive the point on which the fate of this party must inevitably turn. A party may, in some instances, perhaps, owe its success to those "engaging and conciliatory manners," of which he (adopting the vulgar cry) represents some of the ablest of this party as being deficient; but, the political reputation and consequence of Mr. Windham and of the phalanx with whom he has acted on this occasion, must chiefly depend upon the effects produced by that important measure, which has placed them in opposition to the present ministers. What those effects will ultimately be, it is impossible precisely to foretell; but, if we may judge of the future from what has already come to pass, it will not require many months to convince even the most senseless part of the nation, that caution and cowardice are not the qualities to constitute "a safe politician."

In a country where such infinite pains have been taken to destroy every sentiment of national honour; where the love of military glory is almost extinct; where the people look to the Bank instead of the arsenals for the means of protection; in such a country caution will ever be the first, and courage the last, quality that will be generally desired in a statesman. A want of discretion will be regarded as much worse than a want of zeal, ability, or even integrity. Discretion is certainly a most essential quality; but it is real discretion, and not that spurious sort of it, which is much more worthy of the name of indecision, or pusillanimity. Of indiscretion,

* When Mr. Burke published his Letters on a Regicide Peace; nay, before the first letter was published, the work was abused in the True Briton, a paper established by, and totally under the direction of, the Treasury. A gentleman acquainted with Herriot, the conductor of the paper, remonstrated with him upon the subject, and requested him to wait till the letter made its appearance; to which Herriot replied, that Burke had one foot in the grave, and that he wished to do the worst all the mischief he could before he left it. It is not certain, that a sentiment like this was entertained at the Treasury; but, it is very certain that Herriot had no political sentiments of his own. At any rate, it is well known, that the Letters on a Regicide Peace, were severely condemned by the ministerial papers, though they were written to prevent a negotiation, the failure of which Mr. Pitt has since repeatedly declared to be, on our part, a narrow escape from destruction.

properly so called, we venture to defy the enemies of Mr. Windham to point out a single instance in which he has, as a statesman or legislator, incurred the charge; and it were much to be wished, that the same could be said of those, whose cautious demeanour is intended to be contrasted with his. To say nothing about the "March to Paris," and the "Corsican Adventurer," some of the observations made by Lord Hawkesbury, in his defence of the peace, were as indiscreet as any that ever fell from the lips of mortal man: we allude more particularly to what he said respecting the influence which the cession of Louisiana would have on the United States of America. He said, that "placing the French upon the back of the American States would serve to attach the latter to Great Britain," and that, "therefore, it was good policy on our part to wink at the cession of Louisiana to France." This opinion, which, even if well founded, no temporary purpose, no heat of argument, should have drawn from a Minister, has produced the worst possible effect in America; it has excited great indignation in the minds of our friends, and has furnished the partizans of France with a most fertile and fortunate topic of abuse, in which they have spared neither King, Lords, nor Commons. This was, indeed, an unpardonable faux pas in the solid young lord, the discreet young lord; nor is it inapplicable to the present subject to observe, that the only thing which has, on this occasion, tended to mitigate the resentment of the Americans, and to disarm our foes in that country, is, the speech of Mr. Windham, who lamented, instead of rejoicing at, the danger to which the United States would be exposed.—We could pursue this contrast much further; but we shall wait till some future opportunity.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Bologna, July 27.—Disturbances of a serious nature have broken out in this city. The scarcity and dearness of provisions was either the cause or the pretext. The Prefect, after having employed to no purpose every means of gentleness and persuasion, and seeing the public tranquillity every day more and more endangered, and even his personal safety menaced, he confided the exterior and internal policy of the city to the General of Division, Verdier, who immediately arrested several of the guilty, and published a proclamation on the 22d, in which he announced to the inhabitants, that he should employ the most energetic means to prevent further disorder, and to re-establish tranquillity. For this purpose, he prohibited the inhabitants from carrying about with them any species of weapon, even sticks, and threatened to arrest those who should act in contradiction to this order, and to deliver them over to be tried by a military commission, in the same manner as if they had been taken in the act of insurrection with arms in their hands. At the same time, the municipality ordered all dealers in articles of the first necessity to give in, within two days, an account of the quantity of provisions they had in their hands. On the 25th a large body of French troops arrived, and yesterday General Verdier published a second proclamation, explaining the motives of their arrival.

July 30.—On the 28th, a corps of French cavalry arrived here from Modena. On the following night, those persons who had been arrested, were sent to France. All is now perfectly quiet. The Prefect carries rigorously into execution his regulations of police, respecting foreigners who are unprovided with the necessary papers.

Italian Republic. Milan, July 27.

Sitting of the 26th July, Decree of the Consulta of State.

The consulta of state, on the proposition of the vice president of the Italian republic, having read several documents relative to the disorders and outrages which have recently disturbed the public tranquillity, and declared that the commune of Bologna is in a state of insurrection; therefore, considering that its situation comes under the description of cases provided for the 60th and 61st articles of the constitution, the consulta decrees: First, that a provisional measure by which the prefect Du Reno has confided the interior and exterior police of the commune de Bologna, to the military commandant, is approved of by the consulta of state. The orders issued by the commandant general at Bologna which prohibits the carrying of arms, or other offensive weapons, is likewise approved of. The authors of the outrages, and their accomplices, and all disturbers of the public tranquillity will be subject to martial law, and tried accordingly, without benefit of appeal. The government, in consequence, appoints a commission to consist of five military officers, who are forthwith to assemble in Bologna. The grand judicial minister of justice, and the minister of war, are charged with the execution of the present decree, which is ordered to be printed and published.

Milan, July 27.—The vice-president of the Italian republic having perused the decree of the consulta of the state, of the 26th July, instant, decrees: 1st. That the following citizens do compose the military commission at Bologna:

Fontanelli, Chef de Brigade, President.

Bertolletti,

Foresti,

Villara,

Masi,

} Captains.

2dly, Citizen Charles Sormanni, judge of the tribunal of appeal, at Milan, is appointed commissary of the government, at the said military commission. 3dly. The grand judicial minister of justice, and the minister of war, are charged, as far as they are concerned, with the execution of the present decree, which shall be printed and published.

(Signed) Melzi.

The counsellor secretary of state, Nobili.

Naples, July 20.—His Majesty has addressed a letter to the Archbishop of Palermo, President of the Kingdom of Sicily, announcing his happy arrival at Naples, and ordering that his faithful subjects should be informed of it. His excellency has published an edict upon this occasion, and Te Deum has also been sung, at which the sacred college, the senate, the noblesse, and the magistrature assisted.

Schwitz, July 13.—The Deputies of all the Communes in the three cantons of Uri, Schwitz, and Unterwald, to Citizen Verninac, Minister of the French Republic in Switzerland.

"We have uselessly endeavoured, for four years past, to tear from us a Constitution, which, from its origin, and still more, from the violence with which it was established, could not fail to be odious and insupportable. It is in vain that we have constantly hoped that the Helvetic Government, instructed by the sorrowful events of four unfortunate years, would at length find, that our separation from the Republic was that which was most wise and suitable for both parties, and that the wish which we have so often and so strongly expressed for our ancient liberty, would have induced them to set aside all hope that those three cantons would ever voluntarily accept any other constitution than that which has ever been considered as the only one suited to these countries, and for that reason so highly prized by ourselves and our ancestors. Our re-union with Helvetia, which has been stained with so much innocent blood, is perhaps the most cruel example of constraint that history can offer.

"In the conviction, therefore, that for a forced and unfortunate marriage, divorce is the only reasonable remedy, and that Helvetia and ourselves cannot recover repose and content, except by the rupture of this forced tie, we are firmly resolved to labour at that separation with all possible activity, and we think it best to address that authority which for four years past has united us, in spite of ourselves, to the Helvetic Republic. As to any thing further, we only wish to preserve good harmony in our commercial relations, as becomes brave Swiss. In listening to our just demands, the Helvetic Republic will acquire in us brothers and faithful neighbours.

"Health and consideration."

Genoa, Aug. 5.—We have received some information as to the depredations committed by the Dey of Algiers for these six months past on the powers of Europe.

It may be useful to publish the details, which must create astonishment at the extreme rapacity, as well as audacity, of this barbarian, who fancies himself the Sovereign of the Universe, and who treats all other governments as if they were his tributaries.

These details are followed by an account of the contributions which he imposes in Africa upon Princes following the same religion with himself, which proves that nothing is sacred with this Brigand.

The following may be considered as correct:

Holland, Sweden, and Denmark, have made their regular presents, which are fixed by treaty at 10,000 piastres each, but the chicanery of agents increase these to a sum of about 25,000 piastres each Piastres.

25,000

Spain sent three ships of the line and two frigates to reclaim three confiscated vessels. The Dey was offended at this measure, and Spain, to avoid a war, paid in the whole.	165,000

The Dey called upon the English for 180,000 piastres for several cargoes confiscated by the Court of Admiralty, and signified that if it was not paid within four months, he would declare war. .	120,000
He demands of France, presents to the amount of.	235,000
M. Agrell, the Swedish Consul at Algiers par interim , made the usual presents, on condition that they should serve for M. Nordeling, the Consul who was about to arrive; but the Dey exacted from the latter new presents, the whole amounting to.	50,000
Lastly, the agent of Denmark was written to by the Dey, who exacted from him a sum of 100,000 piastres, and granted him only four months to write to his court. This, with a vessel which the Danish government is besides to place at the disposal of the Dey, makes a total of.	112,000
The capture of the Portuguese frigate with 312 men, on account of which the Dey makes the most extravagant pretensions: he demands 200,000 piastres for the ransom of one individual only (the son of a Portuguese Admiral.) Supposing the Court of Lisbon to be compelled, 2,000 piastres for each of the 312 prisoners (which is very probable,) the sum required will amount to 624,000 piastres. This, with presents during the negotiation, estimated at 20,000 piastres, and the value of the frigate 50,000, will make a total of. . .	694,000
Value of seven ships taken by the Corsairs, with the cargoes.	120,000
Seventy-five slaves, Genoese, Neapolitans, and others, at 2,500 piastres each	187,500
Total of exactions in Europe.	1,818,500

Exactions in Africa:

The Beys of Titteri, Constantine, and Mascari, have some months since deposited at the foot of the throne their customary tributes. The Dey has besides exacted from them considerable sums. The whole amounting to not less than.	300,000
Exactions from individuals.	100,000
The Dey of Algiers has ordered the Bey of Constantine to march with all his troops against Tunis. He exacts from the Bey of the latter 450,000 zer-mahboub, or about.	700,000
Total.	1,100,000
Exactions in Europe.	1,818,500
Exactions in Africa.	1,100,000
Piastres.	2,918,500*

* To this sum may be added more than a million of dollars, whether in presents or in specie, paid by the Americans.

Ratisbon, Aug. 5.—The full powers for the extraordinary deputation of the empire have been published this day, and are of the following tenor:

Full powers of the Empire for the Deputation, charged with the discussion of the points which remain yet to be regulated for the fulfilment of the Peace.

“The Electors, Princes, and States of the Holy Roman Empire having judged it suitable to exercise, by an extraordinary deputation, the right which belongs to them, of discussing those objects which yet remain to be regulated for the fulfilment of the peace, and having for this purpose chosen and appointed in the College of Electors, Mayence, Bohemia, Saxony, and Brandenburg, and in that of Princes, Bavaria, the Grand Master of the Teutonic Order, Wurtemberg, and Hesse Cassel; the said states deputed are fully authorised by these presents, in the name of the Germanic Body, and with the consent of his Imperial Majesty, in his quality of Supreme Chief of the Empire, to send forthwith their Sub-Delegates to the Imperial City of Ratisbon, which has been regarded as the most suitable place, there to examine, discuss, and regulate with the Imperial Minister Plenipotentiary, in concert with the French Government (having regard to the Conclusum of the 2d of October last, ratified by his Imperial Majesty), the points reserved by the 5th and 7th articles of the treaty of Luneville, for a particular convention.

“In consequence, whatever shall be deliberated upon, concluded and signed by the said deputies, either by all of them, or in case of the absence, sickness, or non-appearance of some of them, by those that remain with the said Imperial Minister, shall be, within a determined period, ratified and agreed to, and shall be inviolably kept by the whole empire.”

Ratisbon, August 3, 1802.

August 6.—The Bavarian Deputy, Baron Rechburg, received in the night of the 2d instant a Courier from the Bavarian Envoy at St. Petersburg, to M. Posch, who arrived by the way of Berlin, and brought the General Plan of Indemnities concerted at Paris, and ratified by his Imperial Russian Majesty.—Two similar copies of this plan will be laid before the Empire on the part of France and Russia, by Citizen Matthieu and Baron Buhler. In this plan the future state of the Empire, both with respect to the large and small states, is circumstantially regulated. Wurtemberg, Baden, and Hesse Cassel, are proposed for the Electoral Dignity. The Emperor of Russia had likewise recommended Mecklenburg; and the French and Bavarian ministers have promised the co-operation of their courts to that effect. In the College of Princes, eight new voices are to be added, among which are Nassau Usingen, Nassau Weilburg, Salm, Kyrburg, and Leinungen. Osnaburg falls to Hanover, but under conditions that the latter shall resign its claims to Hildesheim and Corvey, and its eventual possession of Sayn Altenkirchen to Nassau-Usingen. The Toll at Elsfleth is to be abolished; but in compensation, the Duke of Holstein Oldenburg receives the Bishopric of Lubeck as an hereditary principality, a part of Munster, and the Hanoverian district of Wildeshausen. The Elector of Mentz remains the only Ecclesiastical Elector, and receives such indemnities for his losses, that his revenue, in the whole, will amount to a million.—Eight cities, viz. Lubeck, Bremen, Hamburg, Frankfort, Augsburg, Nuremberg, Wetzlar, and Ratisbon, are to be imperial cities, and the two last remain as before, the one the seat of the Chamber of the Empire, and the other of the Diet. The imperial cities, in all future wars of the Empire, are to be permitted to observe a perfect neutrality.

Berne, Aug. 8.—The latest intelligence from the Lesser Cantons, afford some hope of our being able to recall those parts of Helvetia to obedience to our Government. The refusal of the Canton of Uri, to make a common cause with the others, has strengthened the opposition in that quarter, and the eagerness manifested by the ring-leaders of this counter-revolution to ingross the highest situations, has given general disgust.

The Commissary, Keller, published on the 4th instant, at Lucerne, on the part of the Central Government, the following Proclamation:

"The Government had fondly hoped for the cessation of all troubles, for the re-union of all men by the influence of concord and of fraternity, and of course, for the restoration of general prosperity.—It sees, however, with regret, that certain enemies of their country are eager to profit of the circumstances of the moment, to rend all those ties asunder, and to produce new calamities and misfortunes.

"These have violated the confidence which the Government placed in their sentiments of patriotism, and they have shut their eyes to the dangers attending such conduct. Behold your vallies and plains desolated—the still smoking ruins of your houses—these are the fruits of such disastrous councils, and which on a former occasion you have experienced.—Consider well, if the assertions of those who mislead you, have been founded in truth—if they have not already deceived you.—And what trust can you repose in them after these reflections? Abjure their perfidious councils, and rally round a Government, uniformly disposed to attend to your complaints, to administer to your necessities, and to soothe your misfortunes.

"The Executive Council, true to its principles, has endeavoured by every means of conciliation, to recall you to your duty; but, at the same time, it entertains the determined resolution generally to introduce, and to maintain the Constitution adopted by the Helvetic people in all parts of the Republic, and apprises you that measures are adopted to carry it into full effect against every species of opposition whatever.

"The Executive Council declares, that all Lansgemein, held, or to be holden, are contrary to the existing Laws and the Constitution, and decrees—

"I. That in all the Cantons, or wherever such assemblies are holden, the persons who were employed under the Constitution, shall be reinstated in their respective situations, in the course of eight days.

"II. That in the Cantons of Uri, Schwitz, and Unterwalden, the Communes shall re-assemble, and elect a deputy from every 100 citizens.

"III. These Deputies shall re-unite under the Presidency of the Commissary of the Government, or of one of the delegates, in order to appoint a committee or council, consisting of 20 members.

"IV. The Government recognizes those councils, and will hold communication with them. They shall administer the particular affairs of the Cantons, and shall be charged with the Cantonal Organization.

"Given at Berne, August 1, 1802."

Paris, Aug. 11.—On the 4th inst. news was received at Nantes from St. Domingo to the 20th June. At that period the colony appeared to enjoy the greatest tranquillity. The general in chief had just published the new constitution of St. Domingo, the execution of which was suspended with respect to some articles during the time the colony was in a state of warfare. An arrêté by the captain general determines the exceptions rendered necessary by existing circumstances. Another arrêté fixes the division of the French part of the isle into departments, quarters, and communes.

About the middle of June there arrived at St. Domingo, from Toulon, a frigate and two corvettes, on board of which were a thousand troops, who, it is said, were to be followed by 6000 more.

On the 2d of August, about three in the afternoon, the division under the orders of Admiral Villaret Joyeuse set sail from Brest for Martinique. It consists of the ships of the line Le Berwick and Le Jemasphe, of the frigate L'Incorruptible, of the corvette La Toche, the brigs Le Festin and Le Souffleur, and the galleys La Fine and La Courseuse.

Decree of the 23d Thermidor.

Paris, Aug. 11.—The consuls of the Republic, on the report of the minister of the interior, respecting the law of the 29th of last Floreal, May 19, taking into consideration that the establishment of the customs has for its principal object to exclude articles of foreign merchandize, the introduction of which might be prejudicial to the national manufactures; that the regulations requisite for the accomplishment of that end ought not only to leave unrestrained, but to encourage exportation, consistently with those precautions which are necessary to prevent abuses from springing up, that in a word, the particular position of the ports and the commerce of the cities of Cologne and Mayence require the speedy adoption which shall on the one hand secure the advantage of the fair trader, to whom every possible facility is meant to be given, and on the other the interest of the public, which is desirous of opposing every obstacle in the way of fraud, make the following decree :

I. There shall be, in the ports of Cologne and Mayence, a real entrepôt (entrepôt) of foreign goods and merchandise, prohibited and not prohibited, and of goods which are brought from the colonies, and those which arrive from other quarters.

II. These places shall not enjoy the advantages of this entrepôt, but on the condition of providing in their ports, at the expense of their commerce, convenient and secure magazines, forming one contiguous series of buildings, for the purpose of forming such an entrepôt. For this purpose, the plan of the buildings shall be laid before the government; which, after a suitable examination of its propriety, shall establish it by a special decree.

III. There is nothing in the present decree to supersede any of the provisions of the decree of the 3d Thermidor (July 22) respecting the colonial produce of our own islands, and those of foreign countries, nor any of the regulations respecting the introduction of tobacco.

IV. The minister of the interior and of finances are charged with the execution of the present decree; which shall be inserted in the bulletin of the laws.

Buonaparté, The First Consul.

H. B. Maret, Secretary of State.

The prefect of the department of the Seine decrees the following Programma, for the distribution of the great prizes, at the general assembly of the three central schools of Paris :

I. The distribution shall be made on the 17th of August, at three, in the great hall of l'Oratoire, by the prefect of the department, accompanied by the secretary general and the council of prefecture, in the presence of the mayors, the members of the jury of public instruction, and the professors of central schools.

II. The tribunals of the department of the Seine shall be invited to assist, and the learned societies to send a deputation of some of their members.

III. The sitting shall be opened by a discourse pronounced by the prefect.

IV. A child from each school shall recite a thesis of his own composition. The distribution of the prizes to begin immediately after the recital.

V. The prefect shall declare the first prize for Latin composition. The élève crowned shall declare the other prizes.

V. The élève to whom the first prize shall have been awarded, shall conclude the distribution by an oration in French.

From the Official Gazette of Lisbon.

Lisbon, August 14.—General Lasnes, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, left this court in the morning of the 10th instant, a measure which he took from his own proper will, and which is the more unexpected, as have been the constant and repeated civilities and attentions paid to him by this court, in demonstration of the constant friendship, perfect harmony, and good understanding subsisting between this monarchy and the French Republic—as there does not exist any actual object of discussion between the two Governments which can alter, in the slightest degree, the happy relations of this country with France, relations which this court desires efficaciously to promote, and even to render more intimate.

Copy of the Note of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, to the different Ministers resident at the Court of Portugal.

General Lasnes, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, having adopted the unexpected resolution of withdrawing from the court, his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, my Master, has ordered me to communicate to you this event, which is the more unlooked for as he had received the most ardent and distinguished testimonies of regard, founded upon the most perfect harmony, and entire good understanding subsisting between this Monarchy and the French Republic; and this too at a moment when there existed no object of discussion which could in the smallest degree affect the friendly relations which his Royal Highness desires, and will make it his study to promote. You will have the goodness to give notice of the above to your respective courts.

Hamburgh, August 16.—Of the war between Russia and Persia there is yet no farther information, than that the new regent of the latter, Baba Kan, has collected a considerable body of troops, in order to meet the Russian army, which has penetrated from the corner of Astracan, through Derbent, to the Persian province of Ghilan. The circumstance which gave occasion to these hostilities is, that all the Russian subjects resident in the states of the said Regent were driven from their possessions, under a pretence that Russia acted unjustly in taking under its protection the provinces of Georgia and Mingrelia. It is apprehended that this dispute will be attended with a great deal of bloodshed.

Aug. 18.—By an Arrêté of the consuls, of the 12th instant, in entrepôt for foreign merchandize and produce is established at the cities of Cologne and Mayence, upon the same terms, and with the same restrictions as in other places, where an entrepôt has been already established.

Paris, Aug. 19.—The following letter has been transmitted by the minister of the interior to the prefect of the Somme, the department in which Amiens is situated:—

I observe with regret, Citizen Prefect, that the unfounded rumours, spread abroad by certain newspapers, relative to a treaty of commerce with England, have alarmed the manufacturers, and caused industry to decrease. Does the trading interest then no longer confide in the promise which I made in the name of government; and can the manufacturers believe that, in any possible case, their interests could be either sacrificed or neglected? I invite you, Citizen Prefect, to banish such false ideas from among the manufacturers—falsehoods calculated to discourage them in their labours. Inform them, persuade them that these reports are disseminated designedly by the enemies of their industry; make them entertain full confidence in a government which is worthy of it—assure them once more, that whatever can promote their prosperity is the peculiar object of the solicitude of the government; and that it will take a pleasure in availing itself of the advice and information of the manufacturers, when the time comes to open our commercial intercourse with our neighbours.

Chaptal.

Aug. 20.—By an arrêté of the counsel of the 13th inst. the minister of the interior is authorized to put in a state of activity the necessary labours for preparing the palace of the Louvre for the reception of the monuments of art arrived from Italy; as also for the national library, the removal of which to that palace is ordered. The sum of 25,000 francs per month is appropriated for this purpose, until the whole is completed.

The chest of the Legion d'Eléte was robbed on the 4th instant of 180,700 francs; but the robbers have been apprehended, and 170,000 francs recovered by the police.

Arrêté of the 20th August.

The Consuls of the Republic, having seen the Brief of Pope Pius VII. given at St. Peter's, at Rome, on the 29th June, 1802.

Upon the report of the Counsellor of State charged with all the affairs relative to worship, the Council of State having been heard, decree,

The Brief of Pope Pius VII. given at St. Peter's, at Rome, on the 29th June, 1802, by which Citizen Maurice Talleyrand, Minister of Foreign Affairs is restored to the secular and lay life, shall have its full and entire effect.

The First Consul,

(Signed) Buonaparté.

A person of the name of Desjardins, one of the most ferocious Brigands of the Cotes du Nord, has established his residence at Jersey. Thirteen individuals condemned to death as contumacious, for having assassinated several wealthy proprietors of national property, are with him: they appear to enjoy a special protection.—Moniteur.

It is confirmed that war has broken out between Russia and Persia. The Russians have already made some progress, and beaten the troops of the sovereign of Persia.

Extract of a Letter from Fort St. George, (East Indies) February 17, 1802.

The tidings of peace between England and France have reached India. The effect they produced was at first a temporary joy and gladness (for the sound of peace is of itself pleasing to every ear) but on mature and serious reflection, more painful sensations succeeded. To every considerate and reflecting mind, the peace, as extending and applying it to India, presents nothing but woes and misfortunes. It has already frustrated and counteracted all those schemes, that the deep and penetrating policy of the Marquis of Wellesley had formed and arranged for the preservation of our Indian possessions; what may be the consequence time can only discover: the Marquis, as distinguished for his public virtues as for his private ones, for his sagacity and prudence in the formation, as for energy and vigour in the execution of his plans, had conceived it necessary, in order to secure upon a firm and solid foundation, the Company's safety and prosperity, to deprive the Indian Princes of the assistance of the French officers, whom many of them kept in their pay and service, and who are eminent for their talents and courage. The employment of a great number of these officers by the Mahrattas, became a peculiar object of jealousy and uneasiness to the Marquis, and he determined to extirpate the very name out of the peninsula; accordingly he commenced a negotiation with the Mahrattas to obtain the dismissal of the French officers in their service, at the same time resolved to obtain his ends by force, if he could not by negotiation. The Mahrattas as might be expected, shewed no great readiness to comply with the Marquis's demands, and he was just on the eve of declaring war against them (and we have no reason to doubt of its success) to force them into a compliance, when the accounts of the peace arrived, which immediately prevented it, as the object thereof then became unattainable; and now the Mahrattas will not only have the assistance of the French officers, but aided by the intrigues and ambition of the French at Pondicherry, what have we not to expect! For my part, I shall not be surprised to find India, within a year or two, the theatre of a long and bloody war: the peace then, as applying it to India, is pregnant with war, and fraught with folly; no doubt you have, at home, cogent reasons for making it, unknown to us; no doubt it was "a consumption devoutly to be wished," and one of its blessed effects is, the making an English populace drag, with acclamations and shouts of joy, the carriage of a French republican general and ambassador; nothing but such an action remained to complete the list of insults that during the war, have been levelled at our king and country, and hands were soon found ready enough to commit it, for my part I can imagine no sight so disgraceful, so ignominious as this, how it could be patiently borne I am at a loss to account for. Would our forefathers have done so? they would sooner have died. Conquerors of old, have harnessed subjugated princes to their chariots, but the humiliating spectacle only excited sentiments of pity and compassion for the unfortunate sufferers, the victims of adversity and the resisters of oppression; but when a set of fools or villains voluntarily degrade themselves to the most ignominious state, dragging, like beasts of burthen a foreigner, does such a spectacle excite compassion or contempt, pity or disgust? I have no doubt as to what it excited in your breast, and yet I fear there are too, too many, who were highly delighted and pleased with it, but can they be called, or do they deserve the name of Englishmen?

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

There are articles of intelligence, extracted from the foreign papers (see p. 243, 245), relative to a war between Russia and Persia, which will, probably, call to the recollection of our readers, a passage in the letter of a correspondent at Stockholm, published in p. 129 of this present vol. of the Register. He stated, that Russia and France had formed a project for establishing a republic in Persia, and for delivering Hindostan; and added, that the Russian troops were then on their march towards Ispahan. We cannot much blame those persons, who are disposed to treat this project with ridicule; let it be remembered, however, that the ridicule which was thrown on the invasion of Egypt did not prevent the attempt from succeeding to a fearful degree; it did not prevent Buonaparté from subjugating Egypt and attacking Syria, which last clearly proves, that India was the ultimate object. We repeat, that the project, spoken of by our correspondent, has in it somewhat of the marvellous, but is by no means impossible. Ten years ago we should have laughed at it; but, woeful experience has taught us, that nothing, which France undertakes, is a subject of derision. While therefore we hope, and, indeed believe, that the invasion of Hindostan by the way of Persia, is a project that will never be realized, we cannot help requesting those, who persist in making their own little minds the standard of that of Buonaparté, to consider; 1. That the Russians are absolute masters of the Caspian Sea, and of great part of its western coasts. 2. That the Wolga, together with its canals, joins the Baltic to the Caspian, and, therefore, the Russians can send every thing necessary for an army by water, as far as Fehrabad, a convenient town on the southern point of the Caspian Sea. 3. That from Fehrabad to Ispahan, on one of the great roads of Persia, is no more than about 300 miles. 4. That all the Tartarian hordes on the borders of Persia, from the Caspian Sea to Thibet, are in connexion with Russia. 5. That the Persian empire has long been a prey to anarchy, and is actually divided into several separate states, which, being hostile to each other, will not be able to make any efficacious resistance against the invaders, who, having no fortifications and scarcely any artillery to combat, will have no occasion for heavy cannon, the conveying of which is always the most formidable difficulty in such an enterprize. 7. That, as to the French part of the expedition, the port of Laodicea is not more than 60 miles from Aleppo, and, by water (on the Euphrates) from Aleppo to Bagdad, is, at most, 400 miles. 8. That Bagdad and Babylon have several times been taken and retaken by the Turks and the Persians, who have had immense armies in and before those places. Consequently, a French army of 30 or 40,000 men, moving from the coast of Syria to Bagdad, will meet with no obstacle, which has not already been met with, and overcome by armies much more numerous and less capable of such an undertaking. 9. That as to any opposition on the part of the Turks, it is, in the present state of things, absolutely impossible. Now, suppose that the provinces between the Caspian Sea and the Persian Gulph were over-run by the Russians and the French, it is only about 200 miles from Ispahan to the Persian Gulph, and even to Ormus no more than 400 miles; consequently, if the project be at all feasible, Ispahan is a very proper point of rendezvous, whether the intention might be to penetrate into Hindostan by way of the Persian Gulph and the Indian Sea, or by the way of Candahar.—It may, perhaps, be observed, that such an enterprize, were it to be undertaken, and even crowned with success, would be more useful to Russia than to France; to which we reply, that France will never regard any thing as useless to her, which may tend to the destruction of the riches and the maritime power of England.

The design of France (of which we spoke somewhat at length in p. 185 of this volume) to invade the Barbary states, appears, we think, more and more evident. A squadron is said to have sailed from Toulon for the purpose of punishing the Bey of Tunis and the Dey of Algiers; and, the very detailed account of the exactions of those pirates, which is given in the Moniteur, strongly indicates the intention of Buonaparté. As we observed before, his Majesty's ministers must see this movement of the French with regret and alarm; but, they will not dare to remonstrate against it. They would, were they to attempt to do their duty on this occasion have to encounter, not only the wrath of Buonaparté, but the almost universal clamour of the people of England, who would, with some shew of reason, complain, if a peace, purchased with the safety and honour of England itself, were so soon to be broken "for the sake of a nest of pirates." This is, indeed, already the language of all that timid and unthinking mass of mortals, who were, and who still are, for peace on any terms: that is to say, with France, for, as to other nations, they would fight with them to the last drop of their blood.

General Victor is, it seems, to command the division destined for Louisiana. This is an enterprize, of which very little is thought in Downing-street; but, the effects of which will, in a few years, fall upon us like a thunderbolt. Nothing that can happen on the continent of Europe, or even on that of Asia, will be half so pregnant with danger to England as the event, which may probably take place on the continent of North America. We shall, in our next sheet, once more endeavour to direct the attention of his Majesty's ministers towards this most important subject, on which we are now able to speak more in detail than we have done before: in the mean time, we think it right to remind them, that there is no time to be lost; that a very few months will see the French safe at New Orleans, and that it will be then too late to think of prevention. The Americans have now most amply discussed the subject, and the result of that discussion is, that they may be ruined by the transfer of Louisiana to France, but that England must be; in which opinion we sincerely concur.

The right to navigate the Black Sea has been obtained by France; and, there is every reason to suppose, that it has been obtained to our exclusion. Our poor minister at the Porte (like our ministers every where else) is in a truly pitiable situation. He cannot know how to act, and from Downing-street, as Downing-street is now inhabited, what instructions has he to expect! We had before obtained a right of navigation similar to that now obtained by the French; but there wanted an act of the Turkish government to ratify our convention on the subject. Whether to ask for this act, or to slip into the Black Sea unperceived, along with the French, is the question now to be determined on; the former, it is feared, would expose us to the danger of a blunt refusal, and of course, an exclusion; while the latter might, and most likely would, bring on us that kind of chastisement, which is generally bestowed on intruders. In short, though we may suffer much from French intrigue at Constantinople, our great danger arises from the dread which the Turks have of the French rulers, and from the contempt which they must feel for the ministers of this country.

When we published, nearly a month ago, the letter from our correspondent at Stockholm (p. 129), in which it was stated, "that the King of Prussia had acted as mediating negotiator between the Emperor Alexander and Buonaparté," and that they had "arranged the division of Germany," we excused the incredulity of others, because we ourselves doubted of the fact: our doubts were, perhaps, not so strong as those of our readers in general; but little did we imagine, that the intelligence was true to the extent in which it now appears it was. The French government has published a copy of a joint declaration (which is too long to come into this sheet, but which shall be inserted in our next) of Buonaparté and the Emperor of Russia, commanding a new organization of the German Empire; a new distribution of territory, of ranks, dignities, offices, and power. For the present we must, however, confine our remarks chiefly to the changes which are ordered to take place relative to the German possessions of his Majesty, and which are signified in the following terms: "The King of England, in his quality of Elector of Hanover, has raised pretensions to Hildesheim, Corvey, and Hoexter, and as it would be of interest that he should desist from his pretensions, it is proposed that the Bishoprick of Osnaburgh, which now belongs alternately to the Electoral House of Brunswick, should devolve to him in perpetuity, upon the following conditions:—First, That the King of England, Elector of Hanover, shall renounce all his rights and pretensions to Hildesheim, Corvey, and Hoexter.—Secondly, That he shall likewise give up to the cities of Hamburg and Bremen, the rights and properties which he exercises and possesses in the said cities, and within the extent of their territory.—Thirdly, That he shall cede the Bailliwick of Wildhausen to the Duke of Oldenbourg, and his rights to the eventual succession of the county of Sayn, Altenkirchen—to the Prince of Nassau Usingen." In a subsequent sheet we shall give a detailed account of the situation, value, and importance of the territories, of which our sovereign has been thus plundered. It is not so very surprising that Hildesheim, which lies in the heart of the king's German dominions, should be seized on during the time of the minister, who began his career by seizing an estate in the heart of Richmond Park, and whose respectable example, perhaps, had no small weight with Buonaparté. There are some persons who set little value on German connexions: some even suppose (erroneously in our opinion) that it would be better for England if Hanover belonged entirely to some other sovereign; but, whatever may be thought on this subject, where is the man, where the loyal subject, who does not feel indignant at the present transaction? Where is the Englishman who can patiently see his sovereign thus insultingly pillaged of his patrimonial estates, without despising the men, whose measures have brought on us this indelible disgrace? The British Ministry were never consulted in this division of Germany; the object of the convention between Russia and France was not communicated to them; they did not, even at the time it was first mentioned in this Register, know of the existence of such an instrument; its ratification was known at Stockholm on the 5th of July; in Downing Street not till the middle of August! Is it possible for the affairs of a nation long to go on thus? On these "indemnities," we shall only further remark, at present, the unbearable insolence of indemnifying the Stadtholder, in part, out of his Majesty's Hanoverian dominions, without suffering him or his ministers in either country to have the smallest share in the transaction! On this topic we shall quote the Morning Chronicle, as having expressed precisely our sentiments:—"In this transaction we have only to remark the disgrace attached to the government of this country in thus allowing this matter to be wholly transacted by France and Russia. We are studiously and insultingly excluded from the credit of procuring any indemnities for the House of Nassau, which was formerly so distinguished for its connexion with our interests, and which, in such times as the present, and under such an administration, has suffered so grievously by adhering to our cause. Every man who feels for the honour of the nation must see how much on the one hand, we are hurt in reputation by abandoning the Stadtholder, and on the other, what little influence we possess, nay, to what contempt we have fallen, in being left totally out of view in a transaction which is in every respect so interesting and important to us. The Stadtholder disdains, the other powers reject, our interference!" All this is very true, but we cannot but recollect, that this paper was amongst the very foremost to clamour for that peace, that shameful and humiliating peace, which has produced all this insult and contempt. The ministers are here blamed for "allowing," Russia and France to act thus! Allowing! How would the Morning Chronicle have ministers do otherwise than allow them to do as they please? Not to allow is to prevent; to prevent is war, and war is ruin. With what face, therefore, can those who have belaboured for peace on any terms, blame the ministers for allowing any thing? They must continue to allow any thing and every thing that is demanded of them, unless they again go to war; unless they abandon the happy system of "Peace and Plenty." This nation deserves to suffer, and the men at present in power seem destined to bring on it its deserts!

The London daily papers, after having for some days scouted our opinion, that the threats of Buonaparté's gazette had produced a fall in the funds, have at length subscribed to it in terms even more full and satisfactory than we could have hoped for. The confession is well worthy of attention:—"The very curious intelligence from France respecting the journals" [That is, the news which has been received, and is now confirmed, of the English newspapers having been prohibited in France] "made a sensible impression on the funds, and it is probable that the measure was altogether calculated for the meridian of our Stock Exchange. It is a fact worthy of remark that these bursts of spleen in the official journal of the Chief Consul of France have uniformly made their appearance, so as to meet the settling day in our stock market. It is more probable that it is a jobbing speculation than a symptom of national misunderstanding. Without any design of a rupture, however, it will ever be a part of the tactics of France to keep us in incessant agitation. Their speculators will strive to profit from the fluctuations which they occasion; and at a time when opinion is so fickle, the slightest shew of a hostile disposition will materially affect the funds."—Sayst thou so? Why, then, we are agreed at last. This is precisely the state of things that Mr. Windham foretold, in his speech upon the preliminaries of peace; not in substance only, but in so many words. If Buonaparté can carry on this game for a few months, he will not need another rupture with us; nor will he have any reason to envy us that capital and credit, of which he will have the continual command. The power which he possesses of raising and lowering the funds at pleasure, will, with the aid of two or three intelligent brokers, enable him to draw upon this country for much more cash than he will want to maintain his 300,000 soldiers. If we are asked, why the king of France did not formerly make use of the means, which we suppose Buonaparté will make use of, we answer, that the king of France dared not; a threat on the part of the king of France would have brought on a war; we have now entered on a state of things entirely new; Buonaparté is absolute master of the value of our funds; because it rests with him, and him alone, whether we shall have peace or war. Thus situated there is nothing to prevent him from drawing out of this country just as much money as he pleases.

The "blessings of peace" pour in upon us so fast, and from so many parts of the world, that it is absolutely impossible to enter into the enjoyment of them all. Portugal, whose integrity we so generously and so efficaciously provided for, is, as will be perceived by the intelligence from Lisbon (see p. 242) about to receive some new mark of the amicable disposition of France. This news has produced great sensation in London, and has considerably aided the depression in the funds, which were yesterday just one per cent. lower than they were in October 1800, upon the report, that a naval armistice was about to be signed! This fact, as far as the funds are a political criterion, proves that our present situation is not quite so worthy of the name of peace as a naval armistice would have been. The truth is, the thoughts of the nation are like a cork in the middle of the ocean: there is no such thing as public opinion; universal uncertainty prevails.

Were we to give an opinion as to the real cause of the French ministers quitting Portugal, we should say, that Buonaparté intends to extort something more from that power. We do not think he means to seize on Portugal immediately, though he may do it ere long. It would be unwise in him to do it at present: Our fleets are not quite dismantled, and there may, as yet, be a possibility of our once more sending them to sea in defence of Portugal, or, at least, in order to revenge the subjugation of that country. This, however, is by no means certain, but, it is, upon the whole, to be presumed, that Buonaparté will not be in such haste to put in execution those projects which he surely has in reserve, with respect to this nation, whom we have so shamefully abandoned to his rapacity.

As if peace had not brought us blessings enough, our ministers have been in search of others in our colony of Jamaica, where they have sown the seeds of discord, disaffection, and, probably, of something still more serious. The Lieut. Governor communicated to the Colonial Assembly, in the month of June last, a proposition from his Majesty's ministers, that the assembly should make provision for the maintenance of 5,000 troops, in addition to those already maintained by the colony. The governor urges "the absolute necessity of her" [the mother country] "resorting to some extraordinary means for enabling her to support the increased naval and military establishments, so imperiously required in all parts of the empire, but more particularly in her West India colonies," as reasons for the present demand upon the colony of Jamaica. The assembly have rejected the proposition in toto; and, in refusing aid, have taken an opportunity to enumerate their grievances, one of which is well worthy of note:—"the difficulties attending our commercial intercourse with the American states, from whence many more essential articles, necessary for carrying on the cultivation of our properties, and for the subsistence of the inhabitants of all descriptions, can alone be obtained, arising from the prohibition to export any article of our staple productions except rum and molasses in American bottoms." Now, in alluding to what we have said in p. 234, (and to which we beg leave to refer the reader) we cannot help remarking here, that this proposition to the colony of Jamaica is a step which, we trust, never would have been taken by Mr. Windham. It was for the "safe politicians," the discreet Addingtons and Hawkesburys, to throw a fire-brand into the West India islands, which, thanks to another set of discreet and "safe politicians," has long been a magazine of powder. What a striking confirmation is here afforded, too, of Mr. Windham's opinion of the consequences of the peace! The governor of Jamaica here tells the world, that Great-Britain is now under the "absolute necessity of resorting to some extraordinary means for enabling her to support the increased naval and military establishments, so imperiously required in all parts of the empire, but more particularly in the West India colonies!" And this is "indemnity for the past and security for the future!" This is the state, in which we are to "husband our resources!" This is the effect of that "capital, credit, and commerce," which are to defend us against the intrigues and the arms of France! The dispute with the legislature of Jamaica will terminate either in the humiliation of his Majesty's government, or in the distraction, and, possibly, the revolt, of the colony. The former must be chosen, of course; and, to all the other mortifications, to which these "safe politicians" have exposed their King, they will now add that of being obliged to yield to the opposition of his hitherto most loyal and most dutiful colony. As to the merits of the dispute with the assembly, we can at present give no opinion; but we know that it would not have been agitated, at this time, by any ministry worthy of the epithets of wise and prudent. The reasons urged by the governor, and the reply of the assembly, bear such a strict resemblance to the early part of the dispute with the colonies of America, that one would almost think they had been copied verbatim from the journals of Congress, and we should hope, that so terrible an example will deter the ministers from a further prosecution of their present attempt.

POSTSCRIPT.

We have this moment heard, with great pain, but without any surprise, that a prosecution is commenced, by order of the ministers, and at the request of Buonaparté, against MONSIEUR PELTIER, Editor of a French periodical work, entitled L'AMBIGU. In our last Register, p. 212, we made use of some very strong expressions in order to dissuade the writers of this country from their apparent intention to invite Buonaparté to a meeting in Westminster Hall. We then declared the liberty of the British press to be completely destroyed, as far as related to Buonaparté and his government: the prosecution of M. Peltier will convince every one of the truth of our assertion, especially when the nature of his publication is considered. We shall now witness a new scene of baseness: we shall now see news-papers, magazines, and reviews, filled with eulogiums of the Grand Consul, and with censure on those, who disapprove of his proceedings. We desire M. Peltier not to deceive himself; not to expect support from the other periodical publications: the hunted stag is always shunned by the herd; and a baser herd than the one we are here speaking of is not to be found even in this degenerate nation. The news-papers will affect to bluster for a little while; but it will be mere affectation: they will out-crawl any of the Spaniel Prefects of France. There prevails, all through the country, a strong disposition to submit to Buonaparté. In two words, we are a beaten and a conquered people.

PUBLIC PAPERS.

MINISTRY FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Report made to the First Consul of France, in the Senate, by the Minister for Foreign Affairs.—Sitting of Saturday, the 21st of August.

The treaty of Lunéville had produced the complete re-establishment of peace between France and Germany. It had, in an express and definitive manner, regulated the general relations between the two countries; and, France being satisfied in every point, the entire execution of the treaty would not have required any ulterior regulation, had it not been acknowledged as just, and stipulated in due form, that the cession consented to by the empire, for the advantage of the Republic, should be borne collectively by the Germanic League; admitting nevertheless the distinction between Hereditary Laic Princes and Ecclesiastical Princes possessing only a life rent interest.

This principle being once established, it appeared that it belonged to the Germanic body to occupy itself spontaneously, and, without delay, with the mode of its application.

The sincere desire of the French Government, solely intent upon its internal affairs, was to take no concern in the adjustment of the promised indemnifications; and it confined its influence merely to repeated declarations that it was anxious to see the treaty of Lunéville carried into complete execution by that of the VIIIth Article. But its exhortations remain without effect, and more than a year elapsed without the least appearance of any plan being even commenced for the repartition of the compensations.

The non-execution of one of the principal stipulations of the treaty of Lunéville left all Germany in a state of uncertainty, which became daily more embarrassing, inasmuch as pretensions and intrigues were forming and acquiring strength in proportion as the state of the public mind and public affairs exhibited more indecision. The kind of dissolution which affected the Germanic body, retarded the advantages of the peace to all Europe, and might, in some respects, endanger the general tranquillity. The Government of the Republic was not the only one impressed with this danger; and whilst it received from all quarters the applications of the parties interested in the repartition of the compensations, the Court of Russia testified how urgent it was, in its estimation, that the affairs of Germany should be brought to an adjustment. The Emperor Alexander, on his accession to the throne, felt the noble desire of contributing to maintain the peace which had been re-established; and an intimate concert, a frank and complete association of the most generous views, having promptly taken place between the First Consul and the Emperor, it was felt by them that the pacification of the Continent could not be solidly guaranteed, but by carrying the treaty of Lunéville into complete execution; and that this execution could not be accomplished but by the initiative and influence of the two powers perfectly disinterested, whose preponderant mediation might remove all the obstacles which had arisen in the course of eighteen months against the definitive repartition of the indemnities.

It was, therefore, solely for the purpose of sealing the pacification of Europe, and guaranteeing its stability, that the First Consul and his Majesty the Emperor of Russia determined, by common consent, to interfere in the affairs of Germany, to effect by their mediation, what would in vain have been expected from the internal deliberations of the Germanic body.

This first point being agreed upon, a discussion was opened, and continued between the two Cabinets, to ascertain the ways and means which should lead to the desired result. It was resolved, that a general plan of indemnification should be presented to the Diet; and in digesting this plan the most scrupulous attention was, on both sides, paid to the means of compensating every loss, satisfying every interest, and incessantly conciliating the demands of justice with political expediency.

It was not, in fact, sufficient to ascertain the strict value of the losses sustained, and to proportion the compensations accordingly: the effects of the war having changed the internal equilibrium of Germany, it was necessary to think of the means of re-establishing it. The introduction of new Princes into the Germanic system, required new combinations. Nor was the real value of the compensations to arise merely from the extent, but in many cases from their position; and the advantages desirable to some powers from the concentration of their old and new territories, were in themselves an important consideration, and which, therefore, required to be attended to.

The two Governments, therefore, applied themselves to examine with scrupulous attention the question of the indemnities in all these relations. They felt that, if policy required the complete satisfaction of the principal houses, strict justice equally required that the States of the second and third rank should obtain a compensation for their losses, and the First Consul made it his particular business to maintain the rights of those who might have found the least support among the parties interested.

The perfect concert which had been formed between France and Russia, the happy result of the direct intercourse which the First Consul took pleasure in maintaining with his Majesty the Emperor of Russia, having presided in all these discussions, all points were speedily settled, and a general plan of indemnification agreed upon at Paris by the respective Plenipotentiaries, it received the approbation of the First Consul, and that of the Emperor.

It was determined that this plan should be presented to the Diet of the Empire, in the form of a declaration to be made at the same time by Ministers appointed for that purpose. On the part of the First Consul, Citizen Laforest, Minister of the Republic to the Elector Palatine of Bavaria, has received orders to repair to Ratisbon; and on the part of the Emperor of Russia, the Baron de Buhler, likewise his Minister at Munich.

This declaration was to have been presented a few days ago, and the First Consul having ordered it to be read to him in the Senate, it will display the principles which have directed the two Governments, and the particular care which they have taken in their application.

In fact, the examination of the proposed plan will shew, that in the execution of a system which has for its object the consolidation of the peace of Europe, they have above all, applied themselves to diminish the chances of war. On this account, care has been taken to avoid all contiguity of territory between the two powers who have most frequently involved Europe in bloodshed by their quarrels, and who, being seriously reconciled, cannot now have a more ardent desire than that of removing all those grounds of misunderstanding which arise from neighbouring territories, and which, between rival States, are never unaccompanied with danger.

The same principle adopted, not in all its rigour, but as far as circumstances could admit, has also led to place the indemnities of Prussia beyond the reach of contact with France and Batavia.

From this arrangement Austria will have derived the immense advantage of seeing all her possessions concentrated.

The Palatine House will also have received an organization stronger and more advantageous for the purposes of defence:

And Prussia will continue to form, in the Germanic system, the essential basis of a necessary counterpoise.

The regulation of the secondary indemnities also proceed upon principles of general and individual accommodation, and nothing has been omitted with respect to the consideration of ascertained losses. It will nevertheless appear, that the house of Baden has been more advantageously circumstanced than many others, but it was judged necessary to fortify the circle of Suabia, which lies directly between France and the great German powers. In this instance the First Consul merits applause, as such a line of policy perfectly accords with the disposition of the French Government, which with pleasure sees an augmentation of power conferred on a Prince, whose virtues have long since obtained the esteem of all Europe, whose alliances so honourably distinguished his family, and whose conduct during the war, has particularly merited the good-will of the Republic.

It is also with real satisfaction that France and Russia, obliged to take the system of secularization as the basis of indemnities, perceive the possibility of preserving to the Empire, one Ecclesiastical Elector, and that they have proposed to assign him a suitable establishment, in conferring on him the title and functions of Arch-Chancellor.

It will be necessary farther to present to the Diet of the Empire some general considerations, as a proper basis for the internal regulations, which the new organization of the Germanic body will require. In this view, the First Consul and his Imperial Majesty of Russia, impressed with a desire to shew their sincere wishes for the consolidation of the peace of Europe, have not delayed to concert such a plan for the farther indemnities alluded to, as appears to them to include a basis and details as strictly conformable to the spirit as well as to the text of the treaty of Luneville, as can possibly be framed, as well as analogous to the political interests of Europe, and favourable to the preservation of peace.

The two governments, France and Russia, are firmly persuaded that the time which they have allotted will amply suffice for the discussion of the interests of Germany, and they will reap, in a long duration of peace to that Empire, the most agreeable as well as honourable reward for the exertions which they have respectively made to procure it.

DECLARATION.

The First Consul of the French Republic animated with the desire of contributing to the consolidation of the repose and tranquillity of the German Empire, has thought that no means were more calculated to obtain that effect of his solicitude, than those of fixing, by a plan of indemnity, adapted, as far as circumstances would permit to the respective interests, an arrangement proper to produce this salutary effect; and a concurrence of views having been established upon this subject between the First Consul of the Republic and his Imperial Majesty of all the Russias, he has authorized the Minister for Foreign Affairs, to concert with the Minister Plenipotentiary of his Imperial Majesty of Russia, the means best calculated to apply the principles adopted for these indemnities, to the different demands of the parties interested. The result of this work having obtained his approbation, he has ordered the undersigned to make it known to the Diet of the Empire by the present declaration; a measure to which the First Consul of the Republic, as well as his Imperial Majesty, have been impelled by the following considerations:

The seventh article of the treaty of Luneville, having stipulated that the Hereditary Princes, whose possessions are comprised in the cession made to the French Republic of the countries situated on the left bank of the Rhine, should be indemnified, it has been agreed that, conformably to what had been decided upon at the Congress of Rastadt, this indemnity should be effected by means of secularization; but though perfectly agreed upon the basis of the indemnity, the States interested have remained so opposite in views with respect to the distribution, that it has hitherto appeared to be impossible to proceed to the execution of the before-mentioned article of the treaty of Luneville.

And though the Diet of the Empire has named a special commission to direct its attention to this important business, we see, by the delays which its assembling meets with, what obstacles the opposition of interest, and the jealousy of pretensions place to the making the regulation of the indemnities the spontaneous act of the Germanic body.

It is this that has induced the First Consul and the Emperor of Russia to think that it became two powers perfectly disinterested to afford their mediation, and to offer to the deliberations of the Imperial Diet a general plan of indemnity, drawn up from the calculations of the greatest impartiality, and in which the attention has been directed both to compensate the losses recognized, and to preserve between the principal houses in Germany the balance that subsisted before the war.

In consequence, after having examined with the most scrupulous care all the memorials, both upon the value of the losses, and upon the demand of indennities presented by the parties interested, it has been agreed to propose, that the indemnities shall be distributed in the following manner :

To the Archduke, Grand Duke For Tuscany and its dependencies, the Archbishopric of Salzburg, the Provostship of Bertoldsgrad, the Bishopric of Trent, the Bishopric of Brixen, the part of the Bishopric of Passau, situated beyond the Ilz, and the Inn on the side of Austria, except the suburbs of Passau, with a radius of 500 toises; the Abbays, Chapters, and Convents situated in the above-mentioned Dioceses.

The above Principalities shall be possessed by the Archduke upon the conditions, engagements, and relations founded upon existing treaties; the said principalities shall be taken out of the Circle of Bavaria, and incorporated in the Circle of Austria, and their Ecclesiastical Jurisdictions, both Metropolitane and Diocesan, shall be also separated by the limits of the two Circles; Muhlthor shall be united to Bavaria, and its equivalent in revenue shall be taken from those of Freisingen.

To the Count of Sickingen—For the county of Landstul, &c. the abbeyes of Ochsenhausen and of Munchroth.

To the Count of Leyen—For Blicscastel, &c. the Abbeyes of Schonsenried, Goutenzell, Heybach, Bamdt, and Bouxheim.

To the Prince of Brezenheim—The abbey of Lindau with the city.

To the Countess of Colloredo—For Daschthal; the abbeyes of Sainte Croix de Donawerth.

To the countess of Sternberg—For Mandersheid, Blankenheim, the abbeyes of Weissenau and Isny, with the city.

To the Prince of Dietrichstein—For the Seignory of de Trasp, which will be abandoned to the Grisons, the Seignory of Neu-Ravensbourg.

To the Counts of Westphalia, of Passenheim—For Ollbruck, of sinzendorf; for Rhineck, of Strassberg; for Kerpen, of Ostein; for Millenglock, of Quadt; for Wicketade, of Plettenberg; for Wittem, of Metternich; for Wennebourg, &c. of Aspremont; for Reckheim, of Toring; for Gronsfeld, of Nesselrade; for Welri, &c. the lower Bishopric of Munster.

To the Grand Prior of Malta—For the commanderies on the left of the Rhine; the abbey of Saint Blaise, with the county of Banderf and dependencies; the abbeyes of Saint Trupert, of Schultern, of St. Pierre, and of Tenebach.

The First Consul of the French Republic, and his Majesty the Emperor of Russia, after having proposed to regulate thus the demandable indemnities of the Hereditary Princes, have acknowledged that it was at once possible and fit to preserve, in the first College of the Empire, an Ecclesiastical Elector.

They propose, in consequence, that the Arch-Chancellor of the Empire should be transferred to the See of Ratisbon, with the abbeyes of Saint Emmeran, Ober Munster, and Heider Munster, keeping of his old possessions the Grand Bailiwick of Aschaffenburg, on the right of the Mayn, and that there should be united to it besides, a sufficient number of mediate abbeyes, so as to make up to him with said lands, an annual revenue of a million florins.

And as the best means to consolidate the Germanic body is to place in the first college the Princes of the greatest influence of the Empire, it is proposed that the electoral title should be granted to the Margrave of Baden, to the Duke of Wirtemberg, and to the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel.

The King of England, in his quality of Elector of Hanover, has raised pretensions to Hildesheim, Corvey, and Hoexter, and as it would be of interest that he should desist from his pretensions, it is proposed that the Bishoprick of Osnaburgh, which now belongs alternately to the Electoral House of Brunswick, should devolve to him in perpetuity, upon the following conditions: First, That the King of England, Elector of Hanover, shall renounce all his rights and pretensions to Hildesheim, Corvey, and Hoexter. Secondly, That he shall likewise give up to the cities of Hamburg and Bremen, the rights and properties which he exercises and possesses in the said cities, and within the extent of their territory. Thirdly, That he shall cede the Bailiwick of Wildhausen to the Duke of Oldenburg, and his rights to the eventual succession of the county of Sayn, Altenkirchen—to the Prince of Nassau Usingen.

In consideration of the cession of the bailiwick of Wildhausen, to the Duke of Oldenburg, and the secularization that shall be made for his advantage of the bishopric, and of the grand chapter of Lubeck, the toll of Lubeck shall be suppressed, and shall not be re-established under any pretence whatever, and the rights and properties of the said bishopric and chapter in the city of Lubeck shall be united to the domain of the said city.

The propositions made with relation to the indemnities, lead to several general considerations, which ought to occupy the attention of the Diet, and on which they will not fail to make the necessary decisions. It appears then,

First, That the ecclesiastical property of the Grand Chapters and their dignitaries, ought to be incorporated with the domains of the bishoprics, and pass with the bishoprics to the Princes to whom they are allotted.

Secondly, That the property of the chapters, abbeys, and convents, as well of men as of women, mediate and immediate, which has not been formally disposed of in the present propositions, should be applied to complete the indemnity of the states and hereditary members of the Empire, if it should be found that what is already allotted is insufficient, and saving the sovereignty, which remains always to the territorial Princes, to the endowing of new cathedrals, which are to be preserved or established, as well as for the support of the bishops and their chapters, and other expenses of public worship, and to the pensions of the suppressed clergy.

Thirdly, that the property and revenues belonging to hospitals, zabriques, universities, colleges, and other pious foundations, as also those of the communes of one of the two Banks of the Rhine, situate on the other Bank, should be placed at the disposal of the respective governments.

Fourthly, that the lands and property assigned to the states of the Empire to replace their possessions on the Left Bank of the Rhine, should remain subject to the payment of the debts of the said Princes, as well personal as those appertaining to their ancient possessions.

Fifthly, That all the tolls of the Rhine ought to be received, without the power of re-establishment, under any denomination whatever, saving the duties of customs.

Sixthly, That all the fiefs held of feudal courts, established heretofore on the left Bank of the Rhine, and situate on the right Bank, should be henceforth held immediately of the Emperor and the Empire.

Sevently, That the Princes of Nassau Usingen, Nassau Weilburg, Salm-Salm, Salm Kirburg, Linange, and Arenberg, should be maintained or introduced in the college of Princes; each with a vote annexed to the possessions which they receive in indemnity for their former immediate possessions; that the votes of the immediate Counts of the Empire should be in like manner transferred to the lands, which they receive in compensation, and that the ecclesiastical votes should be exercised by the Princes and Counts, who, by virtue of the treaty of Luneville, are in possession of the capitals.

Eighthly, That the college of cities ought to remain composed of the free and imperial cities of Lubec, Hamburg, Bremen, Wetzlar, Frankfurt, Nuremberg, Augsburg, and Ratisbon, and that the means ought to be provided, in the event of future wars in the Empire, that the said cities shall not be compelled to take any part, and that their neutrality should be assured by the Empire, and also that it should be recognized by the other Belligerent powers.

Ninthly, That the secularization of the convents of Recluse Women ought not to be effected, but with the consent of the diocesan bishop; but the convents of men should be at the disposition of the territorial Princes, who may suppress or preserve them, at their pleasure.

Such is the whole of the arrangements and considerations which the undersigned is ordered to present to the imperial Diet, and on which he thinks it his duty to call for its most prompt and most serious deliberation, declaring to it, in the name of his government, that the interest of Germany, the consolidation of the peace, and the general tranquillity of Europe, exact that all that concerns the regulation of the indemnities must be terminated in the space of two months.

Paris, August, 1802.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—What you say on the subject of Jamaica, is precisely what I had, before I saw your last week's Register, observed to a friend; particularly you pointed out, as it well deserved, the passage tending to claim a free trade with the United States of America, which struck me more forcibly than all the rest. I hope you will print the papers, relative to this subject, at length, that your readers may have them to refer to, as occasion shall require. [These papers will be inserted in our next.]

When I took up the pen it was my intention merely to thank you for your remarks, and not to trouble you with any of my own; as, however, I have the paper to spare, I will fill it up with briefly noticing one or two points in the message of the Lieutenant Governor, relating to the difference in the language which ministers have held here and there, and which exhibit such a contrast, as scarcely ever before met the eye or the ear, at any time, or under any government. At the very time that Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. Vansittart are exulting at the flourishing state of our commerce and revenues; at the very time that Mr. Pitt and Mr. Addington are assuring the House of Commons, that we could easily have found resources for continuing the war for years; at that identical moment, Sir, the Lieutenant Governor of Jamaica is instructed to declare to the Legislative Assembly of that colony, that the mother country is under "the absolute necessity of resorting to extraordinary means" for the purpose—not of continuing the war, Sir, but of supporting her peace establishment! Which of these sets of assertions is true, and which is false? Is the House of Commons of the United Kingdom, or the House of Assembly of Jamaica to be cheated, deceived, and misled, by representations, which the ministers who make, or who direct them to be made, know to be not only unfounded, but the very reverse of the truth, if they are to be believed on either side of the Atlantic?

Something of the same reprehension is also due to the pretty tale of the Lieutenant Governor, that there is a "great prospect of a much more ready and extensive sale for the produce of the colonies, from new markets being opened to its commerce by the blessings of peace." Compare this, Sir, with the admissions of Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. Vansittart (which were, in reality, extorted from them by the notoriety of the fact), that our West-India trade, with the products of which we supplied all Europe during the war, must now be confined to the supply of our home consumption; which, however, they (Mr. Vansittart in particular) laboured, by every sophistry to prove, or pretend to prove, would not, upon the whole, injure the country; because, on the re-exportation there was a drawback, and that drawback ceasing, though the quantity of produce required from the colonies would, of course, be greatly diminished, the revenue here would continue the same as before!

I shall, perhaps, be told, Sir, that the mere admissions of ministers, in the course of debate, are not to be seriously contrasted with their subsequent and more deliberate declarations. I therefore, to avoid all dispute, shall contrast this more solemn declaration with the fact, as it now stands. And first, let me ask his Majesty's servants, in what quarter of the world they expected the "blessings of peace" to open "new markets" for a "more ready and extensive sale of the produce of the colonies?" Do they not mean to shut one, at least, of the markets, which were open during the war, and that too, a market, which appears, in the estimation of the colonists, to be the most essential to their interests? Is not the American market, which, during the war, was kept open by perpetually renewed proclamation: of the several governors, and annual acts of indemnity sanctioning those proclamations, now to be shut against our colonies; or, does Lord Hawkesbury mean, by the advice of Lord Liverpool, to surrender the great principle of the Navigation Act, with regard to colonial trade?

But, Sir, the best possible illustration of the Lieutenant Governor's statement respecting the "new markets" and the "more ready and extensive sale of the produce of our colonies," which, according to the communication he was instructed to make, were to be numbered amongst the "blessings of peace," is the variation in the price of sugar. During the war, Sir, the average price of this great staple of our islands was sometimes very high indeed; but, I shall carry my statement no farther back than the 31st of September 1801, when the average price was forty eight shillings and nine pence the hundred weight. Since that day, Sir, which was the last day of war, the average price of sugar has experienced a regular decline, till it is now fallen down to thirty-three shillings and four pence the hundred weight. Let me not be told, that this astonishing fall proceeds from the reduction in the charges for freight and insurance, which does not, at most, amount to more than six and a half per cent., while the reduction in the price of sugar amounts to about thirty-three per cent. I find too, Sir, by consulting your Register, that the fall in the price of this very important article of colonial produce has not only been occasioned by the "blessings of peace," but that it has kept pace with the different degrees of that blessing. At the signature of the preliminaries, the average price of sugar was 48s. 9d. At the signature of the definitive treaty, it was 38s. 8d. It is now 33s. 4d.—Such, Sir, are the proofs, that the "blessings of peace" have opened "new markets for a more ready and extensive sale of the produce of the colonies!"

Sir, I have no desire to exaggerate; I have no motive for wishing to lower the character of the ministry; but I cannot refrain from expressing my contempt and indignation at these puerile arts of fraudulent prevarication and falsehood, no less dishonourably than dishonestly employed, in the hope that, from the distance of place, they may escape detection, till their purpose is obtained.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.

TO THE EDITOR.

Review of Mr. Belsham's Remarks on the Defensive Treaty of Peace.

Page 3. Among a long string of questions stated for the purpose of being negatived, Mr. B. asks—"has Britain received indemnity for the past and security for the future?" Most certainly she has not. Yet in the very next page Mr. B. infers from certain positions there stated, "that the treaty of Amiens is not merely safe but highly beneficial and honourable."—These two passages are manifestly contradictory: for, if Britain has not received security for the future, then can the treaty in no sense of the word be called safe. And, if the treaty is not merely safe, but even highly beneficial and honourable, then Britain has received security for the future.

Page 5. Mr. B. observes,—"on the government of this country, refusing either to maintain the Russians captured in Holland, or to exchange them for French prisoners captured by England, the First Consul with his characteristic magnanimity sent the Russian prisoners, fed and clothed, back to their own country without ransom." To talk of the First Consul's magnanimity on this occasion, is an adulatory falsehood alike base and impudent. For it is notorious that, before this act of magnanimity took place, the Emperor Paul had been debauched from his alliance with England by the meretricious influence of a French actress, sent from Paris to Petersburg for that express purpose; and this liberating of the Russian prisoners was a "coup de théâtre" for the better carrying on of the plot. No blame should be imputed to the First Consul for thus co-operating with Madame (I forget her name) who proved herself to be an able and successful agent; she did Buonaparté's business, and she did the emperor's business, and I hope she did her own business, by getting well paid: but where is the magnanimity in contriving or succeeding by a profligate intrigue?

Mr. B. closes his remarks on this subject by asserting that—"to refuse to regard the Russian auxiliaries in British pay in the light of British soldiers, were (was) a complication of inhumanity, impolicy, and injustice." Mr. B. has not shewn on what expressions in our treaty of alliance with Russia he founds this assertion, and I have no present opportunity of turning to that treaty; but the following points seem to be perfectly reasonable. 1st. If by that treaty it was expressly agreed that England should maintain all such Russian soldiers as should, whilst under our command, be captured by the enemy; then nothing less than an act of hostility on the part of the Emperor Paul could release England from her engagement. 2dly. Even if it were not so expressly agreed by the treaty; yet it seems that an agreement, generally to maintain the Russian troops under our command, should be extended by a liberal construction to the supporting of such as should be captured: so long however as the emperor's faithful performance of his engagements should entitle him to claim a liberal instead of a literal construction of the treaty, and no longer. 3dly. If the Emperor Paul had made any French prisoners, nothing less than an express agreement could give him a reasonable claim on England to redeem the Russians by an exchange of her French prisoners, so long as the emperor should be able to redeem them by French prisoners of his own. That the Emperor Paul had forfeited all claim to liberality on the part of England, long before the First Consul sent back the Russian prisoners, I believe no one will dispute: I believe also that he had in his possession a sufficient number of French prisoners to have exchanged for his own.

Page 6. The articles iii. iv. v. "stipulate the restitution by Britain of all the possessions belonging to France and her allies previous to the war; Trinidad and Ceylon excepted, &c."

By confining his remarks to the particular articles contained in the treaty of Amiens only, Mr. B. has ingeniously endeavoured to keep out of sight those oppressive and extortionate treaties of aggrandizement to which France has compelled the other belligerent powers to submit. Relying therefore upon the substance of the 3d, 4th, and 5th articles, by which it cannot be denied that Britain has acquired Trinidad and Ceylon in addition to her former possessions, Mr. B. triumphantly exclaims—"to every useful and beneficial purpose—nay, to every purpose of national pride and glory, was not that vast portion of the globe possessed by Britain before the war began amply sufficient, and indeed, in the view of impartial reason, much more than sufficient?" But it matters not whether our possessions were or were not sufficient before the war; the question is, whether our present possessions, as settled by the peace, are now sufficient for all the above purposes. Yes, says Mr. B. for "here we see new sources—if not of national prosperity, at least of national and commercial adventure, marked out. And considered in conjunction with those new and immense territorial acquisitions made during the war by the East-India Company, on the final subversion of the Empire of Mysore, they must surely satisfy all who are capable of being satisfied." But should any of Mr. B.'s readers be unfortunately in the number of those who are not satisfied, they will receive no further satisfaction from Mr. B. as he has not offered a single reason in support of his opinion. Yet surely when Mr. B. was stating our acquisitions of Ceylon and Trinidad as matters of such abundant satisfaction, the subject naturally led to a comparative view of those acquisitions with the acquisitions made by France, and of the means which the acquisitions made by either of the two powers afford of levying troops, raising revenue, employing shipping, extending commerce, attacking their enemies or defending themselves: for it is from the proportion maintained between the two countries in these the several constituent parts of national power, that the future prosperity and security of Britain or France can be reasonably estimated. On all these points Mr. B. is carefully silent. Is it unfair to presume that he foresaw in such a comparative investigation the complete refutation of his whole pamphlet?

[To be concluded in our next.]

TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD HAWKESBURY,
His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

MY LORD,

The new partition of the ranks, honours, titles, and estates of the princes of Germany, the inevitable consequence of our shameful and idiot-like dereliction of all ancient policy, in making peace without renewing our standing treaties, seems to call for a revival of that correspondence, which, at and after the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens, so happily existed between your Lordship and myself.

The arguments, made use of to convince you, that a disgraceful treaty would bring upon this country the contempt of every nation in the world, will, I imagine, now require no farther illustration; for, wicked and detestable as is the act itself, the mode of "settling the indemnities," the unexampled insult to our sovereign and to our country, is what certainly excites, in the mind of every man of sense and honour, the greatest degree of indignation. What powers have settled this partition? Russia, which has hardly any thing that can be called a direct interest in the empire, having no possessions but of a very trifling description in a remote corner; and France, which not only has none, but seems to me to have been bound by the VIIIth article of the treaty of Luneville not to interfere in the settlement of these indemnities, which were to be ultimately determined by the German Empire, according to the basis, established at the congress of Rastadt. Indeed, the report of Talleyrand itself seems to admit something of this kind, and to aim at a very lame and paltry excuse for this violation of the clear meaning of the treaty.

With whom was this division negotiated? Not with the emperor, who had made the treaty of peace for the whole Germanic body, and who is the natural and political head of the empire: not with the king of England, who, by all the treaties of the last century and a half, had an immediate interest in the conservation of the Magna Charta of the empire, the treaty of Westphalia, who had protected Germany for the sake of the barrier of the Netherlands, and who now, in his electoral capacity, is a principal member of the empire: who was an ally of the emperor when the treaty of Luneville was made, who, having been wantonly attacked by the Emperor Paul, had recently returned to peace and amity with Russia, and had more recently made a treaty of peace with France, which was, in effect, the sequel of the treaty of Luneville; who, above all, having no indemnities to demand for himself in either capacity, was the prince of greatest influence connected immediately with the empire, that was qualified to be an impartial arbiter. It was negotiated with the King of Prussia, who had indemnities to demand in the very vicinity of the electorate of Hanover, and who, immediately before, without any hostilities being declared, had taken possession of the electorate itself: and, with the inferior princes under similar circumstances, who chose to make themselves dependent on this new confederate head of the empire, France, Russia, and Prussia. Never before, my Lord, was Great Britain treated with such neglect and contempt. Not only was his Majesty not a party to this important transaction; not only was he never consulted in the forming of a compact by which a transfer is made of a part of his dominions; but, the intention, the will, of the contracting parties, was never even notified to him; and, you and your colleagues, his intelligent and vigilant servants, those "safe politicians," who are to preserve us from the might and malice of a whole world of foes, never heard of this treaty of partition, 'till its conclusion was announced in this Register. Is it thus, my Lord, that you keep the promise made to the nation, in the address on the treaty of Amiens, "to employ that vigilance and attention, which the present situation of Europe demands?"

But what is done by this pretended settlement, as far as affects England through Hanover? Some territories, to which his Majesty had clear and indisputable pretensions, and others which he actually possessed, were wanted to fulfil certain views of the hostile confederacy, for such, in spirit, it was and is. He is, therefore, at once told by citizen Talleyrand, that he must surrender these to be parcelled out as the confederates have been pleased to appoint, and, in return, he is to have a partial secularization, which he never asked, of Osnaburgh. This is direct dictation from France, first announced, my Lord, to your insulted sovereign, in the new style of diplomacy, through the channel of the very newspaper, which just before had published a most atrocious libel against him, as the hirer and rewarder of assassins! And this, my Lord, is the effect of that "conciliation" "withfirmness," the profession of which was repeated 'till the parliament and the public were weary of the sound!

The Elector of Hanover is to give up his pretensions to the Bishoprick of Hildesheim and the Abbey of Corvey. It is not the intrinsic value of the former, so much as its local situation, which strikes the politician. It is situated in the middle of the territories of the house of Brunswick and Hanover. From Brunswick it is 28 miles, from Hanover only 14. The King of Prussia, who is to be its new sovereign, by placing a garrison in it, will become master of the elector's capital. Hildesheim is, undoubtedly, a part of the principality of Calenberg, of which Hanover, though now the capital, was formerly only the second town, Gottingen being the first. The elector, as prince of Calenberg, is patron of the city of Hildesheim, and maintained there a small detachment of foot. In the year 1519, just at the commencement of the reformation, the Bishop John having begun what was called the Hildesheim war, was not only stripped of the greater part of his territories, but put under the ban of the empire, and all but the cathedral itself with three bailiwicks, solemnly and legally conferred on the House of Brunswick, in whose possession the great bishoprick (as the conquered portion of the diocese was styled) continued for more than a century, when it was given up by a particular convention, not long before the peace of Westphalia; by which convention, the patronage, or guardianship of the city was reserved by the elector: so that, the "pretensions" (as Citizen Talleyrand has the insolence to term the claims of his Majesty) to this bishoprick are just as good as any man's pretensions can be to the lordship of a manor.

Wildhausen ceased to belong to the House of Oldenburg since the year 1270, between five and six centuries ago. It came then into the hands of the archbishops, afterwards the bishops, from whom it passed to the Dukes of Bremen. The Dukedom of Bremen was created out of the bishoprick to recompense Sweden for the heroic achievements of Gustavus Adolphus and his illustrious successors in the command.

As to what his Majesty receives in Osnaburgh, it would not, had he not already much the better half of its possession, nearly compensate, in point of value alone, for what he loses. But, it is the local situation of Hildesheim in particular, which is of importance in the present examination. The Electorate of Hanover bounded to the north east by the Prussian provinces of Alt-Marck, Magdeburgh, and Halberstadt; to the west by the Prussian provinces of Minden, Ravensperg, Pyrmont, and, having Hildesheim, with a Prussian garrison, in its very centre, while Osnaburgh is closely wedged up by the Prussian provinces of Westphalia and the bishoprick of Munster, which has also been seized on by Prussia. In order to complete the investiture of the states of Brunswick and Hanover, the King of Prussia has, towards the south, taken the country of Eisfeld, as his portion of the dismemberment of Mentz. If any doubt remained respecting the ultimate views of Prussia against Hanover, it must be removed in a moment, when we consider, that Osnaburgh, which is in itself of more value than Hildesheim, and is, besides, almost surrounded by the Prussian possessions in Westphalia, suited Prussia much better than Hildesheim, while Hildesheim suited the elector better than Osnaburgh. Had it been the intention of France and Prussia to stop here, the distribution would, therefore, have taken this turn; but, Prussian covetousness saw a prospect of seizing on Hanover itself, and Buonaparté gratified at once his interest and his malice, by holding in his hand the fate of the patrimonial possessions of the Royal Family of England, by the means of one of his humble vassals, with whom the Electorate of Hanover will, at any time, be a sufficient bribe, if fear should fail to produce the desired effect. It is absolutely impossible to contemplate the extent and situation of Hildesheim without anticipating the fall of the electorate. The bishoprick is larger than Hertfordshire or Surry, almost as large as Berkshire, and about the same size as Buckinghamshire. The city of Hildesheim is nearly the same distance from Hanover, as Epsom, or I may rather say, as it lies upon the same river, a mile or two farther than Kingston from London, and is situated, I believe, on a considerable hill. Now, my Lord, as you are a military man, suppose France, with a force double to what she now has, put in possession of Epsom, or Kingston, not as insulated spots, but connected with other territories lying behind either of those places; what would, in such a case, be the security of this metropolis? It would, my Lord, be in much greater danger than Paris was, when the Duke of Brunswick was on his march towards it, or even when your Lordship threatened to undertake a similar enterprise.—Such, nearly, will be the situation of the King of Prussia at Hildesheim with regard to Hanover, except that the disproportion of force will be against the electorate in a still greater degree. Thus then, the states of the House of Brunswick will belong to the King of Prussia, the moment the French stand in need of his aid to accomplish their projects against Austria or England.

I am aware, my Lord, that this prospect will be far from appearing gloomy to those zealous patriots, who think that the glory and liberty of their country consists in the humiliation of their sovereign; and, it must be confessed, that they will be most effectually relieved from the dread of seeing the Hanoverian troops in garrison at the Tower, which is, doubtless, a comforting reflection; but, my Lord, there is no such thing as perfect happiness in this world: if we have no longer to fear that the House of Hanover will enslave England by means of soldiers from the continent, we cannot but recollect, that Prussia and France are absolute masters of all the shores of Europe, from Memel to Venice, and that, in the whole distance, there is not a single port, where an English vessel will dare to be admitted contrary to the mandates of Buonaparté.—We shall, my Lord, soon see the time, when the suspicious, selfish, and stupid railers against continental connexions, will have cause to repent of their meanness and their folly, and will, when it is too late, perceive that the prosperity and happiness of themselves are inseparable from the interest, the honour, and the consequence of their sovereign; in the mean while, it may not be amiss to point out some of the means by which this most salutary conviction will be produced.

To get Bremen, as your lordship knows, was one great object of the German and English politics of George I., after his accession to the throne; but, my lord, it is much easier for your right worthy colleague to imitate Sir Robert Walpole in the disposal of the clerkship of the pells, than in the policy by which he at once preserved peace, and the dignity of the English name in Europe. Bremen and Hamburg are important places; because, by our influence, through Hanover, on them, and especially on Bremen, they are the surest, though not the most convenient inlets for our commerce into Germany, if by any pacific arrangements of the new confederacy we should be deprived of other better and more direct channels. In time of war, the Imperial cities were generally, though not always necessarily neutral. The Emperor could, by certain constitutional proceedings, compel them to be parties in the war, and this power was partially exercised, for a short time, in the year 1793. In future, they are to be always and necessarily neutral, for the purpose of conveying the property belonging to our enemies, or of supplying their necessities, at least more securely, if we should ever again be as completely triumphant as late we were upon the seas. These blows are, then, struck at the vital interest of England through the sides of Hanover. The Electorate is to be robbed and pillaged for the purpose of furnishing the means of injury to England. What has the pretence of indemnities to do with so great and unnecessary an innovation in the constitution of the Empire, as detaching from it, in all future wars, the College of Cities? Because, out of the eight which compose it, the two principal which have sea ports are liable, more or less, to the influence of England. The hostile mind and intention here, are not disguised; and it is a new and original aggression, not founded on any thing in the treaty of Luneville. The powers who confer this independence, will most probably guarantee it on their own terms.

It is clear, then, that no part of this arrangement is to be ascribed to a desire of injuring the Elector of Hanover, but to injure, affront, and insult Great-Britain, through the sides of that Elector and Electorate, and, probably to furnish the world with an illustration, which was very much wanted, of your lordship's "conciliation with firmness," which was to produce such happy consequences to the nation. The degree of respect, of weight and importance, which Great-Britain has secured by this "conciliation with firmness," is clearly ascertained by the indemnity to the Stadtholder, and by the mode of that indemnity. The Abbey of Corvey is given to the House of Nassau, to which house, in our treaty of peace, your lordship and your colleagues told us, that France would not allow the title of ORANGE; but to which in the convention negotiated with Prussia, (Register, p. 225) she has restored that title, in the act of plundering our king to indemnify that House. In the debate on the treaty of Amiens, it was urged by the opponents of the peace, that, coupling the clause which we had there inserted with Schimmelpenninck's private convention, signed the same hour, at the other end of the same table, the result might be, that we should indemnify the late Stadtholder. This was received as a point and turn of debate, and not as a serious interpretation; but it is now, in part, very seriously carried into effect. And will you and your colleagues, my lord, who procured that stipulation at Amiens, dare now to insist upon it, in opposition to the seizure of Corvey? or will you, by a pusillanimous silence, sanction such a shameful and iniquitous construction of it? The Stadtholder has, indeed, lost rank and dominion by the base desertion of England, but he is now most amply avenged, in beholding our disgrace, which, if our means are considered, is far greater than that of either Holland or Spain. The King of Sardinia, kneeling at the feet of the lowbred miscreant Joubert, did not present to the world a spectacle so shockingly degrading as England does at this moment: the unfortunate feeble-minded monarch, had the love of life as a plea for his conduct, while England has nothing to plead but her love of money, from which base and despicable motive she has voluntarily sacrificed both her allies and herself. For, my lord, be you well assured, that neither her past nor her future acts of baseness will purchase security to her self: a respite may be obtained, but the same hand, which has already reached the press, will finally dive into the Bank.

I am, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most humble,

And most obedient servant,

WM. COBBETT.

September 2, 1802.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Hamburg, Aug. 20.—On the arrival of M. le Comte de Panin, on the frontiers of Sweden, he received a positive order not to enter the kingdom; against which, however, he formally protested, as an indignity offered to a minister of his Imperial Majesty of Russia, and at the same time declared, that he would represent the circumstance to his court. In consequence of which he received the following letter from the Emperor.

Minsk, June 24.

"M. LE COMTE,

"I have learned, with extreme surprize, by your letter from Wibourg, the very extraordinary manner in which you have been treated in the dominions of his Swedish Majesty. I cannot imagine that that prince, can have any motive for personal dissatisfaction with respect to you, and it would be still more difficult to think that he has taken umbrage at any proceeding in the course of your mission, in which you have been only the organ of my will, and are responsible to me alone. However, be the motives of his Swedish Majesty what they may for such conduct, I have less displeasure at the proceeding itself, which cannot injure you, than at the state of embarrassment which it must necessarily place your family in. I remain, with assurances of my good will and esteem, &c.

(Signed)

"Alexander."

Berne Aug. 22.—The following representation has been addressed by the Lesser Cantons to the First Consul, on the subject of the evacuation of Helvetia.

"Citizen First Consul,

"The three Cantons of Uri, Schwitz, and Unterwald, have been apprised, by public report, of your resolution to withdraw the French troops from Switzerland. They see in such a measure the most convincing proofs of that good will which you have manifested towards the Landamman, Alays Reding, and for the undersigned, &c. The Cantons re-assembled at Schwitz, and by their deputies, have determined, in pursuance of the wishes of the people, to renew their former connexions, and to establish in their Cantons a government conformable to their position and to their circumstances; such as you, Citizen First Consul, have approved of, and is exemplified in the 9th and 10th articles of the note of the 20th December, which the Landamman Reding has had the honour of presenting to you.

"We should add, Citizen First Consul, that this resolution has been incited by the arbitrary measures of the Cantonal authorities, and principally carried into execution by the commissary Keller, in the Canton of Unterwald, proceedings which, by depriving the people of the power which they had formally reserved, of constituting their own government, have induced the greatest aversion against the central government, and to such a degree, that no way remains to maintain the public tranquillity in those countries, but by immediately restoring the people to the exercise of that legitimate right.

"We have the honour, Citizen First Consul, to communicate to you by these presents, the public declarations of the above-mentioned Cantons, in the conviction, that you are determined those brave people shall continue to experience your benevolent support, which they so highly estimate; and which none, Citizen First Consul, feel a juster sense of, &c. than the under signed."

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES.

His Majesty in Council, on the 16th of August, was pleased to order the Right Hon. the Lord High Chancellor, to issue writs for proroguing the Parliament, which was appointed to meet on Tuesday, the thirty-first day of this instant, August, to Tuesday the fifth day of October next; and also for proroguing the convocations of Canterbury and York, which were appointed to meet on Wednesday the first day of September next, to Wednesday the sixth day of October next.

Orders for the Court's going into mourning on Sunday the 29th ult. for his late Royal Highness, Prince Henry of Prussia, viz.—The Ladies to wear black silk, fringed or plain linen, white gloves, necklaces and ear-rings, black or white shoes, fans and tippets.—Undress, white or grey lutestrings, tabbies, or damasks.—The Gentlemen to wear black full-trimmed, fringed or plain linen, black swords and buckles.—Undress, grey frocks.

The Court to change the mourning on Sunday, the 5th of September inst. viz.—The ladies to wear black silk or velvet, coloured ribbons, fans, and tippets; or plain white, or white and gold, or white and silver stuffs, with black ribbons.—The Gentlemen to wear black coats, and black or plain white, or white and gold, or white and silver stuff waistcoats, full-trimmed coloured swords and buckles.

And on Thursday the 9th of September, the Court to go out of mourning.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

The dispute between the ministers and the assembly of Jamaica, on which we intended to make some further remarks, has been taken up by an abler pen: we, therefore, beg leave to refer our readers to p. 266, where they will find some observations well worthy of attention.

The comments, which we signified our intention to make on citizen Talleyrand's report, have assumed the form of a letter (vide p. 271.) addressed to Lord Hawkesbury, to whom, as he claimed the honour of making the peace, the nation will certainly impute a share, at least, of its consequences.

Some articles in the foreign journals seem to indicate the intention of the Emperor of Germany to resist the execution of the convention between France and Russia; but this intelligence is not well authenticated, and, indeed, resistance appears to be impossible.

The Swiss Cantons are still in a state of disorder and confusion, to put an end to which, a French army is on its march.—The new constitution of Genoa has received the sanction of Buonaparté.—The Italian republic is raising and embodying an army of sixty thousand men, which, of course, will be at the command of a president of that happy nation.

The attitude of all Europe is extremely hostile towards this country, yet not so hostile as contemptuous. The very smallest powers, nay states, which we never used to reckon as powers, seem to seek for opportunities of expressing their pleasure at our fallen estate. The Englishman who can now travel on the continent without shame must have a soul very little more lofty than that of a Jew. Mr. Fox, however, that "firm friend" of freedom, that idol of the whig club, is now at Paris, and, if the news-papers are to be believed, is living in great intimacy with Talleyrand. This visit may, perhaps, be productive of good: the contemplating of that "stupendous monument of human wisdom and human happiness," the government of France, may, at last, sober the mind of this enthusiastic patriot. The forbearance, too, which he will be compelled to practise, the habit of silence, the science de se taire, which he will not fail to acquire at Paris, may, probably, tend to preserve us from a repetition of his disgusting and insolent harangues. It is almost impossible to conceive a situation more degrading than that, in which this man has placed himself. He must detest and abhor the consul and government of France, or he must be the greatest hypocrite that ever dishonoured the human shape; yet he voluntarily crawls to the feet of that consul, bows his grey head to the earth before him, and gathers up the crumbs that fall from his table. This is the man, who, surrounded by his ignorant and drunken admirers at the whig-club, boasts of his right of cashiering kings. Let him take care how he talks of cashiering consuls, or Buonaparté, who is extremely quick-sighted, may yet chance to find out a way of rewarding him for his audacious attacks on his native sovereign. This caution is, however, totally unnecessary; he will take care; he will smile and fawn, not only on Buonaparté, but on his underlings. He will be altogether as supple and submissive in France as he is stiff and turbulent in England. It is in the nature of men of his description to be either excessively insolent, or excessively mean; to be the tyrants of the humble and the weak, and the slaves of the haughty, the resolute, and the strong.

The circulation of the English newspapers is stopped at Paris after they are become perfectly harmless. The threat to prosecute Mr. Peltier (which is, for the present, suspended) has humbled the tone of the heroes of the quill. Their attacks have, as we foretold they would, dwindled into puns and fables, of the wit of which Buonaparté will certainly not be afraid. The French journalists, seeing them down, have fallen upon them without mercy, and, which is truly curious, they, who very probably are regicides, accuse the English journalists of having slandered the French monarchy!

We have before declared it as our decided opinion, that the destruction of what is called the liberty of the press would be a good act, by whomsoever it might be performed. If any man of sound sense and sound principles be (which we can hardly believe) inclined to dissent from this opinion, let him read the following article, which, with little or no alteration, has appeared in all the London newspapers, on and since the 28th ultimo.

"The complaint of the French official journal on the subject of the countenance given to criminals in the island of Jersey has attracted much attention. We are informed that even previous to the splenetic article in the Moniteur, M. Otto had addressed communications to this government on the subject. M. Otto specified nine individuals as charged with assassinations and other crimes in France, nay, with actually having offered money to induce men to undertake something against the life of the First Consul. It is said that these persons or some of them, had formerly been employed as agents by the prince de Bouillon, our commander at Jersey during the war, A CIRCUMSTANCE TO WHICH NO BLAME ATTACHES, AND IT IS NOT EVEN PRETENDED THAT THEY HAD ANY COUNTENANCE IN THEIR DESIGNS SINCE THE PEACE. In consequence of M. Otto's representation, however, government sent orders to Jersey to make the strictest inquiry after the persons named, and four of them have been arrested, and have been brought to Southampton to be delivered up. The other five are supposed to have gone to the coast of France, and there is not a doubt that they will not be permitted to return to Jersey. In addition to those specified under the treaty of Amiens, seventeen persons, Chouans or emigrants, have been brought from Jersey to Southampton, in order to be sent out of the kingdom as aliens. Nineteen still remain, it is said, who are likewise to be brought to England. It is to be observed, that none but the nine persons named as guilty of specific crimes, were demanded, and that the steps taken against the others have been voluntary.

Such being the case, it is clear that the official invectives of the Moniteur were injurious and libellous to this country. Ministers have done every thing that depended upon them to remove, not only the cause, but the pretext of complaint. We wish they had not by the mean and unmanly alien act given any indirect opportunity for the interference of the French government to require the banishment of every foreigner they choose to suspect, or even to blame—Ministers having taken upon themselves the discretion of sending foreigners out of the country, must be in a very awkward situation when the French government applies to get any obnoxious man, not specifically accused of crimes under the treaty of Amiens, removed. Ministers are obliged to act on the merits of each case, and to argue with caprice or ill humour in rejecting their demands, should they occur, as they probably will, when they might have stated that the laws of England gave common protection to all foreigners against whom specific crimes were not alleged. Their protection of persons whom the French government chooses to suspect, and whom it cannot accuse, may thus be a source of ill humour. We point out this disagreeable consequence of the alien act in general; and this is a different thing from the limited and specified conditions of surrender of criminals stipulated by treaty.

At the same time it seems fair to admit " that ministers are taking every proper measure to silence the angry and captious spirit of complaint in the French government, where—

 " ever it could have any plausible foundation THIS CONDUCT MUST BE APPLAUD—" ED BY THE COUNTRY."

This article is, perhaps, the most striking example that ever was exhibited of the evil tendency of what has been dignified with the appellations of " the palladium of free—men," and the " birth right of Britons." A writing, at once more false in point of fact, more base in principle, more detestably wicked as to its inevitable object and tendency, never obtained circulation in the world, and, it is but justice to say, that it originated in the Morning Chronicle.

As to the fact, it is, we believe, certain, that M. Otto did address communications to his Majesty's ministers, requesting that certain persons, offensive to Buonaparté, might be apprehended and sent out of the kingdom, or, perhaps, delivered up to him, as coming within the stipulations of the 20th article of the treaty of Amiens; but no persons have been either confined or taken up, in consequence of that application. The truth is this: there were several royalist officers in the island of Jersey, who had come thither from France, some of them, probably, since the conclusion of the peace. Buonaparté was uneasy at the near neighbourhood of these gallant gentlemen, who had braved death in ten thousand shapes for the sake of their lawful sovereign; and, indeed, it would be uncandid to blame the fears of the consul, who sleeps not upon a bed of roses, and who must be excused for having the feelings inseparable from his situation. When we recollect that the hero of Drogheda lived in continual alarm, wore armour under his clothes by day, and shifted his lodgings every night, for the last five years of his life, we ought to be by no means astonished at the apprehensions of the hero of Alexandria. The ministers, willing to remove the cause of his dread, without violating the laws of the land, or the no less sacred laws of hospitality and of honour, sent to Jersey and prevailed upon twenty-six of the persons in question to remove themselves to England, which they readily agreed to. These gentlemen arrived at Southampton on the 20th ultimo, and are now in this country; but not one of them is, or ever was for a moment, in confinement; and as to its being the intention of ministers to deliver them, or any one of them, up to Buonaparté, it is an assertion infinitely more libellous than any thing published against them in the Moniteur: they were there accused of hiring assassins to kill Buonaparté, but here they are accused of meditating the commission of a crime, too cruel and too infamous to be described, a crime of a dye much deeper than that of cutting the throat of an infant after having rocked it to sleep: and, it is upon the supposition, that they were about to commit this crime, that the "infernal machine" (we mean the London press) calls upon the country, before hand, to "applaud their conduct!"

Of all the subjects we ever attempted to discuss, this is, in our estimation, by far the most interesting, as it immediately affects the tranquillity, the security, and even the lives of a band of the bravest, most loyal, and most faithful men that the world ever saw. We shall, therefore, resume it in our next, assuring our readers, in the mean time, that his Majesty's ministers have no intention to deliver these gentlemen, or any of them, up to Buonaparté; and if they had such an intention, we have no hesitation to say, that they could not do it without a total subversion of the laws of the land, without a complete annihilation of the authority of the courts of justice, and, of course, without putting the life of every man in the kingdom, whether native or foreigner, in jeopardy.

The situation of Mr. Peltier's affair is this: on the 28th of August, Mr. White, solicitor to the Treasury, sent a notification to De Boffe, the publisher of L'Ambigu, informing him, that he had the orders of the Attorney-General to prosecute the authors, printers, and publishers of the said work, and that, he submitted to Mr. De Boffe, whether, after this notification, it would be prudent in him to continue the sale of the offensive work. De Boffe, who is a Swiss, instantly stopped the sale at his house, and sent the prohibited ware home to the proprietor. Nothing further has yet been done; and, if Mr. Peltier refrains from attacks on Buonaparté, nothing we hope will be done. If our advice be of any weight with him, it is that he should so refrain. After ten years labour in the cause of monarchy against the infernal republicans, it would be very hard to be thrown into Newgate for the rest of his life. Besides, we doubt of the policy of attacking Buonaparté for his present acts in France. We think it somewhat inconsistent, that Mr. Peltier should at all unite with the republican journalists of London, the principal ground of whose hatred to Buonaparté, is, that he has blasted, for ever and ever, the hopes of themselves and their rebellious supporters—As Englishmen, we would resist, we would attack Buonaparté, with fleets and with armies; and, were we Frenchmen, we would not attack him with a pen.

LONDON,

Definitive Treaty of Peace between the French Republic and the Sublime Ottoman Porte.

The First Consul of the French Republic, in the name of the French people, and the Sublime Ottoman Emperor, being desirous to restore the relations of peace and amity which have of old subsisted between France and the Sublime Porte, have for that purpose appointed Ministers Plenipotentiaries, viz. the First Consul, in the name of the French people, Citizen C. M. Talleyrand, Minister for Foreign Affairs to the French Republic; and the Sublime Ottoman Porte, Esseid Mahomed Said Ghalib Effendi, Private Secretary and Director of Foreign Affairs; who, after exchanging their full powers, have agreed to the following articles:

Art. I. There shall hereafter be peace and friendship between the French Republic and the Sublime Ottoman Porte: hostilities shall for the future, and for ever, cease between the two states.

II. The treaties or capitulations which, before the war, defined the respective relations of every kind, existing between the two powers, shall be renewed in all their particulars.

In consequence of this renewal, and in fulfilment of the ancient capitulation, according to which the French have a right to enjoy, in the states of the Sublime Porte, all the advantages granted to other nations, the Sublime Porte consents that the French merchant ships bearing the French flag, shall for the future possess the undisputed right to navigate and pass freely in the Black Sea. The Sublime Porte likewise consents, that the said French merchant ships, on their passage into and out of this sea, shall, with respect to every thing that can favour the free navigation of it, be placed precisely on the same footing with the merchant ships of those nations which now navigate it.

The Sublime Porte and the Government of the French Republic, will with common consent take vigorous measures to cleanse the seas, which the ships of both states navigate, from all kinds of pirates.

The Sublime Porte promises to protect the French trading-ships in the Black Sea against all kinds of pirates.

It is hereby understood, that the advantages secured by the present article to the French in the Ottoman Empire, shall in like manner extend to the subjects and flag of the Sublime Porte in the seas and territory of the French Republic.

III. The French Republic shall, in the Ottoman countries which lie on, or in the vicinity of, the Black Sea, both with respect to their trade and the agents and commissaries which that trade may render it necessary to appoint in such places, enjoy the same rights and privileges which France, before the war, enjoyed by virtue of the old capitulations, in any other parts of the states of the Sublime Porte.

IV. The Sublime Porte assents to all that was stipulated with respect to it in the treaty concluded at Amiens between France and England, on the 4th Germinal of the year ten (25th of March, 1801), or the 22d of Zillides, of the year of the Hegira 1216. All the articles of this treaty, which have relation to the Sublime Porte, are by the present treaty formally renewed.

V. The French Republic and the Sublime Porte mutually guarantee the integrity of their possessions.

VI. The restorations and indemnifications which are due to the agents of the two powers, or to their citizens and subjects, whose effects have been confiscated or sequestrated during the war, shall be regulated in an equitable manner, by a particular agreement to be concluded between the two governments at Constantinople.

VII. Until by common consent new regulations shall be agreed on, with respect to the tolls or customs on which disputes may have arisen, these shall in both countries continue to be regulated by the old capitulations.

VIII. Should any prisoners be found in the two countries, who are detained in consequence of the war, they shall immediately be set at liberty, without ransom.

IX. As the French Republic and the Sublime Porte, by the present treaty, wish to place their states reciprocally in the situation of the most favoured powers, it is expressly understood that each state grants to the other, all the advantages which have been or shall be granted to any other powers, in the same manner as if they were expressly stipulated in the present treaty.

X. The ratifications of the present treaty shall be exchanged within eighty days, or sooner if possible, at Paris.

Done at Paris, the 6th of Messidor, of the year ten (June 25, 1802, or the 24th of Safernair, the year of the Hegira 1217.

(Signed) Ch. Mau. Talleyrand.

Essaid Mohamed Said Ghalib Effendi.

Buonaparté, First Consul of the French Republic, President of the Italian Republic, to the Senate of the Ligurian Republic, July 30, 1802.

"Citizens Senators of the Ligurian Republic—The interest with which your nation inspires the French people, and the particular confidence which they do not cease to repose in me, render it my duty to contribute, as much as possible, to consolidate your tranquillity, and secure your independence and prosperity.

"Genoa and its shores have been the theatre of a bloody war. I am pleased to recognize, that in the midst of the most terrible vicissitudes you have been faithful to, and made a common cause with, the great people. You have destroyed Oligarchy, which inspired different sentiments, and those factions which troubled your repose, compromised your credit, and placed your liberty in danger. Great powers may, perhaps, preserve resentment at your conduct, but the French people always considered your cause as their own. A constitution founded on equality, that first of benefits, consolidates your existence, whilst great provinces render compact and increase your territory.

"Let what you have suffered be forgotten. Recollect what your fathers endured for the purpose of acquiring some miserable districts. Proscribe all factions, maintain and preserve a respect for your constitution and your religion, and educate your children in a love for the great people. Then your wretched galleys shall be replaced by good ships of war, which will protect your commerce in the Levant, the countries of which are yet full of the remembrance of your ancestors.

"Citizens Senators of the Ligurian Republic, tell your fellow-citizens, that in appointing the citizen who is to be the first occupant of the place of Doge, I have only acceded to their wish, and that under present circumstances, it is the greatest mark of attention I can bestow upon them.

"Tell them to recollect, that whatever adds to their happiness, will to me be a subject of joy and satisfaction, as their misfortunes will cause my regret.

(Signed) "Buonaparté."

Proclamation of the Bishop of Passau.

"On the 10th, two columns of Bavaro Palatine troops, infantry and cavalry, entered the territories of this bishopric on each side the Danube, without making the accustomed requisitions, without any species of notification: a part of these troops proceeded against the capital; some pieces of artillery, accompanied by the necessary number of gunners, with matches in their hands, were sent against the gates, so that the fear of seeing the city occupied by violent means, became greater every instant. Such events are so extraordinary and alarming, that his highness would have thought himself wanting in his duties as sovereign, and as a state of the empire, had he neglected to inform his Imperial Majesty, in his quality of supreme chief of the empire, and to entreat him to protect his country against all foreign violence: a protection to which the contents of the last imperial decree of the 22d of July, gave him a new title.

"As the general commanding at Scharding has received from his superiors the order to grant that protection to the bishopric, as in consequence, a proper number of imperial troops under his orders is to occupy the capital and the county on the 17th inst. as the most solemn assurance has been given that not the slightest change nor alteration should be made in the administration, the constitution, nor in any of its relations whatever, his highness has thought it proper to inform the public of these dispositions, to exhort paternally his faithful subjects to remain tranquil, to abstain carefully from speeches which relate to politics, and to wait with the tranquillity that becomes wise and good subjects, the termination of the great affair upon which the deputation of the empire is about to occupy itself, and by which the fate of this capital and of the country will be decided in a constitutional manner.

"By conforming strictly to these exhortations, each will avoid all disagreeable effects."

Passau, 17th August.

Page 7. Art. VI. The port of the Cape of Good Hope remains to the Batavian Republic in full sovereignty, as it did previous to the war.

"When (says Mr. B.) will vanity and presumption submit to learn lessons of moderation and discretion? Those, who have exclaimed so vehemently in this and other instances against the stipulations of the present treaty, seem to have taken for granted that England had it in her power to dictate the terms of it: an extravagant and ridiculous supposition!" —In truth so very extravagant and ridiculous, that not a single person of the many, who condemned the treaty, ever uttered an expression on which Mr. B. or rather any reasonable man, could imagine that such a supposition was ever entertained. But they did entertain and avowed another supposition, namely, that by continuing the war we might have avoided the disgrace and (which touches more nearly the public sensibility) the danger of submitting to terms, which have left France in a far better and Britain in a far worse situation than they were at the time of signing the preliminaries.

"The fact is (continues Mr. B. page 8) that we had no option but to relinquish the Cape or to continue the war." This may or may not be true. But admit that the restitution of the Cape was a sine qua non of the peace; was every other of the many restitutions we made so many *sine qua non*s? or, because it might not be prudent to continue the war for the Cape alone, does it follow that the Cape joined with Malta, Minorca, Martinico, &c. &c. &c. were not worth a longer struggle? Of the value of this long and melancholy list of restitutions Mr. B. has taken no notice; yet it was easy for him to account for these in the same peremptory manner, by telling us —"that we had no option but to relinquish them too, or to continue the war." Mr. B. further observes, that "as by this article the Cape is virtually declared to be a free port, the advantage is wisely secured, unincumbered by the attendant expense." —This advantage in time of peace is little or none to Great-Britain, as our navigators now know that they save time by either going to Rio de Janeiro, or running down directly southwards, and never making the Cape. The advantage in time of war must be calculated upon the probability of the Dutch Provinces remaining neutral and independent of France: and whoever recollects that France can over-run those provinces, with as little opposition and in as little time as a regiment could march from London to Oxford, must estimate that probability at just nothing.

Page 9. Upon the cession of Portuguese Guinea with the free navigation of the River of Amazons, obtained by France by a treaty signed at Madrid, within two days of the signing the preliminaries at London, Mr. B. observes, "England had no express or exclusive authority to treat for Portugal." But although Portugal might not perhaps have given such express authority, and might therefore have fairly objected to any stipulations made on her behalf by England, yet France could not honestly make this objection; for Buonaparté's signature was an acknowledgment on his part, that England had sufficient authority, and was from the date of the signature a virtual, although by reason of the distance it could not be an official cancelment of the powers given to his minister in Spain. It was therefore unfair in him to insist on any articles contained in the treaty of Madrid, and dishonourable in our government to acquiesce in it.

Mr. B. adds, "if Portugal thought proper, for whatever reason, to relinquish any part of her territory, France might with great plausibility urge, that England had no right to interfere in order to prevent it." In moral or legal discussion plausibility commonly signifies the appearance, in opposition to the reality of reason and justice; and in this sense of the word Mr. B. has very properly applied it to the argument which he suggests for excluding England from interfering in any acquisitions which France has or may hereafter make. "England had no right to interfere in order to prevent it!" And pray why not? In what chapter of national law or common sense has Mr. B. discovered that a nation has no right to interfere in preventing other powers from making acquisitions or cessions which may end in its speedy ruin? If France were to acquire, by the most formal treaty that was ever ratified, the Port of Alexandria, or Lisbon, or the Passage of the Sound, although England might in her present peace-loving temper submit in spiritless silence, yet no man in his senses would maintain that any law of God or man forbade her to resist. The two obvious principles of justice and government, "Contracts bind the contracting parties only;" and "Salus populi suprema lex;"—Mr B., professing to be an historian and a politician, ought not to forget.

Page 10. "Happily however a compromise was at last found; and the French government had the laudable moderation ultimately to recede from this alarming claim, and to consent that the most northern branch of the Arivari should be the boundary of her dominion in that part of the globe."—Having shewn that Buonaparté had no just claim to any thing by the treaty of Madrid, I cannot admire his moderation for being contented with a part. Whether the navigation of the River Amazons can or can not be impeded from the northern branch of the Arivari, is the point of importance; and this point, "the bare inspection of a map" (to use Mr. B.'s words) is by no means sufficient to decide. For of the navigation of coasts and rivers little is to be learnt from maps: sea charts and explanations from professional persons, who have used them, afford the only satisfactory information; and such information is not always to be had; at least, Mr. B. does not seem to have obtained it. If the rough draft of the coast given in one of your former Registers (Vol. I. p. 428) may be depended upon, the French have the means of becoming very troublesome neighbours to the Portuguese. Be this as it may; Portugal we are told (page 11) "expressed its high sense of obligation to the British government for this essential service."—This may induce us to hope the best. But although Portugal may be thankful for having regained a part of what had been extorted from her by the treaty of Madrid, it will be difficult to persuade us that she would not have been far better satisfied with the whole.

TO THE EDITOR.

A short View of Affairs in Germany.

The events of the last war upon the continent prove sufficiently that Francis the Second was Emperor of Germany by name only. By the means of Buonaparté and his accomplices on one hand, and by the exhausting of Austria and the dereliction in which she is on the other, the title of emperor, which his great feudatories (now evidently revolted against and dictating laws to him) will still give him, will appear no more than a mere mockery. Prussia has followed up her system of fishing in troubled water, to aggrandize herself without any other motive than her usual rapacity, and, as it should seem, purely as a sort of indemnity for the loss of reputation. Buonaparté has availed himself of the opportunity to weaken still more and more the only power which, if supported, might yet bear up against him on the Continent, and to place "by aggrandizing Prussia, this necessary counterpoise (for himself) in the scale," so that the least addition, a single word from the Grand Consul, may make it incline in favour of France, to whom every people must henceforward bow the knee, whilst she herself is in fetters.

But the Emperor Alexander, to whom upon his accession every one had turned his eyes, as to the preserver of the social order and liberties of Europe, seems to have been guided throughout the whole of it merely by a momentary interest of relationship, to procure advantages to his brothers-in-law and his uncle. Let us hope he will confine himself to this, and think himself sufficiently bound to France not to expect other compliances from her; or to speak more correctly, that France, from a far different motive from that of gratitude, will not herself offer him indemnities too, for which sooner or later England would have to pay the charges. But this belongs to futurity; we will confine ourselves to the present, or if you will, to the past; for the First Consul will not allow us to call in question the strict execution of his Senatus Consultum respecting his department of Germany. In that unfortunate country of innocent victims, and of conquerors who will become victims in their turn, one stroke from Talleyrand's pen has changed every thing: we will here delineate only the principal features of the picture.

The immediate nobility, which from the protection it could hope for only from Austria, was devoted to her, is properly subjected under the more aggrandized princes: the petty princes are in the same case with the nobility. The catholic chapters, electoral, archiepiscopal, episcopal, abbeys, convents, all by their interests attached to Austria are destroyed; the free imperial cities which had the like interest, are delivered over to indemnified sovereigns; the few remaining are, as it may be said, separated from the Germanic body, but to a certainty emancipated from the imperial authority by fixing their neutrality in every war, a neutrality which will be respected by France as that of Frankfort and of Ham-burgh have been under Prussian protection, and as that of Switzerland, Tuscany, &c.

The Electoral College, which before the dismemberment of Germany had enough with eight electors, is to have nine, viz.

1st. A catholic ecclesiastic elector sur-rounded by the partizans of Prussia 2dly The Elector of Bohemia, that is to say, Austria herself.

3dly The Elector of Bavaria, a catholic himself, and ruling over subjects almost all of the same persuasion, but devoted to France and Prussia, cherishing an old grudge against Austria, and augmenting his hatred against her proportionably to the grievances that he has caused her, and from the revenge he fears from thence.

4thly. The Elector of Saxony, a catholic himself only, but sovereign over a protes-tant country, a protector by his oath of the protestant religion and moreover entirely surround ed at this time by Prussia.

5thly. The Elector of Brandenburg, that is, Prussia; protestant.

6thly. The Elector of Hanover, protes-tant; seldom of the same sentiment with the King of England, and acting mostly in concert with Prussia, and besides, now under the absolute command of a Prussian garrison.

7thly. The Elector of Hesse-Cassel, pro-tes-tant, and both by inclination and locality a vassal of Prussia.

8thly The Elector of Wurtemburgh, a protestant, and neighbour to France.

9thly. The Elector of Baden, protestant; in the neighbourhood of France, and more-over rewarded by the esteem of the First Con-sul, and the largest prize of this lottery for having, one of the first, detached himself from the cause of Germany. Of these three new ones of consular creation, two are doubtless to compensate for the two eccle-siastic electors politically put to death though physically still alive, viz. the Elector of Treves, uncle to the Elector of Saxony, a respectable old man in every point of view, and particularly for his fidelity in the common cause, as a return for which he is entirely despoiled, and the Archduke An-thony, brother to the Emperor, legally chosen elector by the electoral chapter of Ahrensberg, and bishop by the episcopal chapter of Munster, instead of his late uncle. The ninth elector has been created over and above to insure still better the protestant majority.

It will appear very plain by this exact exposition, that Austria has in reality for herself not more than one vote, her own; if she has more it will be only to paralyze her, or, as on this last occasion, to make her bear the expense of her protection; it is only too, through similar considerations, that the imperial crown, elective in reality, grew in some sort hereditary in the house of Austria. The voice of the catholic part of the German people, if it could be reckoned on, is completely stifled.

Let us take a view now in what manner Austria is to be made amends for her losses in territory and influence in Germany? What will the Emperor receive in compen-sation for his possessions in the Low Coun-tries and Lombardy, and the debts on these countries which he remains burthened with? For the Brisgau, the Frikthal, and what he had in Germany? For the security arising to him from the neutrality of Switzerland and of the Grisons, and the inoffensive ex-istence of the Venetian Republic, the Duke of Parma, and the King of Sardinia; for that of the Archbishop and Bishop of Saltz-burg and Passau, who as ecclesiastics were entirely at his devotion, and might have been considered as parts of his own possessions, whilst the Elector of Bavaria is now at the cost of these two states aggrandized, and brought closer to Austria? What will the em-peror, I say, receive for all this? The little share of the Venetian States that he pos-sesses, and, as Talleyrand says, the immense advantage of seeing all his possessions concen-trated, that is to say, immensely diminished. Doubtless, Buonaparté, with like complai-sance, will endeavour, if let alone, to con-centrate by degrees Great-Britain in the same way, and to save her the trouble of thinking of her colonies. How has the family of the Emperor, in which only he can find adherents, been treated? The Archduke Ferdinand, his uncle, heir to Mo-dena, will have the Brisgau, which he will doubtless do well to dispose of to the Mar-grave of Baden for the three millions of florins, which that prince offers for it: this will be at least a security for the future.

The Grand Duke of Tuscany, his brother, will be compensated for that fine country, by the rocks of Saltzbourg and Passau with the exception however of what is given of it to Bavaria; and for what accrued to him from the trade of Leghorn, by the revenue of the poor little bishoprics of Trente and Brixen enclosed in the Tyrolese, an Aus-trian province. The Emperor besides, as chief of his house, in recurring to the history of times past, and recollecting what has happened since his accession, and what kings have to expect from their relatives; and not being able to depend on the tenderness and devotion of the descendants of the Grand Duke towards his own as he can depend upon the sentiments of his brother, will find perhaps one reason still more to regret for his posterity the neighbourhood of these two prelates.

The interior situation of Austria, her means and resources, the degree in which her misfortunes, her treaties, and the desertion of her natural allies, have compelled her to engage in these transactions, should be considered, in order to conjecture what would happen were she to resign herself through the pressure of circumstances, not to oppose by open force the execution of Buonaparté's will, but confine herself not to give sanction to it by her adhesion, nor even to draw any apparent advantage from it, but, maintaining the bishops of Saltzbourg and Passau in their possessions, and laying down the imperial crown, the conditions under which she accepted it ten years ago now no more existing; or if she would separate herself totally from the German empire.

Would not a resolution like this raise again the hopes of the plundered, would it not scatter uncertainty among the spoilers, and would her adversaries declare war against Austria because she renounced the first rank among sovereigns, or because she would not concur in the spoliation of her friends?

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

August 23.

ARMY OF ST. DOMINGO.

Extract from the Official Gazette of Saint Domingo.

In the name of the French Government.
The General in Chief, Captain General, decrees as follows:

"In the French part of St. Domingo, the Administration of the quarters and communes is confided to military commandants and councils of notables. The commandants to have the jurisdiction of police in their respective districts, and the chief command of the Gendarmerie. The councils of notables to be composed of proprietors or merchants, and to consist of five members, in the towns of Port Republicain, the Cape, and des Cayes, and of three members in other communes. The members to be appointed by the Colonial Prefect; and every one so appointed to be compelled to accept the office. The military commandants are charged with the delivery (gratis) of passports for travelling in the Colony, the suppression of vagabondage, the care of the police, the maintenance of cleanliness and health, the care of citizens newly arrived, the police of the prisons, and the verification of weights and measures, in concurrence with the council of notables. Except in the case of flagrant crimes, the military commandants cannot arrest any citizen without an order from the commandant of the quarter. The communes to provide for their own expenses; the sums to be regulated by a decree of the General in Chief, with the advice of the Colonial Prefect. No military commandant can put in requisition the labourers or the cattle of any plantation; the General in Chief reserves that power to himself. The council of notables to provide for the expenses of the communes, and for the imposts adopted by the Commander in Chief, with the advice of the Colonial Prefect. Those councils alone to deliberate upon the communal interests; all other Assemblies of citizens are prohibited, and shall, if attempted, be considered as seditious, and dispersed by force. The councils to correspond immediately with the Sub-Prefect, by whom their members may be suspended, and finally dismissed by the Colonial Prefect. There shall be in each parish a commissary to register public acts.

(Signed) "Leclerc."

An account is given of the vessels, French, English, and Spanish, which had entered the Bay of the Cape between the 14th and the 27th of June, in number 22, and of those which had quitted the port in the same time, in number 29.

COMMERCE OF ST. DOMINGO.

By another decree of the General in Chief,

"French merchant vessels are to be admitted only in the ports of the Cape, Port Republicain, des Cayes and de Jacmel. Merchandize or produce of the manufactures or soil of France not to be subject to any duty on importation. Colonial produce, exported by French vessels, to be subject to a duty on exportation.

"Foreign vessels of the burden of 70 tons, and upwards, are permitted to enter the above four ports. French or foreign merchandize imported in them to be subject to a duty on importation, conformable to tariff. The produce of the colony exported by them to be subject to a duty on exportation.

"Every Captain of a French or foreign vessel, must, on his arrival in port, before any person on board lands, present himself before the Captain General and the Colonial Prefect, at the place of their residence, and in other ports to the General Commandant and the Chief of Administration, for the purpose of giving an account of his voyage. The Captain shall transmit on the same day, to the Commandant of the place, a declaration, written and signed, containing an account of the passengers he has on board: no passenger to disembark without the authority of the Commandant.

"The Captain must, on the day of his arrival, remit the letters and packets in his charge, to the director of the post at the port, and shall receive discharge.

"The Captains of French and foreign vessels must within a day after their arrival, transmit to the directors of the harbours, the bill of lading of their cargoes. All merchandize found on board, which is not included in the bill of lading, will be confiscated.

"Every Captain of a foreign vessel must consign his cargo to a domiciliated merchant, who shall be personally responsible for the payment of the duties on importation and exportation, and for the frauds which may be committed by the Captains of the vessels consigned to him.

"No French or foreign vessel shall be suffered to quit the ports, but on producing to the Captain of the port the certificate of the director of the Customs, stating that all the duties have been paid.

"Every French or foreign vessel which shall be found in any of the ports, not designated in the decree, or sailing within two leagues of the coast, shall be taken possession of by the Guard-vessels, and conducted into one of the designated ports, in order that the confiscation of the vessel and cargo may be adjudged by the Captain-General, on the report of the Colonial Prefect. The vessel making such capture, to be entitled to one-third of the value of the vessel and cargo confiscated."

Tariff of Customs in the French Part of St. Domingo.

IMPORTATION.

"French merchandize and produce in foreign vessels, 10 per cent. on the value.

"Meal, biscuits, salt, provisions, wood for carpenters and buildings, cattle and sheep, horses, mules, poultry, &c. ditto, 6 per cent. ditto.

"Foreign merchandize, ditto, 20 per cent. ditto."

EXPORTATION.

The following are the most material articles:

"Coffee in foreign vessels, 13 francs, 33 cents. per quintal.

"White sugar, ditto, ditto, ditto.

"Brown ditto, 6 f. 67 c. ditto.

"Cotton ditto, 30 f. — ditto.

"Indigo ditto, 80 c. per lb.

"Produce not enumerated, 20 per cent. on the value.

"French manufactures in foreign vessels exempt from duty."

Paris, Aug. 31.—The affairs of Germany are on the point of being terminated. France, Russia, Austria, Prussia, and Bavaria, are agreed. Prussia has taken possession of the states granted to her by the plan of the two great mediating powers. Austria has taken possession of Saltzburgh, Berchtholfgaden, Brixen, and Trent, which are also granted to her by the same plan. Her troops were at Passau before that court had adopted the said plan; but the imperial minister has declared, that it took possession of it only to maintain the rights of the Bishop of Passau, until the period in which the mediating powers of the deputation of the empire should decide.

The Publiciste has published pretended letters from a Swiss canton to the First Consul. The French Government acknowledges but one government in the Helvetic Republic. A portion of that people could not write to him without being in rebellion against its own government.—Moniteur.

Sept. 2.—General St. Cyr, the French Ambassador to Spain, is on his return to Paris for three months, to re-establish his health.

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES.

On the 31st of August, Their Majesties and the Princesses arrived at Windsor from Weymouth, on Tuesday evening, in perfect health.

On the 8th inst. his Majesty set off from Windsor at seven o'clock. After passing the morning at Kew Palace and in the gardens, he came to town, and held a Levee at St. James's Palace, which being the first court-day since his Majesty's return from Weymouth, was numerously attended.

The following Noblemen and Gentlemen took leave of the King: Lord Whitworth, on going to Paris, as Ambassador to France; Mr. Arbuthnot and Mr. L. Burrell, on their mission to Stockholm; Admiral Sir J. B. Warren, as Ambassador to the Court of Russia; he takes his departure in the Clyde frigate.

After the company had withdrawn, the Recorder made his report of the convicts under sentence of death, convicted in June and July sessions, when his Majesty was graciously pleased to respite them all.

The King, after giving audience to the Ministers, left town at six o'clock for Windsor.

On Thursday last, Mr. Arbuthnot, accompanied by Mr. Lindsay Burrell, as his Secretary, set off for Yarmouth, where they are to embark for Stockholm. Mrs. Arbuthnot and children set off the preceding day for Stockholm.

Madame Lasnes, accompanied by General Fraser and his Aid-de-Camp, and by Monsieur Subervie, Aid-de-Camp to General Lasnes, arrived in town from Falmouth on Wednesday last.

Sir John Borlase Warren will set off for St. Petersburg in a very few days.

Lord Whitworth will not depart for Paris till Mr. Andreossi arrives at Dover, which is not expected to be sooner than ten or twelve days from this time.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

At the close of our last sheet, we promised to resume our discussion of the subject relative to the French royalists, commonly called Chouans. We quoted, on that occasion, a passage from the London newspapers (for it was, with some very trifling alterations, inserted in them all), the substance of which was this:—That, upon the application of Mr. Otto, ministers had brought several Chouans from Jersey to Southampton; that some of these persons had not been in France since the conclusion of the definitive treaty, and others had been there and were accused of having, since the signing of the treaty, committed some of the crimes therein mentioned; that ministers were, on the demand of Buonaparté, about to send the former out of the country by authority of the Alien Act, and to deliver up the latter by authority of the treaty; and that these pacific and conciliatory steps and intentions ought to be "APPLAUDED BY THE COUNTRY."

We stated, that the facts, upon which these enlightened, humane, and honourable politicians proceeded, were extremely incorrect; we observed, and we now repeat our observation, that, while we believed Mr. Otto to have applied for the proscription of some of the royalists at Jersey, and for the surrender of others of them, we were certain, that it was not the intention of his Majesty's ministers to yield to either of his requests. We further observed, that (perhaps with a view to hush the fears of the Grand Homme) several of the royalists had removed from the Island of Jersey to England; but that not a man of them was, or ever would, at the request of Buonaparté, be deprived of that freedom, which, in this country, no man, whether foreigner or native, can lose, unless he commit some crime against the law of England.

Such was the amount of our statement, and such was really the case. But, we do not think it sufficient to have corrected the errors as to the past. It was our first duty to remove the alarm, which must have been excited by the report that ministers were about to commit a deed so lawless and so base as that of banishing or delivering up the French royalists; and, we shall now endeavour to do away the anxiety, which may yet be entertained, on account of those gentlemen, in case some future attempt should be made against them, by the Consul or his agents.

The terror, which Buonaparté has struck to the hearts of the people of this country, seems to have produced a total forgetfulness of the great maxims of our government and jurisprudence. Formerly, when a man was threatened with an arrest, with confinement, or with any other thing contrary to his interest or his will, he immediately appealed to the law. He did not ask what was the situation of this country with respect to any other country, or what was the character or policy of the ministers: his first and only question was, "what says the LAW of England?" If that was in his favour, he set malice and power at defiance. Now, unhappily, our inquiries, if Buonaparté be the prosecutor, are of a very different nature. If, however, the "blessings of peace" have not in reality, as well as in the imagination of the London newspaper-writers, produced a complete and radical subversion of that part of our law, which has hitherto operated as a safe-guard to the persons of the innocent, we presume, that the following positions may be easily maintained: 1. That his Majesty's ministers cannot send the royalists, of whom we are speaking, out of this country; 2. That no one of these royalists can ever be delivered up for a crime committed before the conclusion of the definitive treaty; and 3. That, as things now stand, no one of them can be delivered up, even for a crime committed since the conclusion of the said treaty.

1. That his Majesty's ministers cannot send the royalists, of whom we are speaking, out of this country. When we say they cannot, or when we make use of any words expressive of their want of power to do, or to leave undone, any thing appertaining to this question, we, of course, do not speak of their might, but of their right; not of the physical force which they may possess; but of their legal capacity: and, therefore, the first question which presents itself, on this head, is,—in virtue of what law could the ministers presume to send the Vendean royalists, or any one of them, out of this country? The conductors of the London newspapers tell us, the alien law. What! does this law authorize his Majesty's ministers to send away the persons in question? Is it to be imagined, that those ministers, or any other set of men, whom a king has thought worthy of trust and confidence, would be guilty of such shameful profligacy as to attempt to convert the alien law, which was passed for the purpose of preserving the king and kingdom against the intrusion, the intrigues, and the plots of Jacobins and regicides, into an instrument for the persecution, the ruin, and the murder of royalists? The alien law is a shield which was given to the government for the purpose of defending his Majesty and his people against all such aliens as might be found hostile to them, or either of them; and not for the purpose of defending and supporting other sovereigns and other nations. The law does not, indeed, say, that a man shall not be sent out of the country for offences committed against Buonaparté; but if this were a good reason for the sending him out for such offences, then might he, upon the same ground, be sent out for having supplanted a minister in the heart of his mistress, or for any other act equally foreign from the crimes and intentions contemplated in the alien law. In fact, if the ministry can send a man out of the country, upon the application of Buonaparté, or for the purpose of appeasing Buonaparté, or for any purpose other than those which the law had in view, then is every foreigner, who has the misfortune to be in this kingdom, at the absolute mercy of three or four men, and the British government is, as far as relates to foreigners, a despotism not less hateful than that of France or of Tunis. Yet, such is the power given to the ministers, if we were to believe the London editors.

We shall, however, with all due submission to these enlightened, philanthropic, and honourable gentlemen, endeavour to prove, that his Majesty's Parliament have not, in their anxious desire to protect the nation against evil-minded aliens, been so shamefully regardless of the safety and tranquillity of aliens of another description; and that the alien law, instead of being the convenient means of gratifying private or political pique, instead of being what the factious have represented it, an instrument of tyranny, is, in fact, a very wise and lenient law, which, in providing for the safety of the state, has been by no means unmindful of justice to the alien.

The preamble of the act shews its object. It states, that, "whereas, under the present circumstances, much danger may arise to the public tranquillity from the resort and residence of aliens," &c. &c. To the public tranquillity in this country most assuredly, and not to the public tranquillity in France, or elsewhere. And how could any minister pretend to say, that he apprehended danger to the public tranquillity of this country from the conduct of the royalists in Jersey, particularly when they had come to that island by his consent and when it was notorious to the whole world, that they must be, from every possible motive, desirous to preserve the public tranquillity of this kingdom?

As to the mode of executing the law, one would, from reading the London newspapers (see the article quoted in p. 281), be led to imagine, that it was a thing left entirely to the caprice of the ministry, and that, of course, if Mr. Fox, or any other favourite of Buonaparté, happened to be in the place of Lord Pelham, he might catch and send off a ship-load of aliens with as little ceremony as is used in making up an assortment of cattle for market.—Hear them.—"In addition to those specified under the treaty of Amiens, seventeen Chouans have been brought from Jersey to Southampton, in order to be sent out of the kingdom."—What country clown, upon reading this, would not imagine, that these Chouans were a sort of sheep, seventeen of which had been brought, with their legs tied, from Jersey, in order to be exported to foreign parts?

To send aliens out of the country is often talked of, but by those who understand very little of the matter. We are now speaking of aliens who have committed no crime against the Alien Act, or against any other law of this country; and we will, for a moment, suppose, that his Majesty's ministers were resolved to make one of them, for instance, leave the kingdom. The mode of proceeding is this. His Majesty must issue his royal proclamation, or an order of council, or an order under his sign manual, directing the said alien to depart from this realm within a time limited in such proclamation, &c. There is no sending away with the legs tied; no cart, no jail, no black-hole. The alien is to be ordered to depart whithersoever he pleases. If he disobey the order, indeed, he is to be arrested; but he is not then to be sent out of the kingdom; he is to be tried in the Court of King's Bench or other Court of Oyer and Terminer, and, upon conviction, is to be imprisoned for any time not exceeding one month, at the end of which time he is to depart the realm within a time limited by the judgment of the court. If the alien be guilty of a second offence of the same nature, or if he return into the kingdom, without leave, after having been ordered to quit it, he is liable to be punished severely; but these cases do not apply to the present question.—If the Secretary of State should apprehend that the alien will not obey the proclamation, or order, of his Majesty, he may issue his warrant for putting the alien into the charge of one of the King's messengers, in order to his being conducted out of the kingdom in such manner as shall be suitable to his rank and situation; but, in case any excuse should be alleged by the alien for not complying with the proclamation, &c. he is to have a hearing before the Lords of the Privy Council, who are to determine thereupon.

Such is the law as far as it bears upon the point before us. It will be perceived, that the power, which the Secretary of State possesses, of giving in charge, is to be exercised upon extraordinary emergencies only; and even then the conducting out of the kingdom cannot take place till the alien has had a hearing before the Lords of the Privy Council. At this hearing a Venetian Royalist would find no difficulty in proving, that he had neither done nor meditated any thing dangerous to the public safety of this kingdom, and, proving that, we can never believe, that the Lords of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council would refuse to set him at liberty. If, on the other hand, the alien be not put in charge of a King's messenger, but be left to depart before the expiration of the time limited by the proclamation, or order, and if, in consequence of his not departing, he be arrested and sent to jail, it does not follow, that he is to remain in jail till the assizes, and then be convicted as a matter of course; for, the act has provided, that, every alien so committed to jail may, upon application, be brought before one of the judges, who, if he sees sufficient cause, is to admit such alien to bail, upon his giving security for his appearance to answer the matters alleged against him. His Majesty may, indeed, "whenever he shall deem it necessary for the public safety," order an alien, who is in prison, or upon bail, to be conducted out of the kingdom, without waiting for further trial; but, it is evident, from the very words here made use of, that a measure of this sort could not be taken except in times of great and imminent public danger. So that, to apply what has been said to the question immediately before us, we think it is clear, that no one of the French Royalists can, in any case, during times of public tranquillity, ever be forced to leave the kingdom, till after a hearing before the Lords of the Council, or a trial, in some way or other, in a court of justice; and, supposing such Royalist to have neither done nor meditated any thing against the public safety of this kingdom, he cannot be compelled to quit it, without a shameful violation both of the spirit and letter of the law.

Our 2d position is, that no one of these Royalists ever can be delivered up for a crime committed in France before the conclusion of the Definitive Treaty.—Most assuredly this is what we never should have thought of proving, had not the contrary been seriously maintained in a long and elaborate article, published, on the 30th ultimo, in the Morning Post, a paper which boasts (and we believe with truth) of having the widest circulation of any daily paper in London. The writer of this paper (who is not always destitute of political sagacity) repeats the statement from the Morning Chronicle, as quoted in our last sheet, p. 281, and then, upon that part of it which relates to persons seized at the request of Mr. Otto, in order to be delivered up to Buonaparté, the writer observes, that, on the same principle General Willot may be demanded and given up. He proceeds to name several others, all of whom, it is well known, left France long before the conclusion of the Definitive Treaty, the stipulation of which, relative to the present subject is, that the contracting parties, upon due application made, shall be bound to deliver up to justice persons accused of murder, forgery, or fraudulent bankruptcy; but, says the treaty, "this article has no sort of reference to crimes of murder, forgery, or fraudulent bankruptcy, committed before the conclusion of this Definitive Treaty." It is clear, therefore, that, supposing it to be lawful and just to seize, and deliver up, persons who may have committed crimes in France since the conclusion of the Definitive Treaty, it by no means follows, that the ministers may, upon the demand of Buonaparté, deliver up to him persons who have done nothing in France, and who can even prove that they have not been in France, since the conclusion of that Treaty.

But we maintain, 3. That, as things now stand, no one of the royalists can be delivered up, even for a crime committed since the conclusion of the treaty. And here we must observe, that, when we speak of crimes, as imputed to the gentlemen, whom Buonaparté may wish to persecute, we must always be understood as meaning alleged crimes, and not as admitting, that they have, in reality been guilty of crimes. Our object is not to screen the guilty, but to defend the innocent: our wish is, not to see England a sanctuary for criminals, but an asylum for the oppressed. The Vendean Royalists have been guilty of no crimes; but we are well aware, that their innocence is by no means sufficient to shelter them from accusation; and, whenever it may be thought convenient to accuse them, we are the last persons in the world to doubt that witnesses enough will be found.

The words of the treaty, relative to this part of the subject, are as follow: "It is agreed, that the contracting parties, upon requisitions made by them respectively, or by their ministers, or officers, duly authorized for that purpose, shall be bound to deliver up to justice, persons accused of murder, forgery, or fraudulent bankruptcy, committed within the jurisdiction of the requiring party; provided, however, that this shall only be done in cases, in which the evidence of the crime shall be such, that the laws of the place, in which the accused person shall be discovered, would have authorized the detaining and bringing him to trial, had the offence been committed there." * Were Buonaparté, in virtue of this stipulation to demand any one of the Vendean Royalists, or, indeed, any other person, as having committed a murder, for instance, in France, since the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens, and if we were the advocates for the person so demanded, we should, as things now stand, object to the delivering him, upon the clear and simple ground of there being, in this country, no law authorizing such delivery. The treaty of Amiens, indeed, says that certain persons shall be delivered up for crimes committed in France, but that treaty is no law of this land, nor can a secretary of state, or magistrate, in virtue of that treaty, hold any person in confinement one single hour. We will suppose for instance, that the ministry were to be weak or wicked enough to order a man to be seized, in consequence of an application to them made on behalf of Buonaparté, evidence of the alleged crime must be given before a magistrate, which magistrate would instantly perceive, that he had no authority to imprison or detain; that the alleged crime was not committed against the law of this country, and that, as to the treaty, the pleading of it would not shelter him from the effects of an information in the court of King's Bench.

Our treaty with the United States of America contains an article, from which the XXth article of the treaty of Amiens seems to have been copied verbatim, with the addition of the words, "or fraudulent bankruptcy;" but, in order to give effect to the article of the American treaty, an act of parliament was necessary, and one was, accordingly passed, (37. Geo. III. c. 97.) as soon as it was convenient, after the ratifications were exchanged. There has no act of parliament yet been passed for giving effect to the stipulation in the treaty of Amiens, and, therefore, as things now stand, no person can, for any crime, of whatever nature or whenever committed in France, be delivered up by any power in this kingdom, without a daring violation of the law; without, indeed, an open and forcible resistance of the officers of justice.

But, after all, should these violations of the law take place; should the ministers pervert the intention of the alien law, should they act upon the treaty without the authority of parliament, should they send away, or deliver up, every French royalist in the kingdom, should they become the vile runners of Fouché, the valets of his hangmen, the caterers for his voracious prisons and places of execution; suppose them capable of baseness and tyranny like this, where would be the remedy? Who would call them to account? What would be their punishment? The remedy would be found in the laws. Every one concerned in an unlawful act, to the injury of any of the persons in question, would be liable to an action for such injury, or to an indictment, which might be preferred by any man who had the zeal and the ability to demand justice in behalf of an oppressed foreigner. Were a person, for instance, coming just warm from the embraces of Buonaparté, to be appointed secretary of state, and were he to issue his warrant for apprehending a royalist and delivering him up to his friend, any one might prefer a bill of indictment against him for a misdemeanour, and he might be sentenced to several years imprisonment in Newgate, or to serve on board the hulks, or to be transported to Botany Bay. If, in reply to this, we were asked, what would be the consequence, if the courts and juries participated in the feelings of such a ministry as we have, for argument's sake, been supposing to exist; our answer would be, "Why, then, chaos is come again." There is an end to all law and government, and each man has a right to seek justice in his own way; all our lives are in jeopardy, and it is much better to lose them in battle than on the gallows. Thank God, however, such is not the case, and, fearful as is the prospect before us, we trust it never will. Yet, from the language of the London news-writers, a stranger would imagine that this horrid state of things already existed. They talk of apprehending, and imprisoning, and sending out of the country, and delivering up, &c. &c. as measures of expedience merely. From a perusal of their at once flippant and pompous trash, one would really believe, that foreigners were not, in this country, under the safeguard of the courts of justice; and, in fact, that they were totally unknown to the law of the land. The diurnal politicians are brim full of the milk of human kindness: so great is their philanthropy, that they would much rather see their country subjugated than go to war; yet they can, with the most perfect sans froid imaginable, applaud the ministers for having, as they supposed, given up to certain ruin and death a considerable number of persons whose only imputed crime was, too great an attachment to this country! And these are the writers, who would fain persuade us, that the "liberty and happiness of nations" depend upon the free and unshackled use of their pens! They would fain persuade us, that it is reserved for them to save the world from the tyranny of Buonaparté, while, in the very same column, they applaud, in our ministers, an act (which they believe them to have committed) much more tyrannical and perfidious than any thing of which Buonaparté has ever been, or can, with truth, be accused. It cannot be forgotten how vociferous these generous and public spirited writers were against the treason and sedition bills, and against the suspension of the habeas corpus act: what affecting strains they poured out at the hard fate of the St. nés, the Jacksons, and the O'Connors; but now, behold! when the lives of the French Royalists are, as they suppose, about to be sacrificed, they seem to forget that there is any law of habeas corpus, or any other law. No clamour! They are as quiet and submissive, as if they had, from their infancy, sucked in the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance.

We shall now, for the present, take leave of this subject, not without some hope, that what we have said will tend to remove the anxiety, which may yet be entertained for the safety and tranquillity of those aliens, against whom Buonaparté may possibly have a grudge, and who have the happiness to reside in this country. It will be observed, however, that our remarks, respecting such persons as may be accused of crimes committed since the signature of the treaty, will not hold good, after an act of parliament shall have been passed for giving effect to the XXth article; but, that act will not, we trust, be found to endanger the safety of any of the persons, in whose fate we take an interest. We possess some information on this head, which we shall take an early opportunity of submitting to the consideration of our readers.

From the gallant and faithful Vendéans we would now turn the attention of our readers to a person of a very different description, Mr. Fox; but we have not room enough left to observe, at any length, on the accounts which have been given of his visit to, and reception at, Paris. We cannot, however, forbear to notice the ridiculous embarrassment to which this "wise and prudent statesman" has reduced his friends in England, particularly those knights of the quill, who have constantly been honoured with a seat by his side, at the Whig Club, and who, in return, have always kept a corner of their papers at his command.—Unfortunately for these gentlemen, at the moment, that they are insinuating (for they are not subject, reduced to insinuations) that Buonaparté is the greatest tyrant in the universe, that he rules France with a rod of iron, and that he has even extended his oppressive rod to that most precious of all enjoyments, the liberty of the British press; just at this very moment, their leader, their idol, the champion of freedom, the man of the people, goes and voluntarily does homage to the great object of their execration and their dread, to the man whom they represent as the enemy and destroyer of liberty in every form and degree! The manner in which they attempt to reconcile this step of Mr. Fox with their own opinions and declarations respecting the two characters shall be noticed in our next, probably in the form of a letter to Mr. Fox himself; we shall only further remark at present, that, if any thing were wanted to heighten the ridicule, excited by the embarrassment above-mentioned, a lover of fun would certainly have chosen precisely what these sagacious writers have furnished him with, in their comparison between the greatness of Mr. Fox's character, and the littleness of that of Buonaparté, together with their remarks as to the pride which the Consul must feel at being visited by Mr. Fox, and the consequence it must give him in the eyes of mankind! This was one way, which these mortified writers had of avenging themselves on the Consul for having abridged their precious right of printing; a right which they have constantly employed to the injury and disgrace of their country. Their dislike to Buonaparté, and their abuse of him, arose, not from his being the enemy of England, but from his having taken effectual measures for killing Jacobinism in France.—They hate him, as we have frequently observed, for his good, and not for his evil deeds. It is impossible for any candid man to deny, that, in proportion as Buonaparté has increased in power, the tranquillity and happiness of France has been restored. Where then is the reason for inveighing against the increase of his power, as far as relates to France? To hate Buonaparté as the greatest and most formidable enemy of England, indeed, is a legitimate feeling; but the men, of whom we are speaking, hate him much more for his amnesty to the emigrants and his restoration of the Christian religion, than they would were he to land on the coast of Sussex with a hundred thousand men. We live, however, in hopes of seeing them all reconciled to him. They have fulfilled our prediction: after a week's bluster, they are become as tame and as harmless as Buonaparté himself could wish; and they not only submit in silence to the castigation of the French papers, but translate and publish the articles written against themselves; which is an act of penitence equal, at least, to the kissing of the rod.—Mr. Fox will do the rest!

The definitive treaty between France and the Porte, the Aulic Rescript, the imprisonment of Toussaint, as well as several other important subjects must, for want of room, remain unnoticed till the next sheet.

JAMAICA.

Message from his Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, sent over to the House of Assembly on the 17th Day of June last.—(Published by Authority.)

Mr. Speaker,—I am commanded by his honour the lieutenant-governor to lay before the House of Assembly of Jamaica extracts of two letters, and a third letter, from the Right Hon. Lord Hobart, which under the present circumstances of the mother country and the colony, so intimately concern their mutual interests, that his honour earnestly hopes the House will take them into their most mature consideration.

The necessity which his honour feels of making a most explicit communication of his sentiments to the Assembly on the subject of their present meeting, has strongly induced him to submit for their consideration his reasons for urging the adoption of the important measure proposed by his Majesty's ministers upon this occasion, viz.

The immense debt which the mother country has incurred in the prosecution of the war, and for the security of the British possessions, and the absolute necessity of her resorting to some extraordinary means for enabling her to support the increased naval and military establishments, so imperiously required in all parts of the empire, but more particularly in her West-India colonies, from the melancholy and alarming state of some of the neighbouring islands; the mutual harmony and thorough confidence between the British government and the island of Jamaica, which would naturally follow so liberal and just a proceeding on the part of the assembly:

The minds of the proprietors and inhabitants of the island, being set at rest upon the question of the employment of black troops as a part of their defence, by the immediate removal of the 2d West-India regiment, and the consent of his Majesty to the wishes of the assembly, that in future no corps of that description should be sent hither, without the concurrence of the house.

The colonies being relieved from the expense of maintaining the 20th regiment of dragoons as a permanent part of its establishment, which may be more than equal to the pay of 1,000 infantry.

The assembly having pledged itself to pay 2,000 white troops at a much less critical period than the present, which, for very obvious reasons, requires full 5,000 regular infantry, together with the whole militia of the island placed upon an improved footing, to render her secure against invasion and insurrection:

The spirit of the present proposals, that the island is only required to maintain the effective numbers upon the returns of the several corps upon this establishment, not exceeding 5000 men, and that those numbers will probably be reduced at a future period, by the restoration of good order and subordination in the French islands:

The opening and the rapid improvement of the interior country, by constructing barracks therein, and the consequent increased means of maintaining the expense of 5,000 infantry, or such a part of that number as it may be requisite hereafter to station in Jamaica—the great prospect of a much more ready and extensive sale for the produce of the colony, from new markets being opened to its commerce by the blessings of peace—the advantages attending the placing of the barrack department under the direction and controul of the Commander in Chief, and the formation of a corps of black artificers, with white master artificers and foremen at their head, under the immediate direction of the island engineer, which would diminish in a great degree the expense of that branch of the public service, and do away altogether the present difficulties attending contracts for the necessary works, so improvident and ineffectual a system for the objects in view :

These reasons have impressed themselves so forcibly, and with such thorough conviction, upon his honour's mind, that he relies with confidence upon their having their due weight with the members of the assembly, and he has accordingly given directions for the embarkation of the 20th regiment of dragoons, and the 2d West-India regiment.

His honour hopes and trusts that it is unnecessary for him to make many professions, but he most solemnly assures the house, that as long as he may have the honour to remain in his present situation, he will devote his utmost attention and abilities to the prosperity and security of the island of Jamaica, by studying the greatest economy in the expenditure for the barrack department, if entrusted to his management, and by introducing such an improved system of discipline, and such regulations into the militia service, as must tend to render that body much more efficient for the defence of the island, without drawing them unnecessarily from their other useful occupations.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

TYRO's continuation and close of the Remarks on Belsham shall appear in our next if possible.

JUNIUS must know, that we DARE not publish his remarks, as they now stand ; and, if we dared, we certainly would not do it.

The article from the EAST-INDIES shall appear in our next. We had not time to insert it in a suitable manner.

TO READERS.

THE SUPPLEMENT to the first Volume of this Work is published. It contains more matter than two common octavo volumes and concludes with an INDEX, which we think to be as complete a thing of its kind as ever was published. All the sets of the first Volume having, long ago, been sold, the whole volume is reprinted, and may be had of any of the newsmen, or booksellers. The price of the Supplement alone is 8s. 6d. Gentlemen who take the Work weekly will be supplied by their newsmen. If the newsmen should neglect to do it, application may be made to the Editor, or to Mr. Bagshaw, Bow-Street, Covent Garden.

COEBETT'S ANNUAL REGISTER.

VOL. I.

From January to June, 1802.

This work is composed, partly of an exact reprint of the Weekly Register, for the same period, and partly of a Supplement, which has been published separately for the convenience of those gentlemen who have taken and preserved the weekly Numbers.

When I first undertook the Register, I was fully persuaded, that the plan, which, indeed, I had long thought of, was well calculated to insure a wide circulation, and to produce an extensive as well as a lasting effect. It appeared to me, that such a work, conducted with great diligence and with common ability, would, with relation to politics, at once embrace every rational object of a news-paper, a magazine, and a review. Here my prospect terminated; but, when I came to see a dozen or fifteen numbers collected together in the form of a book, when I perceived the convenience and great utility of this book, and particularly when I came to compare its contents with those of the Annual Registers, I felt myself urged, by every motive which can actuate a writer, to extend my plan, so as to make it include the purpose of that sort of work, in the shape and under the title of which I now present the first volume to the public.

The book may be considered as divided into two parts, the first consisting of a reprint of the weekly numbers for the half year, and the second, of the Supplement.

The reprint of the numbers contains a collection of all authentic Documents, relating to State Affairs, or matters of political economy, whether they immediately relate to this country or not; and, in making this collection, care has been taken to recur to such compacts and transactions of past times, as do, or may, affect the circumstances of the present time. During the session of Parliament, each number contains, of course, an account of its proceedings and debates. As occasion requires, and as the time and room affords opportunity, brief notices are given of such new books as relate to history, politics, or political economy, or that bear upon subjects connected therewith; and, in some instances, the principles and statements of works, so noticed, are examined and controverted. The preceding important heads are followed, in each sheet, by a selection of such Foreign Intelligence and Domestic Occurrences as are of some public importance; to which are added, a weekly account of Promotions, Appointments, Preferments, Dispensations, Bankrupts, Births, Marriages, Deaths; Price of Stocks, of Corn, Meat, Bread, &c. &c. also of the Course of Exchange, and of the Changes of the Weather.

Each sheet contains a Summary View of Politics, or more correctly speaking, a portion of a series of statements and observations applicable to the most important current events and transactions. Besides this series, which, upon a perusal, will be found to leave very few topics of consequence entirely untouched, the weekly sheets (and the reprint of them, of course) contain detached discussions of all the principal measures of our own government and of the governments of other countries; so that, these sheets, when collected and perused together, will form a Chronicle, not only of events and transactions, but of the opinions, feelings, and motives connected therewith.

The compilers of Annual Registers have adopted a different, and, in my opinion, a far less perfect mode of arranging their materials, which it is their custom to divide into classes, instead of placing them in the order in which they were first communicated to the public. According to their method, all the State Papers are so inserted as to follow each other without the intervention of other matter; and so of the Proceedings in Parliament, the Historical Remarks, &c. &c. But it is, I think, evident, that this classification can be attended with no one advantage, while it has many very great disadvantages. Considering the Register merely as a book of reference, it is of little import how the materials are arranged, so that they are all included in the book, and are pointed to by the Index in such a manner as to be found with perfect facility; but, as a book for perusal, the chronological order is certainly the most favourable to a clear, an easy, and satisfactory comprehension of the divers matters contained in it. At first sight, it may appear, that the chronological order, followed without reference to the difference in the kind of the materials, produces, in one and the same sheet, a heterogeneous mass of Treaties with Foreign Powers, Debates in the Parliament, Intelligence from abroad, Occurrences at home, Fluctuations in the Stocks, Price of Bread, Political Reflections, &c. &c. Yet, upon closer observation, it will be found, that there is a very intimate connection between all these; that they explain and elucidate each other, and that, though widely different in their nature, the reader must see them all, and all together too, in order to have a full, and fair view of the political picture, of which they are the component parts. An article, on the contrary, contained in a Register where the classifying order is pursued, has seldom any connection with those which immediately precede or come after it; and, in the studying of it, the reader very rarely indeed derives any aid from the situation in which it is found. Where, for instance, is the connection between two State Papers? What help, in general, does the one afford towards the just appreciation of the other? To know what was thought and said of the treaty of Amiens, to obtain any knowledge respecting it, other than that which is to be drawn from the instrument itself, recourse must be had to those other sources of information, which here accompany the treaty, but which in a work otherwise constructed must be sought for elsewhere, not always with a certainty of success, and never without considerable pains.

The twenty-six sheets, which form the Chronicle for the half year, did not, however, appear to me to be quite sufficient to render the work complete. Several articles presented themselves, which, though too long to be inserted in the Weekly Numbers, were absolutely necessary to the completion of my plan. These, I therefore, resolved to publish in a half yearly Supplement, to be supplied, at a moderate price, to the purchasers of the Weekly Numbers. The Supplement to Vol. I. is now published, and, on this occasion, I think it right to give some account of its contents, which are as follows:

1. Report made to the American Congress, by MR. JEFFERSON, when Secretary of State, in 1793, concerning the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with foreign Nations.—The principal object of this report was to procure from the Congress, an act to give the trade of France a preference before that of Great-Britain. The lower house passed an act to this effect, but it was thrown out in the Senate. Our commercial treaty with America expires in a year's time, and it is therefore highly interesting to know what were, on this subject, the sentiments and views of a man, who is now at the head of the American government.
2. Report made to the National Convention of France, by ROBERJOT, relative to the countries conquered by the armies of the North, and of the Sambre and the Meuse.—This report, which is a statement of the motives for making the Rhine the boundary of France, contains a vast deal of information relative to the population, the soil, the natural productions, the manufacturing, the commercial, the maritime and military advantages of the countries, of which, unfortunately, France has now got the sole and safe possession.
3. Extracts on the Subject of Commerce from Sir Frederick Morton Eden's Letters on the Peace, and from my own Letters to Mr. Addington.
4. Account of the Society of Ship Owners, formed in June, 1802.
5. An account of the Proceedings of the Society of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce in 1802.
6. A topographical and statistical Account of the Island of Trinidad.
7. An Account of the rise, progress, and present situation of the Colony of Sierra Leone.
8. A Letter to the Bishop of Rochester (now of St. Asaph) on the Slave Trade. By a West-India Planter.—Republished.
9. An Essay on Neutral Rights, by Alex. Hamilton, Esq. formerly Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.—This essay was written in defence of those articles of the treaty of 1794, which relate to the rights of neutrals at sea. It is a most able performance, and is, I believe, nowhere to be found in England. It is of importance from intrinsic merit, and highly so from its origin, as every person at all acquainted with the subject will easily perceive.
10. An Essay on the Balance of Power in Europe. Written in April, 1802.
11. Naval Projects of France, translated from a French work, published at Paris in May, 1802.
12. Character of BUONAPARTE as drawn by Mr. Pitt and Mr. Windham.
13. Character of Mr. JEFFERSON, President of the United States, as drawn by William Smith, Esq. of South Carolina, late American Minister at the Court of Lisbon.
14. Character of Mr. BURR, Vice President of the United States, as displayed in a very curious transaction, lately brought to light, respecting the suppression of a work entitled "A History of the Administration of Mr. Adams."
15. UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. Sketch of the state of parties.—Extract from Mr. Hamilton's Examination of the President's Message to the Congress.—List of Public Acts passed during the last Session of Congress.—A Review of the last Session of Congress.—Extract from an Address to the People of the United States on the Policy of maintaining a permanent Navy.—A statistical Account of the United States for a succession of years, compiled from official Documents.

16. An Essay on the means of recruiting the British Army, and of keeping up the establishment, without degrading the character of the soldier and of the service.
17. Charter for founding and improving King's College at Windsor, in the Province of Nova Scotia, dated May 12, 1802.
18. Form of Prayer, &c. used in the Churches, &c. on Tuesday, June 1, 1802, being the day appointed for Thanksgiving for the Peace, &c.
19. Substance of Sir William Scott's Speech, on the Bill relative to the Non-residence of the Clergy, and other Affairs of the Church.
20. Copy of the Bill (as amended on re-commitment), respecting the Non-residence of the Clergy and other Affairs of the Church.

21. AFFAIRS OF INDIA.—1. Letter from Mr. Dundas to the Chairman of the East-India Company, April 2, 1800, respecting the Trade between India and Europe.—2. First Report of the Special Committee, appointed to consider of the proposals contained in Mr. Dundas's Letter.—3. A complete List of the Papers necessary to be read on India Affairs, particularly on the subject of the Private Trade.—4. Minutes of the Court of Directors of the 4th of Feb. 1801, containing the Resolutions of the Special Committee, which were adopted by the Court.—5. Letter from Mr. Dundas to the Chairman, dated March 21, 1801, containing remarks on the Resolutions of the Special Committee, and referring to the Dispatches, just then received, from the Marquis of Wellesly.—6. Dispatches of the Marquis of Wellesly relative to the Private Trade, dated Sept. 30, 1800.—7. Second Report of the Special Committee, by way of reply to the Letters of Mr. Dundas and the Marquis of Wellesly.—8. Letter from Mr. Dundas to the Chairman, &c. on the India Debt, dated June 30, 1801.—9. Third Report of the Special Committee.—10. Extracts from a Letter to the Proprietors of East-India Stock, being a defence of Mr. Dundas against the Special Committee, dated June 8, 1802.—These papers seem to me to be quite sufficient to enable any one to form a correct judgment as to the subjects treated of in them. In my next volume I shall take care to insert all the other papers, particularly those lately laid before Parliament, relative to this most important part of our dominions. It will be necessary to analyse, or abridge, some of them; but they will not, perhaps, be thereby rendered less convenient or useful.

22. List of the Public Acts, passed during the last Session of Parliament.

23. A List of the Titles of all the New Books, which have been published, in the United Kingdom, or in the Continent of Europe, and in America, during the last six months.—When I speak of the "last six months," I am to be understood as meaning, the six month ending June 30 for this kingdom, 31st of May for the Continent of Europe, and 31st of March for America. In my next list I shall go back to these several epochs.—The books are divided into thirty-two classes, and are upwards of fifteen hundred in number. The titles are all translated into English, but care has been taken to mention the language in which the work is published, and the place where published. This is, I am led to hope, the completest thing of the kind that ever has been attempted. It has cost no small pains, and I trust it will be found to be of great and extensive utility.

24. Juridical Proceedings during the six months.—Under this head I have selected and analysed, or abridged, the accounts, given of all such cases, in the several courts, as appear to me to contain any thing novel, or peculiarly interesting or important, whether from their nature, their consequences, or from the rank, &c. of the parties. That the student in law will derive much advantage from this species of report I can hardly flatter myself; but, if it be continued on, year after year, with a tolerable degree of correctness, I am persuaded it will be found very useful to the generality of my readers.
25. Complete List of all the Military and Naval Promotions during the six months.
26. Ecclesiastical Preferments and Dispensations during the six months.
27. Complete List of Bankrupts for the six months, alphabetically arranged.
28. General View of the Variations in the Price of Bread—in the Value of the Funds—and in the Bills of Mortality, during the six months, ending on June 30, 1802.
29. INDEX to the whole Volume.—This Index occupies thirty pages, small print, has been made with great care, and will, I trust, be found extremely useful. To a work containing so great a number and variety of articles, it was impossible to make a useful table of Contents; but, it was the more necessary to provide an Index, which should make up for the want of such table. This has been attempted, at least; and there is, I believe, no passage, of any consequence, in the whole book, to which there is not a reference under two, or more, letters of the Index.

The contents of every work of this sort may be considered under three principal heads: DOMESTIC AFFAIRS, COLONIAL AFFAIRS, and FOREIGN AFFAIRS. The first includes, Proclamations, Orders of Council, Proceeding in and Acts of Parliament; statements and observations respecting the Legislature, the Courts of Justice, the Church, the Army, the Navy, Finance, Shipping, Manufactures, Agriculture; Lists of Appointments, Promotions, Preferments, Dispensations, Bankruptcies; Rates and Prices of Stocks, and of the principal articles of Food. The second head includes every thing that transpires relative to our distant possessions, their Population, Soil, Exports and Imports, system of Slavery, Means of Defence, Military and other Establishments and Resources. The third includes all Treaties, Conventions, Declarations, and, in short, all Papers of whatever description, made or issued by any Government or Governments, and which treat of matters, in which more than one nation has a concern. Nor must Laws, Proclamations, Decrees, &c. &c. which relate to the internal concerns of foreign nations be altogether omitted: some of them may; but others are very necessary to enable the politician to form an opinion, not only as to the interior situation, but also as to the exterior views of other countries: and, for the same purpose he should have correct information respecting the pecuniary, the military, and other resources of the principal nations, particularly of such as are, by their situation, power, and disposition, in any degree formidable to ourselves.

Such ought to be the contents of an Annual Register, and such are the contents of this volume, which does, in my opinion, include all the matter and information, which the politician can wish to possess, belonging to the period, for which it professes to be a record.

The size of the volume is large, but not so large as to be inconvenient, and it is bound in such a way as effectually to obviate all the difficulty, which the reader might naturally enough apprehend from the broadness of the page. To those gentlemen, who may send their own sets to be bound, it may be necessary to observe, that the bookbinder should be directed to bind with what is called a bolero-back.

The price of the Supplement alone is 8s. 9d. and of the complete volume, reprinted and bound, £1 : 11 : 6.—The Supplement, from my desire to render the work as reasonable as possible to those who take the weekly numbers, is sold for precisely what it cost me; and the volume complete, is sold for no more than the amount of the numbers it contains, with the addition of the Supplement and the binding. At first sight it may appear dear; but when the quantity of print is considered, it will be found to be proportionably cheaper than any other book published in London. It contains more matter than four common octavo volumes; and of this matter an unusual proportion is of that kind which is the most expensive to print. Gentlemen, who take the weekly numbers, must perceive the economy arising from it. They have a Weekly Paper containing all that a gentleman can desire to find in such a vehicle, and also an Annual Register, more minute and satisfactory than any hitherto published, at the very moderate rate of three guineas a year.

Eleven Numbers of Vol. II. have been published. Gentlemen, who may now choose to begin the work, may be supplied with those eleven numbers. The preceding numbers, as well as the succeeding ones, can be sent post-free, like common newspapers, to any part of the United Kingdom. One number is published every Saturday, and it leaves town by the post of that day.

Applications may be made to the Editor, to the Publisher, or to any of the Newsmen of London or Westminster.—The gentlemen who have not received the Supplement from the Newsmen who supply them with the Weekly Numbers, will please to apply to the Editor; or to the Publisher, Mr. Richard Bagshaw, Bow Street, Covent Garden.

House of Assembly, Monday, June 21, 1802.

Resolved, That it be recommended to the House to send a message to his honour the Lieutenant-Governor, in answer to his message of the 17th instant, accompanied by communications from his Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, and containing his Honour's sentiments respecting the measures proposed in that minister's letters, to inform his Honour that the House, after minutely investigating every antecedent circumstance connected with the subject, has given the most mature consideration.

That the House think it their duty, in the most respectful manner, to represent to his Honour, that his Majesty's subjects in this island, in the full confidence of their having an equal right to protection, for defence and security, as his Majesty's subjects resident in Great-Britain, having at all times progressively contributed their full proportion for defraying the expenses of the Empire at large, have uniformly resisted applications made by his Majesty's ministers, tending to burthen this country with the British pay of such troops as have been sent here for its protection; and although from existing circumstances the Assembly did, on some occasions, depart from a principle which they consider to be an inherent right, the House did, on such occasions, strongly remonstrate against the conditions insisted on by his Majesty's ministers when they conceded to the wishes of the country, as being equally unconstitutional as unjust:

That, from the first establishment of a military force in this island, the representatives of the people did, with a liberality becoming loyal and faithful subjects, provide an additional island subsistence for the troops, with convenient barracks, hospital allowances, with various accommodations and comforts; and so early as the year 1773, the Council and Assembly, in a joint address to his Majesty, did solemnly pledge the faith of the country to continue such subsistence, and other incidents mentioned, to any number of troops his Majesty might be graciously pleased to send for their protection to the extent of 3000 men. This salutary provision has been faithfully continued at the sole charge of the island, and some additions have recently been made for the comfort of the troops, a provision which the House takes leave to observe, is made by this island alone of all his Majesty's territories in the West-Indies:

That when his Majesty was solicited to add a regiment of cavalry to the force then stationed in the island, and the 20th regiment of light dragoons was raised and sent out, it was not at that time, nor at any subsequent period, considered as a permanent establishment, and that it was not so will clearly appear by a reference to the votes and proceedings of the House respecting that measure; that the application made to his Majesty in that respect was an experiment resorted to, when the situation of the neighbouring French colony of St. Domingo caused the greatest alarm and terror for the safety of this country; and although the conditions on which this force was sent were acceded to by the House, the strongest representations were made against them as being novel and unconstitutional, and the consent given to submit to such terms could only proceed from imperious necessity:

That when the Assembly agreed to give British pay to 2000 men, the measure was held out as a substitute to avert the evils and imminent danger at that time apprehended by the inhabitants at large, from having black troops raised or sent here, or in other language, armed slaves to defend and protect the rights, the liberties, and properties, not only of free men, but of British subjects,—a measure not only considered to proceed from ignorance of our local circumstances, of our laws, and of our constitution, but viewed with that abhorrence and indignation which it could not fail to excite. Recent occurrences in some of his Majesty's windward islands, and certain instances which have actually occurred of desertion of some of the black troops quartered in this country, fully justify the apprehensions of the people from having a force of this description stationed in their garrisons, the more especially when the dangerous consequences which must follow upon desertion of the black troops are adverted to. This measure was adopted by his Majesty's ministers, regardless of repeated and urgent representations made by the Assembly against it, which appear on the journals of the House; that whenever such or any other military establishment is found to be inexpedient or dangerous, it is conceived that the subject has an undoubted right to relief; and the House is well assured that his Majesty's paternal goodness will always induce him to gratify the wishes of his faithful subjects in that respect:

That in the substitute offered by the Assembly to pay and subsist 2000 white troops at the sole expense of the country, it was expressly stipulated that no black military establishment should be raised in or sent to this island. An additional inducement for consenting to burthen the people with so heavy an expense, and to depart from what they consider to be their inherent right, was the full confidence that most important benefits would be obtained from our white population being augmented by the future colonization of these men, and their families in the island; a plan, and the means for affecting which formed a part of the proposition.—That, notwithstanding the royal approbation expressed of the liberal conduct of the Assembly, and that the general sentiments of his Majesty's servants appeared to be most favourable to the measure, his Majesty's late war minister, in a letter to our agent, and the Duke of Portland in a dispatch to the late commander in chief, declared, in the strongest terms, their intention of resuming the establishment of the black troops, and did actually send the 2d West India regiment to this island, in direct violation of the condition agreed to by themselves in respect to that measure, and the contract entered into by the Assembly for the British pay and subsistence of 2000 men was thereby made void to all intents and purposes:

That from the various considerations already stated the House consider it to be their duty not to comply with the requisition signified in Lord Hobart's dispatches, of paying and subsisting 5000 troops at the sole expense of this colony, and their resistance is founded on constitutional right and justice; but if they could be induced to depart from their duty by an inclination to comply with the ministers requisition, the circumstances in which this country is at this time involved, from the great depression in the prices of its various staples and articles of commerce—the exorbitant rise in all articles of British and Irish merchandize and provisions imported—the advanced price of every article necessary for cultivation and subsistence—the injurious regulations and restrictions on its produce in the British markets—the ruinous and oppressive duties existing, and likely to be increased, on its imports from and exports to Great-Britain—the difficulties attending its commercial intercourse with the American States, from whence many most essential articles necessary for carrying on the cultivation of our properties, and for the subsistence of the inhabitants of all descriptions, can alone be obtained, arising from the prohibition to export any article of our staple productions except rum and molasses in American bottoms—and the pressure of a very heavy existing debt, for which a high rate of interest is paid—render it altogether totally impossible for the people to pay such an enormous amount of additional taxes as would be necessarily required to support such an expensive establishment :

That the House places the fullest confidence in the assurances given by his Honour, that he will devote his utmost attention and abilities to the prosperity and security of the island; by studying the greatest economy in the public expenditure, and by introducing such an improved system of discipline, and such regulations into the militia service, as must tend to render that body much more efficient for the defence of the island, without drawing them unnecessarily from their other useful occupations :

That they rest assured the sum voted for the interior barrack department, will be laid out with all possible economy, and with that judgment which his Honour's experience cannot fail to manifest :

That whenever his Honour shall be pleased, upon any future occasion, to lay before the House any specific propositions, either respecting the barrack department, or the formation of a corps of artificers, the same shall be taken into most serious consideration.

And a motion being made to amend the said report, by adding after the words “expensive establishment,” the following clause :

“That notwithstanding the distress which has ensued from the various causes now stated, and the difficulty of supporting any additional burthens, the House being impressed with a sense of the expediency of augmenting the military establishment to the extent recommended by his Honour, will, to evince their zeal, loyalty, and patriotism, in the support of the British empire, consent to make the usual provision of subsistence and accommodation for the intended augmented force of 2000 effective men from year to year, so long as circumstances may render such a number, or any part thereof, necessary for protection and defence, in addition to the 3000 for which the island is already pledged to provide.”

And the question being put upon the said amendment, the House divided :

The ayes went forth,

Ayes 6—Mr. Murphy, Mr. Geant, Mr. Minot, Mr. Ross, Mr. Shand, Mr. L. Cuthbert.

Noes 24—Mr. Sharp, Mr. M. Smith, Mr. Stewart (St. Eliz.), Mr. Herring, Mr. Telfer, Mr. C. Mitchell, Mr. Ogilvie, Mr. Christie, Mr. Edwardes, Mr. Kerr, Mr. McKenzie, Mr. Israel, Mr. W. Mitchell, Mr. Redwood, Mr. Taylor, Mr. P. Smith, Mr. Farmer, Mr. Shaw (Kingston), Mr. Kaylet, Mr. Sheriff, Mr. Schaw (Vere), Mr. Mowatt, Mr. G. Cuthbert, and Mr. Jaques.

So it passed in the negative.

Resolved, that the House do agree to the report.

Message from his Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, sent over to the House of Assembly on the 21st day of June last.

(Published by authority).

Mr. Speaker,—I am commanded by the Lieutenant-Governor to lay before the House, a rough estimate of the expense of forming a corps of black artificers, together with a statement of the white master artificers, &c. required, and the probable annual expense of maintaining them, exclusive of the usual subsistence to the corps.

His Honour hopes that, as he finds it impossible to station the troops or to carry on the necessary works, with any advantage to the public, or the service in general, without having the direction and controul of the barrack department, the House of Assembly will sacrifice their private convenience to the public exigency of this very material object, entrust the management thereof to him, and pass an act accordingly, for that purpose.

His Honour trusts that he has only to refer the Assembly to the proposals made to the Board of Works, for the construction of the new barrack at Stoney-hill, sent to the House in a former message, to prove to the members the impracticability of his Honour's undertaking to expend the £20,000 voted by the Assembly for interior barracks without the assistance of a corps of artificers; and that any delay of that measure would defeat the object for which that sum was granted.

House of Assembly, Tuesday, June 22, 1802.

Resolved, 5th, That a message be sent to his Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, acquainting him that, as his Honour's message to the House this day respecting the formation of a corps of artificers, and placing the barrack department under his Honour's management and controul, and to pass a bill accordingly, embraces objects of very considerable importance, and leads to investigations and discussions which, by occasioning a further duration of the present session at this season of the year, would prove highly inconvenient; the House request that his Honour will permit them to postpone the consideration of his message until the usual period of meeting for the dispatch of public business, when they will take the subject into their most mature deliberation.

And a motion being made, that the House do come to the following resolution instead thereof:

That a committee be appointed to take into consideration his Honour's sixth message of this day, respecting the appointment of a corps of artificers, and the establishment of a barrack department, to be placed under his Honour's particular direction,

The House divided:—The ayes went forth,

Ayes 11—Mr. Edwardes, Mr. Shand, Mr. Mowatt, Mr. Herring, Mr. Schaw (Vere), Mr. Murphy, Mr. Grant, Mr. Kaylett, Mr. Farmer, Mr. Minot, and Mr. P. Smith.

Noes 15—Mr. Sheriff, Mr. Tharp, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Christie, Mr. McKenzie, Mr. W. Mitchell, Mr. L. Cuthbert, Mr. Stewart (St. Eliz.), Mr. G. Cuthbert, Mr. Telfer, Mr. Ogilvie, Mr. Israel, Mr. Ross, Mr. Kerr, and Mr. M. Smith.

So it passed in the negative.

Resolved, That the House do agree to the report.

His Royal and Imperial Majesty has been but just informed by the Imperial Court of Russia of the contents of the subjoined declaration which that court and the French government intend to lay before the extraordinary deputation, convened for the purpose of regulating the points which have not been settled in the treaty of peace of the empire. His Majesty does not lose a moment to give to the sub-delegate of Bohemia the instructions which, in this unforeseen case, he judges most fit, in conformity with his solicitude and cares constantly directed to the good of the empire. No reproach can be made against his Majesty or the Germanic empire, founded upon the delay of the meeting of the extraordinary deputation of the empire. More than nine months have passed since the nomination of that deputation has been notified on the part of his Imperial Majesty and the empire to the French government, and since that government has been invited to appoint plenipotentiaries to co-operate in its name, and declare its opinion upon the fittest time for the meeting. So far from the convening of the deputation being urged upon the part of France, a satisfactory answer never has been given upon the subject. Neither has the ambassador of his Imperial and Royal Majesty been able to obtain from the French government to engage in a preparatory negotiation with the Imperial court, as had been promised by that government before and after the nomination of the extraordinary deputation of the empire. Very far from it, it has always answered in an evasive and dilatory manner to the reiterated request made to it, verbal and written, on the part of the Imperial and Royal Court. As to the new negotiation proposed, at the end of last year, by his Majesty, the Emperor of Russia, to take place in concert at Paris, his Majesty has adhered, in the most friendly manner, to that proposition; but, notwithstanding that, his ambassador has neither been called to that negotiation, nor been in any way informed of its progress and result. After such proceedings his Majesty thinks that the meeting of the deputation of the empire, whether more or less tardy, cannot be a founded motive to restrain the right which the emperor and the empire as principal contracting parties in the treaty of peace of Luneville possess, and have formally reserved to themselves to immediately treat upon and regulate the business of indemnities, as also all the other points which go to the completion of the said treaty of peace. His Majesty, on the contrary, is perfectly assured, that the two powers above-mentioned, entertaining a just respect for the inviolable rights of an independent state, such as is the Germanic body, will not disavow in practice this first and principal attribution of independence. That it may be seen how well his Majesty is founded in reckoning upon the justice of the two powers, he will give to the empire a consoling explanation, by communicating to it the official assurance which was given to his ambassador at Paris, by M. Talleyrand, Minister for Foreign Affairs. The following is word for word that assurance as the ambassador has reported it:—"You may be assured that we have only agreed with Russia what propositions to make to you. We cannot even call this a plan. It is but a simple project which we submit to the deliberation of the Diet, as the means which appeared to us as the best calculated to satisfy all parties as much as that is possible. That will be proposed as a counsel, and by no means with a tone of authority, or with an air of a disposition to force the thing."

He is confirmed, therefore, by this, that when even these powers may deem their counsels and friendly interference necessary for the arrangement of such a complicated business, they do not, therefore, in any wise intend to dispute the power and right of the Germanic empire to regulate by itself the claims to indemnities, as well as so many other points which nearly concern its constitution, and on which depends its welfare or its decline.

In this assurance his Majesty charges his electoral sub-delegate of Bohemia to interfere, as far as he is competent, in order that the extraordinary deputation already assembled, open without delay, its sittings in the constitutional form; that it enter into a negotiation conformable to treaties with the French plenipotentiary, and with the intervention and co-operation of the minister of Russia; and that it declare to these two plenipotentiaries, in the name of the empire, the confidence which the Germanic body has in the equitable views of the two powers, adding thereto the assurance that the deputation will take their friendly propositions into serious consideration. The electoral sub-delegate of Bohemia is also charged to communicate those sentiments of his Majesty to the plenipotentiaries of France and Russia, adding that though according to the law of nations, and also according to the laws of the empire, the deputation cannot be restrained even by the head of the empire within a peremptory term, yet that his Majesty, in his quality of King and Elector of Bohemia, will accelerate, as much as possible, the termination of the points which are to constitute the completion of the peace.

Note of the Bohemian Minister, Mr. Scharnt, delivered to the Diet at Ratisbon on the 26th of August, on the Convention and Declaration of France and Russia, which were delivered on the 24th.

"When his Imperial Majesty proceeded to the opening of the deputation of the Empire, he hoped, by means of that measure, to preserve the Germanic Empire from the extremity equally prejudicial to its constitution as to its independence, of seeing the important changes in its territorial and constitutional relations executed by unilateral military occupations without the participation of the Emperor and of the Empire, a participation competent to them however, according to the treaty of Lunéville and the law of nations. But his Imperial Majesty had not the happiness to attain his paternal and patriotic object. Within the time when the projects concerning these changes were still mysteriously concealed from the Emperor, and from the Germanic body, military operations were executed in the Northern circles. The dispositions made at the same instant, with the greatest publicity in another country, in the centre of Germany, were relative to so great a mass of states, that not only a great part of the countries, assured by anterior negotiations to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, were comprised in them, but to replace them by other states, was rendered impossible by other arrangements.

His Majesty learned at the same time, that considerable assemblages of Palatine troops had taken place along the Inn, and upon the frontiers of the territory of Passau. The Prince Bishop of Passau apprised him of the urgent danger to which he saw himself exposed, and of the approaching invasion of his residence and possessions with which he was threatened. He invoked the protection of his Majesty, the Emperor and King. His Majesty resolved, in consequence, to prevent these enterprises, contrary to the authority and the interest of the Imperial Court, by sending his co-commissioner to the Diet, and Plenipotentiary to the Deputation of the Empire at Munich, with the most preventive instructions.

"He was ordered to make the most friendly representations against these measures, which gave the signal of general confusion, and example of violence, and which obliged the Imperial Court to take energetic measures of precaution to secure for his Royal Highness the Grand Duke, the indemnities which had been solemnly promised to him by France and the Empire. M. De Hugel was, in consequence, authorised to propose a convention by which the two Courts were to abstain from all the occupations until the Deputation of the Empire had entirely terminated its deliberations. He was at the same time authorised to open negotiations with the Palatine Electoral Court, or arrange and combine the respective claims of indemnity, promising on the part of the Imperial Court, the most sincere and greatest respect for the interest of his Electoral Highness. But all these representations and propositions were thrown aside. The Palatine Electoral Court refused to conclude an arrangement of non-occupation even for three weeks. At the same moment the Palatine troops attempted, by passing the Austrian territory, to take the city of Passau by surprise. The Court of Munich did not even chuse to bind itself to desist in future from such measures. All these events confirmed and augmented the fears of his Imperial Majesty, and, as he learned at the same time, that the entry of the Palatine troops in the city and bishopric of Passau was to take place immediately, his Majesty could no longer abstain to take the necessary precautions to occupy the city and principality of Passau, and to extend these measures to the neighbouring territories of Saltzburg and of Berchtolsgraden.

"His Majesty hastens to make known these events to his co-estates assembled at the Diet, and principally to those which make part of the deputation of the Empire; adding at the same time, that the most strict orders have been given to the Imperial troops in the three principalities, not to interfere in the smallest degree, in the internal government of these States, or in the collection of their revenues; his Majesty conceiving himself justified by the above events to protect the indemnities of his Highness the Grand Duke of Tuscany, yet, without conceiving himself authorised to take possession of them before the entire completion of the business of the indemnities, in a manner conformable to treaties, and the Germanic Constitution."

Note delivered into the Diet of Ratisbon, on the 28th of August, by the Ministers of France and Russia.

"The undersigned Minister Extraordinary of the French Republic, to the Diet of the Empire, has just received from M. the Sub-delegate of Bohenia, in the official form, the manuscript extract of a rescript from his Court, dated the 20th of August, which was read in the extraordinary sitting of the Deputation, of the 24th of the same month, and appeared in print yesterday morning. This rescript contains the order to M. the Sub-delegate, to make known the contents to the undersigned.

"The undersigned is under the necessity of observing upon this subject, that the government of the French Republic, since the exchange of the treaty of the peace of Luneville, has had it much at heart to arrive at the accomplishment of all the dispositions conformable to that treaty, that the justice due to the Princes who are to be indemnified, has required that so many and various interests should be viewed collectively; and that finally the declarations communicated on the one part, in the name of the First Consul of the French Republic; and on the other, in the name of his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, and signed on both sides, in consequence of their formal order, have a character, and contain observations, which are a proof of their constant solicitude for the welfare of the German Empire.

"The undersigned does not think that it is necessary to make detailed remarks upon the state of things which are so generally known. He refers, with full confidence, to the declaration of his Government, and adds to it the demand, that this Note be read, and inserted in the protocol in the next sitting of the deputation.

Downing-Street, September 14, 1802.

A dispatch has been received from Alexander Straton, Esq. his Majesty's Chargé d'Affairs at the Ottoman Porte, transmitting an official note delivered to him by the Reis Effendi, on the 29th of July last, relative to the navigation of the Black Sea, of which the following is a copy:

TRANSLATION.

Official Note delivered by the Reis Effendi to Alexander Straton, Esq. at a Conference in his Excellency's house on the Canal, the 29th July, 1802.

It behoves the character of true friendship and sincere regard to promote with cheerfulness all such affairs and objects as may be reciprocally useful, and may have a rank among the salutary fruits of those steady bonds of alliance and perfect good harmony which happily subsist between the Sublime Porte and the Court of Great Britain; and as permission has heretofore been granted for the English merchant ships to navigate in the Black Sea for the purposes of trade, the same having been a voluntary trait of his Imperial Majesty's own gracious heart, as more amply appears by an official note presented to our friend the English minister residing at the Sublime Porte, dated 3 Gemaziel Ahir 1214—This present "Takrim" (official note) is issued; the Imperial Ottoman Court, hereby engaging that the same treatment shall be observed towards the English merchant ships coming to that Sea, as is offered to ships of powers most favoured by the Sublime Porte, on the score of that navigation.

AMERICAN CONSULATE.

London, Sept. 9, 1802.

The Consul of the United States has the satisfaction of announcing to his fellow citizens resident in Great Britain, that by official dispatches just received from Tangier, he is informed of the re-establishment of peace between the United States and his Highness the Emperor of Morocco; and that there is no longer any danger to be apprehended from the Moorish cruisers.

TO THE HON. CHARLES JAMES FOX.

Sir,—I have never 'till now thought you a person of any political importance. I have from my infancy, heard you talked of; I have seen you nominally at the head of a party; I have read the accounts of the celebration of your election-day, your birth-day, &c. I have also read your speeches in the Parliament House, in Covent Garden, at the taverns, and your testimony at the assizes at Maidstone; I have regarded you, of course, as the cause of much noise and strife, but, some how or other, I have never, 'till now, been able to persuade myself, that it was possible for you ever to have any considerable weight in the councils of this nation. Now I do think it possible; now, that Buonaparté has decidedly and openly signified his approbation of you, I think it not only possible, but likely, that you may, after a life of defeats, be crowned with victory.

But, before I speak of the motives and probable consequences of your journey to Paris, I cannot refrain from making some remarks on what has been said here respecting your visit to Buonaparté.

The Jacobin, or republican, (for they are only different degrees of the same quality) newspapers of London, which, for reasons too obvious to mention, are all deeply interested in preserving the apparent consistency of your political character, have found themselves strangely embarrassed by your visit to the "capital of the world." Perceiving that Buonaparté was endeavouring to restore the Christian religion in France, that he had somewhat slackened in his persecution of the royalists, and that he had not only formed a resolution, but taken effectual means, to crush, for ever, the spirit of republicanism in that country, the news-writers above-mentioned began to attack him with almost as much rancour and falsehood as if he had really been lawful sovereign. You yourself, Sir, never poured out upon the family of Stuart or of Brunswick, a fouler collection of terms and epithets, than these your enraged friends bestowed on the First Consul of France. They did not, indeed, in so many words, propose to "cashier" him; but, in every other respect, their paragraphs bore a perfect resemblance to your seditious harangues at the Shakespeare Tavern.

The Consul, who had been a witness of the consequences resulting from despising the press, resolved to disarm betimes an enemy, which, if suffered to continue its attacks, might become more formidable than any he had overcome. He, therefore, as far as related to himself and his government, put an end to the liberty of the English press. To enter into a detailed description of the means and the manner of doing this would be useless. The thing was done; and the news-writers of this country are now, with respect to the Consul and government of France, obliged most strictly to practise that virtue, which I hope you, though late in your life, will learn during your residence in that all-regenerating country: I mean la science de se taire, or, in plain English, the art of keeping your tongue within your teeth. That these men must hate the Consul is evident. They do hate him most cordially, and they wish all mankind to make common cause with them. What, then, must be their disappointment, their mortification, their shame, and their rage, at seeing you, just at this time, amongst the foremost of the crowd, who are cringing at the feet of Buonaparté! At seeing you, "the champion of freedom"—"the man of the people"—"the patron and "protector of the press," publicly receiving the commendations of Buonaparté for having assisted his endeavours, the endeavours of him, to whom they have imputed every quality and crime that can designate a tyrant!

During the first impulse of their resentment, honest nature seems to have seized the opportunity for making a last effort to overcome their inveterate and unnatural hatred of their country; and, for a day or two, I really was in hopes, that they were about to give you up. They regretted that Mr. Fox could not find better company than Talleyrand—they were sorry that Mr. Fox should have gone to Paris just at this time—they could not perceive the necessity of Mr. Fox's waiting on such a person as Buonaparté. But, having taken a few days to cool, to consider, and to calculate, and having, perhaps, received, in the mean time, explanations from your more confidential friends here, or from yourself, they began to change their tone; and, on the third or fourth day, gave a quite different turn to the thing itself, as well as to their sentiments respecting it. The visit was now become very proper. "So high a character as Mr. Fox could not avoid it, living in the metropolis of the "Chief Consul, and indebted for favours "in his literary researches, without giving "an affront, which it is not in the nature of "Mr. Fox to give to any one;" and, on this account, they excused you for having, by your attendance at the Consular levee, given Buonaparté consequence in the eyes of the world. That Buonaparté, to whom princes make a pilgrimage for the purpose of obtaining a knowledge of their fate, who is the sole and absolute disposer of titles and of dominions; that such a man should derive consequence in the world, because he has been visited by Charles Fox, by the poor forlorn and fallen patriot, who has been supplanted by Sir Francis Burdett, and who actually blubbered, at the desertion of the Covent Garden mob, who thought that to chair him after his last election was an office too vile even for them, the vilest of mankind, to submit to; to suppose, that the homage of such a man could give consequence to Buonaparté is, indeed, to be most brutally stupid; but this was the turn which these expert politicians chose to give to the affair, and the good-natured public are now left to believe, that your visit to Paris has no other object than that of searching manuscripts, and that it will be attended with no other consequence than that of exalting Buonaparté in the opinions of mankind.

That man, however, who does really believe this, must be blessed with an uncommon portion of credulity. For my own part, I am fully persuaded, that far other motives led to this visit, and that consequences widely different will probably result therefrom. I am not apt to be suspicious, but, when, to use the language of the French official paper, "the first man in "England meets, tête-à-tête, the First Consul of France," I cannot so soon forget the late meeting at Memel, which was, at first, attributed to mere whim, but the consequences of which have proved, that the parties did not meet merely to compliment each other, though that was given out as their only object.

It is impossible to state positively and precisely what was the real object of your visit to Buonaparté; but a tolerably correct opinion, with respect to it, may, perhaps, be formed from a review of your conduct since the signature of the preliminary treaty.

When the disgraceful terms of that treaty were first made known, there were persons sanguine enough to believe, that you would not give it your approbation; that, in spite of the long workings of faction, you still loved your country, and never would voluntarily sanction the deed by which she was dishonoured. Others were of a different opinion. Though, on one hand, they could not but perceive a fair opportunity for retrieving your character, and of obtaining the forgiveness, at least, of all genuine Englishmen, they could, on the other, see nothing to hope for in the friend and advocate of Fitzgerald and O'Connor. This opinion, which I, for one, entertained from the beginning, you took a very early opportunity to verify. In the speech, delivered at the Shakespeare, on the 10th of October last, which was at once the anniversary of your triumph over loyalty in Westminster, and the day of the arrival of that treaty, by which the triumph of France over England was acknowledged, and proclaimed to the world; in that speech, you, even at the time of its delivery, appeared to me to be paving the way for the very steps, which you have now taken. You congratulated the factious dupes, who were spending their time and money upon you, on the return of peace, and repeatedly declared, that the terms of it you considered as of no consequence. "The peace," said you, "is glorious to France and to the First Consul, and I rejoice at it. We have not gained the object of the war, and I like the peace so much the better."—"France has set an example, which will be highly useful to all the nations of the earth, and above all to Great Britain."—"I fear, that, from the nature of the contest, in which you have been engaged, you may have contracted principles of admiration for unlimited monarchy, but the peace, followed up by a good understanding between the two countries, will do them away. I hope we shall return to the temper which we were in, when we reckoned the time of the expulsion of James II. a glorious æra, when we, cashiered one King, and elected another."—It was suspected, that the "remarkable coincidence of events," noticed by Mr. Eiskine, was not quite accidental, and that the ratification of the treaty was retarded for no other purpose than that it might arrive in London on the anniversary of that day, which you and your partizans have chosen for offering an annual insult to your Sovereign and to the sense and loyalty of the country. This suspicion was strongly corroborated by the words of a song, which was "written for the occasion," and which, that all might be of a piece, issued from the lips of a hired singer:

"Blest be the man by Heav'n design'd
 "To set the world from slavery free;
 "In every age, in every clime,
 "His matchless fame eternal be."
 "Hail! love's peace, with olive crown'd,
 "O, come, and spread thy blessings round!"

What "man" was meant here, as the person designed by Heaven to deliver the world from slavery, one might have doubted, had it not been for a little piece of printed paper, which was handed round to the convives, and which had on it a red liberty cap between the letters N.B. the initials of NEAPOLÉONE BUONAPARTÉ, with the following device beneath: "to the man whose glorious victories have given peace to the world."

After reading this, who will wonder, that you are now in Paris? Who will wonder at the pompous eulogium bestowed on you by the Moniteur, at the gracious reception given you by Buonaparté, at the compliments paid you by "the man by heaven designed to set the world from slavery free," or at the long conversations which you have had with that man? And who will not easily guess at the subject of those conversations?

Buonaparté, we are told by the Moniteur, informed you of a fact extremely interesting, and, to most people, somewhat new. "There are, Mr. Fox," said he, "but two nations in the world, one of which occupy the East, and the other the West. The English, the French, the Germans, the Italians, &c. living under the same civil code, having the same manners, the same customs, and almost the same religion, are all members of one family; and those men who wish to re-kindle war among them, are advocates for civil war. These principles, Sir, you have maintained in your speeches, with an energy which does equal honour to your head and your heart."—Really! I did not know this before. I have read falsehood and nonsense enough under the title of speeches of Mr. Fox; but never did I know, till informed of it by the First Consul, that you had maintained, in those speeches, that the English, French, Germans, Italians, &c. (mind the et cetera) made but one family, and all lived under the same civil code. If this be so, however, it is pretty evident, that Buonaparté is at the head of all this family; France is the home of it, and England, like Italy, is no more than a branch, or colony, which may be governed by a Vice President. I do not say, that you view the matter in this light; but, the First Consul, "the man by heaven designed to set "the world from slavery free," certainly does view it in this light, or else his words amount to nothing more than mere gibberish. The Moniteur does not inform us whether the Chief Consul discoursed with you about the English revolution, that "glorious time when we cashiered one King "and elected another in his stead." This topic, so delicious to all those, who, like the Consul and you, are such ardent and sincere friends of liberty, was, probably, reserved for a tête-à-tête. I do not know, that I have to accuse myself of being over curious, but I should really like to have heard what passed between you on this head.

Accuse me not of dealing in dark and cowardly innuendos: to convince you that I do not, I will now tell you plainly, that I am sincerely persuaded, that the only object of your journey to Paris and of your visits to Buonaparté, was to make yourself minister of this country by his means. You have long despaired, and not without good reason, of any efficient support here. The respectable part of your friends have dropped away from you by degrees; and other demagogues of more nerve and activity than yourself have supplanted you in the hearts of the rabble: so that, as to interest, of any kind, in this country, you have none worth speaking of; not so much, at any rate, as could possibly procure you even a subaltern situation amongst the servants of the king. Thus circumstanced, you had, I believe, previous to the peace, fallen into a state of indifference with respect to politics. That event seems to have roused your dormant ambition. During the long season of the prosperity, the honour, the glory of England, you were perfectly insensible; but her shame, her disgrace, the prospect of her speedy ruin and destruction, awakened you from your torpor, excited your exultation, and animated your hopes. You knew the treaty to be disgraceful and pregnant with mischief; you did, I dare say, perceive the opportunity which offered for retrieving your character and consequence by an honourable and honest display of those anti-gallican sentiments, which you formerly affected to entertain; but this road to the summit of your wishes was too long, presented too many obstacles, required more patience, more fortitude, more courage, and infinitely more real patriotism than you ever had at your command. The friendship of Buonaparté might well be regarded as more efficacious than all these virtues put together. You might readily, and, indeed, not unreasonably, hope, that the man, who had been able to impose such a peace upon the country, would also be able to impose a minister upon the king; and, as to the choice of that minister, you might be very certain, that he who had demanded and obtained the release of Napper Tandy, could have no objection either to the principles or the person of the friend of O'Connor.

There will be little need of force to effect this object. The recommendations of superiors are tantamount to commands; and it would be perfectly natural for Buonaparté to recommend, as prime minister of England, the only man in it, who understands, and who has supported the principles, according to which "the English, the French, "the Germans, the Italians, et cetera, are all "but one nation;" the man who has repeatedly declared, that England is enslaved, and who has publicly given his sanction to the sentiment, that Buonaparté is designed by heaven to free the world from slavery. That the Chief Consul and the honest Talleyrand would interfere in the internal affairs of this country nobody can believe, who has heard the speeches of Lords Hawkesbury and Castlereagh, or who has attended to that most excellent illustration of them—the current transactions in Germany; but, Buonaparté may, without incurring the charge of interference, make a tender of his advice, especially as the French and English are now "one nation:" he may, at any rate, just venture to hint (through the channel of the Moniteur, at least), that Mr. Fox is the only English statesman who possesses his esteem, and who has influence enough with him to preserve to this country "the blessings of peace." This is the spell by which we are bound. Only let the people (in their present degraded temper) be thoroughly convinced, that your exaltation is absolutely necessary to the preservation of peace, and the Hawkesburys will be summoned to surrender their places, upon precisely the same principle, as that on which they surrendered Malta and the Cape.

Exactly how you will proceed, I cannot, of course, pretend to say. Nor will I lengthen out a letter, which is already too long, with an anticipation of the joy, which the republican prints in London will soon begin to express at the good understanding existing between you and the Chief Consul; and as to a serious exposure of your pretended motives for visiting Paris, to wit, the examination of the manuscripts of the Scotch College, you will certainly not be so unreasonable as to require it at any hands. I cannot, however, conclude without asking, on this subject, a few questions, which will not, I hope, be deemed impertinent, and to which I think the public have a right to expect an answer.—What need had you to see the manuscripts, which it is pretended you went to examine? If you hoped to find in them something wherewith to add to your cowardly libels against the House of Stuart (libels for which you ought to have been called to account long enough ago) could you not have deputed some one to make the examination, especially as, from the well-known state of your eye-sight, it is absolutely impossible for you to read a single line of the manuscripts? But, suppose, for a moment, that you were really obliged to go to Paris on this affair, was Arthur O'Connor obliged to meet you at Calais, and to pass the evening with you tête-à-tête? Was he, soon after your arrival at Paris, obliged to follow you thither, in the company and in the carriage of Lord Oxford; and was Mr. Erskine obliged to break off from the enchantments of a jubilee, in order to meet you, in the capital of the world? Did all these, together with Mr. Adair, and many other persons of the same description; did they want to read the manuscripts too?—Again: to what are we to attribute the military honours, paid you at Calais, at St. Omers, at Lisle, &c. &c.? Soldiers, and particularly the soldiers of Buonaparté, do not move without orders: the garrisons of these towns knew nothing of Charles Fox; they had, I dare say, never heard your name: must not your reception, then, be ascribed to directions which they had received from their superiors? And does not this prove that Buonaparté was not only apprized of your intended visit, but minutely informed of all the circumstances of the time and manner of it? I have already spoken of the personal notice which Buonaparté has taken of you; but, how came Buonaparté's wife to break through the rules of her court, in favour of Mrs. Fox, who is the only English woman (not before presented to the queen) whom Mrs. Buonaparté has condescended to receive? Why this marked exception? And here let me ask too, by way of conclusion, how your marriage, which had been a secret for eight years, should have been divulged just at this time? The motives, whether good or bad, from which that secret had been kept, must have been very powerful indeed, by what still more powerful motives, then, were they, at last, overcome?—"I pause for a reply," and am, in the mean time,

Your humble Servant,

WM. COBBETT.

London, Sept. 12, 1802.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

American States.—The only intelligence which we have from America is of a melancholy nature: the yellow fever appears to have revisited Philadelphia and Baltimore.

Paris, Sept. 5.—They write from Dijon, that Toussaint Louverture has been lodged in the Château de Joux, near Pontarlier, in the department of Doubs. His escort returned through Dijon on the 30th ult.

The audience given on the 3d to the Corps Diplomatique by the First Consul, was more brilliant and more numerous than any that preceded it. It is, indeed, a grand, solemn, and affecting sight, to see this assemblage of all the ambassadors of Europe restored to peace. What added to the interest of this audience was, the presence of a man who had defended with so much ability that peace which had been conquered by so much glory. It was at this audience that Fox was presented.—Among the English who surrounded the ambassador, we remarked great Lords and Peers of the United Kingdom; but national pride imposed silence upon all other pride, and Fox, the patriot Fox, was placed in the front rank even by the Peers; it was not only Mr. Merry, it was the whole English deputation, that presented the first man of England to the First Consul of France.—It must have been to Mr. Fox one of the sweetest moments of his life; and the distinguished reception from the Chief of the Nation must have been the best recompence for the contests which that friend to peace maintained in Parliament, against the misserables, who had the tremendous courage to call for war.—Twice did the First Consul accost him, and among many flattering things said, "that there were in the world but two nations; the one inhabits the east and the other the west. The English, French, Germans, Italians, &c. under the same civil code, having the same manners, the same habits, and almost the same religion, are all members of the same family, and the men who wish to light up again the flame of war among them, wish for civil war. These principles, Sir, were developed in your speeches with an energy that does as much honour to your heart as to your head."—Alderman Combe, the late Lord Mayor of London, was presented at the same audience; and the Consul said to him, that the firm and paternal conduct he had adopted, during the scarcity in London, ensured him the esteem and gratitude of all governments, and of all statesmen.—Mr. Fox dined the same day with the First Consul, who had a very long conversation with him in presence of a numerous company.

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES.

His Royal Highness, MONSIEUR, and suite, lately paid a visit to Huntley Lodge. As soon as it was known that these illustrious travellers were on their way to the Lodge, the farmers on the Duke's estates in Rhynie, Gairly, Cairny, and the Aughtanfourty-daugh, assembled on horseback, and together with the inhabitants of Huntley, and an immense concourse of people on foot, went as far as the Binn-hill to meet them, and conveyed them to Huntley Lodge. His Royal Highness seemed much gratified with the attention paid to him on this occasion.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

So many and so important are the events and transactions, which, during the last ten or fifteen days, have pressed themselves upon our notice, that we must, in the present sheet, content ourselves with a bare enumeration of them.

The Aulic Rescript, (vide p. 333) together with the note of the Bohemian minister, (p. 335) relative to the occupation of Passau and other places, have, as may well be supposed, had a sensible effect at the Diet. A counter note (336) has been delivered in by the French and Russian ministers. The papers must, we think, be regarded as mere protests; but, it is of some importance, that the Emperor has had the courage to protest. He has, in some small degree at least, already pursued the line of conduct marked out by our intelligent correspondent, Agricola, (p. 299), and we are not without some hopes, that he will continue to be actuated by the same principle. Austria is yet a great power. Her population is immense, her people brave and faithful, her warlike resources of every kind are abundant, and were she once completely emancipated from the thralldom, in which she is held by the "philosophic and philanthropic" politics of Prince Charles, she might yet resist and overcome, the combination, which is forming against her.—Russia is, thanks to the peace-making ministers of England, totally given up to the views of France. Lord Grenville, in his famous speech upon the Convention with Russia, dwelt, with great emphasis and pleasure, on the warm friendship which existed between this country and Russia. How sudden and how fearful has been the change! Lord St. Helens is now returning home: it is time: the effect of his mission does equal honour to himself and to those by whom he was recommended to his Majesty:—the treaty of peace with America—the Convention of St. Petersburg—the partition of Germany—such are the transactions which will ever connect themselves with the name of Lord St. Helens.—In our next sheet we shall take a view, still more extensive than we have hitherto done, of the consequences of the late convention between France and Russia. It is a subject which has attracted great public attention. Those very persons, who, at the time of making the peace, were loudest against "continental connexions," now begin to be alarmed. Mr. Windham, in the Appendix to his Speech on the Preliminaries, has given an excellent description of these voise-acres, who, after a century of defeat and contempt, had, at last, triumphed over the wisdom and honour of the nation.

To the treaty between France and the Porte, which will be found in our last sheet (page 289), we now add (page 337) a note from the Reis Effendi, addressed to our minister at that court, dated on the 29th July last, by which we also, are permitted to navigate, and trade in, the Black Sea, a privilege obtained by France in the treaty above mentioned. That we, who have been the saviours of Turkey, should obtain from her favours equal to those obtained by a power which, in the midst of profound peace, invaded her territory and endeavoured to subvert her government, is certainly no very great proof of the vigilance, the skill, or the consequence, of our diplomatic persons in that country; but, what shall be said of Lord Elgin, when it is known, that, had it not been for his neglect, what has now been granted to put us upon a level with the French, we should have been in full enjoyment of more than two years ago. It was the subject of an application from our ambassador in 1799, and the grant was communicated, in nearly the same manner that it is now, on the 30th of October, of that year. All that was wanted was to settle the mode of execution; to determine the custom-house rates, &c. &c. This Lord Elgin never did: the right remained unenjoyed, and we have now had to beg it as a new favour, which, by hazard, we have obtained.

The manner, in which Buonaparté has settled his dispute with the Dey of Algiers, and particularly certain passages of the report, which honest Talleyrand has made on the subject, will demand our attention, when we shall find room to insert the documents themselves.

The Americans have, as appears from a notice of their Consul (page 338) come to an accommodation with the Emperor of Morocco, whether by another tribute, or not, we are not informed. On this subject see Vol. I. p. 1190.

Toussaint, the negro hero, is, at last, safe lodged in a French prison for life. Leclerc has plucked him up from the mountains of St. Domingo (where our wise ministers thought he would maintain an everlasting war) and has planted him in the mountains of the Jura! We cannot join in the censure, which the philanthropists are bestowing on Buonaparté for his conduct towards this slave. It is, in our opinion, impossible to have taken a more humane method of preventing him from doing mischief. Men talk about Toussaint's property. What property has he? All he ever possessed he stole from the white inhabitants of St. Domingo. The fair way would be, however, to send him back to Africa; and we sincerely wish he were delivered up to the Company of Sierra Leone.

The Consul and government of France seem to give great attention to the affairs of commerce. The reports from St. Domingo, Guadaloupe, and Martinico (which latter has been taken possession of by their governor) are very favourable. They must, in a very short time, supplant us in the European market for West-India produce. To injure us in our manufactures will be a work of more time; but the time will come, if the dominion and influence of France continue to be what they are now. The custom-house account, for the two last quarters, which we shall insert in our next, will by no means bear the conclusion, which has been attempted to be drawn from it; and this must be clearly perceived by those who have brought it forward; but their object is to put off the evil day, which they well know must come, but which they hope will not come in their time.

The funds have taken a sudden rise. It is Buonaparté's interest that they should. They will fall again, whenever that interest requires that they should fall. He has the "capital, credit, and confidence" of this nation in his hand.

General ANDROSSI is, it seems, to make his public entry into London on the first day of the French year. The General brings with him commercial agents, one of whom is to be placed at each of our sea-ports. We doubt not that the General will receive considerable information, respecting the state of things in this country, from Mr. Fox, who, by the bye, would not make a bad Mentor to this diplomatic Telemachus.

Much interest has been excited in the public mind respecting an application from Buonaparté to expell the French Princes. All we think it right to say, at present, on this subject is, that we hope and trust, that the last drop of English blood would be shed sooner than we should agree to that proposition; for, after such an act of infamy, life would be a curse.

The war between the small Cantons of Switzerland and the government, which the French have invented for that country, still continues. If left to themselves, it is possible, that the rebels, as they are called, would prevail; but, there can be no doubt, that, whenever the French find things ripe for interference, they will interfere. It is, to say the truth, of little consequence how much the Swiss suffer. They have ever been a most wicked and mischievous nation. A nest of little republics in the heart of Europe could have been suffered to exist so long only by the fatal jealousy of kings. People may repeat the cant of Voltaire, Rousseau, and the other philosophers, respecting the wisdom and virtues of the Swiss, they may tell us of the independent spirit, the patriotism, the innate love of liberty, of this "brave and inoffensive race;" but, for our parts, we shall never forget that they hired themselves out to fight for any power that would pay them, no matter against whom, or for what cause. Point d'argent, point de Suisse, is a well known proverb in a country where the character of the Swiss was best understood. In short, we do not and cannot like them: they have been, and are yet, the troublers of Europe; their country has always been a receptacle for the libellers of monarchs and monarchies. From those little miserable worthless Cantons have issued no small portion of all the miscreants, whose projects of liberty have finally enslaved the world. We hope, that Switzerland will not, at last, go to augment the power of our enemy; but we would prefer even that to its remaining an independent republic, under which name and form it will ever be to Europe what a band of United Irishmen is to a kingdom.

A letter from St. Petersburg is said to state, that the Emperor Alexander has refused to accede to the request of this country, to guarantee Malta. This may be unfounded, but it agrees with what was thought, and even predicted, by many persons, at the time of concluding the treaty of Amiens, and it is, in some sort, corroborated by an article of intelligence from Gibraltar, which states, that the British troops were not about to evacuate Malta, so soon, at least, as was expected, and that, the paymaster-general of the army there, who had arrived at Gibraltar, on his way to England, had been remanded, and had actually returned to Malta. The report, therefore, is by no means incredible. The Emperor Alexander's hostility to England is very great; and, there is no good reason why he should guarantee Malta, the only object of which guarantee must be to prevent the island from being seized on by the French, to the prejudice of England. In his present disposition towards us, and with his present engagements to France, his guarantee could, indeed, be regarded as no very great security; but he, doubtless, feels no inclination to commit an act of perfidy, especially when he has no motive for so doing.

POSTSCRIPT.

PUBLIC PAPERS.

Report made to the First Consul of France (in Senate), Sept. 7, 1802, relative to the Treaty with Turkey, (See the Treaty, p. 289.)

The distinguishing characteristic of that period in the policy of nations which has ended in the general peace, was a striking opposition of their sentiments and conduct to their true interests. States and kingdoms were betrayed into wars and alliances by a sort of blind fatality. Some made common cause with one another without suppressing their mutual hatred; others, amid mutual hostilities, still continued to wish one another well. In that dissolution of the mutual relations of the states and kingdoms of Europe, which had been long approaching, the accustomed diplomatic law lost all force and truth. Its traditions, its maxims, its local regulations, became vain; and, amidst the confusion of the change, more than one government quite lost sight of the dearest interests, and are themselves menaced with danger, from those habits of policy which they had been accustomed to think the safest, and abandoned itself in this distribution of just counsels, to the vainest terrors, and the most imprudent projects. Such, in particular, were the condition and conduct of the Sublime Porte, at that period of the war when Europe, with astonishment, saw this government take part with the enemies of France. The Sublime Porte soon saw its error; indeed, both at home and abroad, it could discern nothing but what was adapted to make it regret the part it had taken. It saw the conqueror, faithful to his declarations, when he occupied a province of the Ottoman Empire, rule over it with wisdom, make provision for its future prosperity, and even when, by an unprovoked declaration of war, it became a lawful conquest, still to evince by his respect for the manners and the religion of the vanquished, that his primary intentions were unchanged. France, instead of desiring to hurt the prosperity or diminish the strength of Turkey, had, at that time, no view but to render it happier and more powerful, by introducing into it new elements of civilization, and by opening through its provinces a grand channel for the commerce of the world. But the Ottoman government had entered into engagements of which it could not clearly foresee the effects: it was the last to enter into a war by which it had nothing to gain; and was, of course, the last to renounce hostilities. It was till after peace had been concluded among the powers of Europe, that the Ottoman government found itself perfectly free to negotiate. But from the first moment of its being at liberty to treat with France, the two Empires have been mutually at peace. By the treaty of the 25th of June, that peace is complete. That treaty entirely restores the relations which formerly subsists between the two powers. It makes full provision for the interests and wants of the Ottoman Empire, for the interests and the glory of France. The public joy at Constantinople, when this treaty was proclaimed, was such as to prove how highly the friendship of France was there valued. Great errors, great dangers had distinguished the conduct and condition of the Ottoman government, while it was at war with France. That government now trusts to find the difficulties of its situation constantly alleviated by the friendly counsels of a power that takes a sincere concern in its welfare. By the treaty, due provision is happily made for the interest of French commerce. French citizens engaged in the Turkish trade will now recover their sequestered property, their wonted privileges, and their wonted ascendancy among the other merchants of Europe trading to the same countries. The compensations due to them are secured by an express stipulation. The honour of France, and the dignity of its government, demanded an abolition of certain restrictions, to which its navigation had been hitherto subject. They are abolished, and the navigation of the Black Sea, now free to France, opens to us a communication with the Southern provinces of Russia. The Sovereign of that country, more enlightened than to stoop to the prejudices of vulgar jealousy, knows that whatever opens new channels to the industry of any one nation, is in fact useful to the industry of all. The Sublime Porte wanted only the friendship of France. By the peace which has been concluded, it acquires of that all the benefits. Before it opens a new æra of quiet and security. It can resume its ancient maxims. And in the multiplied communications of our trade, with its dominions in Europe, Africa, and Asia; and in the return of mutual confidence between the two governments; it will find all that it wants, to enable it long to maintain the safe and honourable condition to which it has been restored. (Signed) C. M. Talleyrand.

The following is a Copy of the Original Grant which is recognised and renewed in the Rescript (See p. 337) presented to Mr. Stratton, and recorded in the public Register of the Chancery of the British Factory at Constantinople.

"The friendship and good intelligence which subsist since the most remote times, between the Sublime Port of Solid Glory, and the Court of England, being now crowned by an alliance, founded on principles of the most inviolable sincerity and cordiality; and these new bands thus strengthened between the two courts, having hitherto produced a series of reciprocal advantages, it is not presumptuous to suppose that their salutary fruits will be reaped still more abundantly in time to come. Now, after mature reflection on the representations that the English Minister Plenipotentiary residing at the Sublime

Porte, our very esteemed friend Spencer Smith, has made relative to the privilege of navigation in the Black Sea, for the merchant vessels of his nation; representations that he has reiterated, both in writing and verbally, in conformity to his instructions, and with a just confidence in the lively attachment of the Porte towards his court. Therefore, to give a new proof of these sentiments, as well as of the hopes entertained by the Sublime Porte, of seeing henceforward a multiplicity of new fruits spring from the connexion that has been renewed between the two courts, the assent granted to the before-named Minister's solicitations, is hereby sanctioned as a sovereign concession and gratuitous act on the part of his Imperial Majesty, and to take full and entire effect as soon as farther amicable conferences shall have taken place, with the minister our friend, for the purpose of determining the burthen of the English vessels, the mode of transit by the Canal of Constantinople, and such other regulations and conventions as appertain to the object, and which shall be as exactly maintained and observed with regard to the English navigation, as towards any other the most favoured nation. And in order that the minister, our friend, do inform his court of this valuable grant, the present rescript has been drawn up and delivered to him.—Constantinople, 1. Jemazi-ul-Evvell, A. H. 1214, 30th October, A. D. 1799.

TO THE EDITOR.*

Stockholm, Aug. 20, 1802.

Sir,—We observe that it is your opinion (see Register, p. 152), that the remarks contained in our Letter of the 5th of July, (see Register, p. 129) will be considered by the leading politicians of your country as ridiculous projects. Pray, Sir, as a well-wisher of your native land, will you be pleased to inform its rulers, that at this time there are to be procured charts, with descriptions of four very remarkable modern military expeditions, to wit,—One conducted by a Nadir-Chab from Ispahan to Deli and back by the Caspian Sea—One by a General Saxovorev from the Nieper in Russia to the Var on the Italian frontiers of France—One by Buonaparté from Toulon to Cairo and St. Jean d'Acre—And one by General Leclerc from Brest to St. Domingo.—Were these charts and descriptions put into English, and properly explained by a person of talents and prophetic sagacity, such a person per example, as he who translated, and wrote the notes on Buonaparté's intercepted letters, we are persuaded they would be to John Bull as good as a pinch of Scots snuff,

* Note of the Editor.—This letter comes from the same gentleman, who favoured us with the letter, from the same place, dated 5th July, which will be found in page 129 of this volume.—That letter conveyed to the British public, and even to the British Ministry, the first intimation that either of them received of the new division of Germany.

they would clear his eyes and make him see further beyond the end of his nose than he appears to do. These said charts, if you, Sir, lay along-side of them a fair draught of your treaty of Amiens with Lord Cornwallis and Mr. Merry's remarks, and a sketch of the Prime Consul's diplomacy since that treaty was ratified,* will, we presume, make all the extravagance of our before-mentioned letter disappear; and will shew you to woeful demonstration the easy possibility of carrying the sublime plan of the august Buonaparté into execution. You will see, Sir, what never ought to have been seen: you will see Russia and France hand-in-hand, with—not a paper map (that's your share) but with the real material globe under their joint command, and at their immediate disposal.

Out of the junction of France and Russia you will see come forth a Consulta, containing: 1st. A chart, whereon is marked and definitively settled the frontiers of the several arrondissements into which Europe is to be divided: the ranks and titles of the respective prefects, princes, electors, kings, and consuls, are marked on the margin with a lead pencil†. 2d. A charter, wherein the liberty of the sea, an universal reciprocité in trade and intercourse, and free ships, free goods, are allowed to the contracting parties, at least, for a time, or until the British trident shall lose its teeth.‡ This charter shall be signed and sworn to by the several prefects, princes, electors, kings, and consuls as they enter into office; and Mr. President Jefferson shall be invited to be a principal party. In case some British ambassador, more adroit than ordinary, should find out, in a foreign newspaper, by his hair-dresser, or through a chère amie, that the other articles in this Consulta are not exactly correspondent with the repeated declarations of your peace-makers, to justify

* The Consul's negotiations cannot be unknown to Lord Hawkesbury, who has the admired Mr. Merry at Paris. Pray, Mr. Editor, did that minister say, in his dispatch, what the Consul admired him and his countrymen for—whether for the loyal phrase of the patriotic colonel, or for the brilliant wit and dignity of the ambassador on that occasion.

† Notes of the Editor.—When our correspondent wrote his letter, he did not know that the honest Talleyrand would so soon oblige us with this chart, which has lately been presented to the Diet of Ratisbon.

‡ This alludes to a second convention, not yet published, between France and Russia, and of which some intimation has leaked out, in several parts of the Continent. It was mentioned in the Hamburg papers three weeks ago.

the penetration of Lord Hawkesbury, and not to set the meek Addington in a rage before the time, the publication of several points, such as those respecting the organization of Persia and Turkey, the emancipation of Hindostan, and the *appropriation of Brasil, with other matters, will be postponed until the contracting parties have so disposed their respective forces as to insure the complete realization of their plan: for example—until the French have in America and the West-Indies a force sufficient to secure Brazil (your islands will fall of themselves); until her depôts at the Cape and the Isle de France be properly seconded with a naval depôt and station at the Comoro Islands. These matters will now soon be accomplished; and in the mean time the Russian army will have procured (sneer who pleases) a free passage through the tracks explored by Tahmas-Kouly-Khan. —Now, Sir, 60,000 French European troops in the West-Indies and America, a Russian General Maskofskai Gubernator in Persia, with a proper suit, and every port between Archangel and Bombay in a state to bar out the British flag, will Buonaparté's project of confining the British empire to its European islands appear still extravagant and ridiculous? Or is it the attempt to send such armies to Persia and America that appears extravagant to your modest men? In that case pray be so good as to inform them that the difficulties are already, or by the time you will receive this, surmounted. And as to the extravagance of shutting the ports of Europe and Africa against John Bull's horns, a glimpse of the treaty whereon his lordship signed away Malta and the Cape, will perfectly satisfy those who have ordinary eyes.—We foreigners are forced to look upon John Bull as being a quiet kind of a man! We recollect his ministers asserted lately, and it went down like laudum, "that although the peace of Amiens" should not be of long duration, yet it was "a good one, as it gave government time" to recruit its resources by a saving economy! Should John attempt another war, pray, Sir, will these promised savings reinstate him in the possessions he held at the peace? No: nor will they, with the whole property he has remaining, enable him to preserve the possessions he yet retains. Pray, Sir, which are most culpable in the eyes of the rational part of mankind, those persons who upset the throne of the Bourbons, and extended the dominion of France over half the world, or those, who, whether from ignorance or pusillanimity, or whatever other quality or motive, have surrendered not only the out-works, but also the bulwarks of their country, into the hands of its most powerful and implacable enemy? *

Sir, if John Bull would like to read the preface of Buonaparté's Consulta with Russia and Prussia, we think the Regency of Hanover would procure you a copy from Ratisbon: it is not ill worth reading to those who understand what they read.† Some family affairs, such as the birth-day of the Empress Dowager of Russia, a déjeuné given at Charlottenburg to Ambassador Alopeus by the Queen of Prussia, and the ——— of Madame Buonaparté, have hitherto prevented these respective courts from answering the repeated memorials of H. B. M. on the subject of indemnification; but they will be taken into consideration, as soon as the other parties are in settled possession of their several allotments. The dictatorial ministers say, this mode of proceeding is perfectly agreeable to Mr. Addington and Co.—Christian children, after giving away John's cloak, are resigned to give the coat and breeches also!

You would have nothing in the Mediterranean; well, Buonaparté and his ally Alexander are not so scrupulous; nor are they so ungrateful to their friends as you are: they have got Candia, Cypris, the Grecian Islands in the Archipelago, Negrepont, the Moréa, &c. disposed of—but you will

* Madam Buonaparté says, that the French have long been deceived with respect to the national character of the English. "Meanly running after the meanest of things; sheepish and cringing to the bold and powerful, bold and insolent to the timid and the weak; cowards in the field, brutes at the table, and men only amongst horses and w———."†

† Note of the Editor.—It must be confessed, that the peace of Amiens, so mean, so dishonourable, so base an act, justifies almost any thing that the foes of this country can say, or conceive, of its inhabitants; but, though we may yield to Madam Buonaparté's superior judgment on some of the qualities she attributes to our countrymen, we cannot do the same as to the others; and, we are persuaded, that her husband, unless he has forgotten the deeds of Sir Sidney Smith as completely as the British government seems to have done, will acknowledge, that there is one Englishman, at least, who is not a coward in the field.

† Note of the Editor.—The writer here alludes to the convention and declaration of France and Russia, which was not published on the 20th of August, the date of his letter.

* Terms, which, in consideration of the delicate ears (we are not afraid of the eyes) of Mr. Addington, we have substituted for the unmannerly phrases, conquest and partition.

have the particulars ere this time from Lord Elgin, a most active, and penetrating minister, whose mission has been useful to himself, and, no doubt, to his country also.

Mr. Editor, as it is a well known fact that, by the bulls and bores of John's cabinet, he lost America, and has added that now formidable power to his other enemies; and as it is equally well known that John's present bulls have no horns, (we mean political, not domestic horns) we would have you request of him to send out the experienced negotiators of Amiens to wind up his affairs with the native sovereigns of India: for you may assure him, upon the authority of the combined world with Buonaparté and Alexander at its head, that that oriental star will as certainly be plucked out of his cap, as it is certain that a Mr. Addington and a Lord Hawkesbury are his conductors or states pilot; should they themselves weather the storm, then pray to the clement Consul to have mercy upon the crew! if your peace-makers have prepared for themselves a reward in the kingdom of heaven, and are not disposed soon to take possession, you should beseech them to provide a birth there for their countrymen also; for a year or two more in peace will bring your earthly kingdom nearly to a close.

August 24.

A few days ago we inclosed a few remarks upon the political occurrences of the day—if you will give any part or paragraph of them a place in your interesting Register you will oblige one of its readers.

Perhaps, Sir, you may think us Swedes and Danes inimical to the British government—believe us, we are not. We are, and have dire cause to be, angry with those men who have driven us under the iron knout of a sovereign foe; and who have brought their own country to the brink of, shall we say, inevitable ruin. The political influence of Great-Britain annihilated, our bondage is consolidated.

Sir, with the independent friendship of Sweden and Denmark, little as you think of us, you had the Baltic open to your trade, and your navy with ours could have regulated the affairs of Germany, Turkey, Persia, &c. at the gates of Petersburg. With Malta or other invulnerable ports in that quarter, you prevented the junction of France and Russia at Constantinople or in the Black Sea; and you controlled their operations. We repeatedly offered your ministers not only our friendship but our co-operation, without subsidy or other consideration, our own independency was motive enough to us; but they spurned at our advances, and treated our sovereigns with contempt; and although the power of Austria be broken down and set out of the question, you have given up the Mediterranean and its coasts on both sides, to be possessed and appropriated by the Consul and his friends!

If you think we cannot shut the Baltic, you will be undeceived when too late: then says John Bull, "the fools lose more than we do!"—Sir, we lesser powers will lose, we know, and therefore we courted your friendship; but that you will interrupt the operations of our mistress Russia by blocking in her maritime trade—you may as well pretend to arrest the currents in the pacific ocean: and whatever she undertakes we must second. When Buonaparté is ready, or before he provokes a quarrel with men like yours, the British fleet nor a British ship will have neither port nor point where to fill a cask of fresh water between the Lands-end to Botany Bay. Let your ministers laugh if they please: of those who laugh at every thing, and blush at nothing, little can be expected.

But, Mr. Editor, let us not give up all hope—it is yet possible, perhaps, to save something. Request of John Bull, Sir, to employ a calculator or two, who know the criterion whereby to measure the powers and stability of a state, whose sources and vital springs are detached from one another and lie at certain distances, and who can compare the result with the powers of a state whose force issues from its centre; let him then personally review his troops, and compose his etat-major of such officers and men as have seen service, and as hold a certain rank personally as well as in the opinion of the public. The throne is an old chair, if you will keep it on its legs you must not make it a play thing for boys. A French scribbler reproached Frederick II. once, that, his Majesty preferred birth to talents—the king said, "flowering shrubs are pretty enough, and may have their use in the window seats of my cabinet; but old oaks shade my dwelling." Should you find John disposed to take any notice of these hints, then, Sir, beg of him to look at, and speak with, his diplomatic agents, before he sends them abroad. We are sure he had no acquaintance of those late kept amongst us, or he would not have so far compromised his own reputation as to suffer his representatives to dispense with all the characteristics of gentlemen, to brave the rules of public morality, and to set common decency at defiance. The Jacobin agents of France have now changed their grossièreté into an appearance of decorum—do advise yours to do so likewise. When foreigners see, at the helm of the British empire, Britons in whom Britons can confide, and find, in the representatives of the most revered monarch upon earth, men of knowledge and of talents; then all the legitimate sovereigns in Europe will again rally round your ancient oak, and usurpation and blasphemy will hide their polluted beads in the rubbish from whence they crawled forth. But that the men, who have thrown down that bulwark which streams of blood and heaps of treasure had raised around the British empire, should ever again acquire the confidence of Europe, or be able to persuade your countrymen to open their purse or their veins to fight for enemies is impossible. O! ye shades of British heroes how your valour is rewarded! Svenska.

TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD HAWKESBURY,
His Majesty's Sec. of State for Foreign Affairs.

My Lord,—Having, in my last letter to your lordship (page 271), endeavoured to direct your attention to those points, respecting the dictatorial convention of France and Russia, which appeared to me most likely to engage the mind of an Englishman of honest intentions, but of little experience and of circumscribed views; having pointed out, the contempt shewn towards this country, the insults heaped on our sovereign and his government, the injuries which Hanover is to sustain for the sake of Great-Britain, and which the electorate is to be made the instrument of inflicting on the crown of this kingdom, I now propose to take up the general question of policy, arising out of this new partition of Germany.

But, my lord, before I enter on a train of reflections, the chief tendency of which must inevitably be to shew the evil consequences to be apprehended, to Europe in general, and to England in particular, from the insulating system, openly avowed and acted upon, by you and your colleagues, in making and defending the fatal peace of Amiens, it behoves me, to acknowledge, that such an exposition has, in some measure, been anticipated by the natural sense and involuntary expression of the public. Your lordship must recollect, that the newspapers, which, from first to last, opposed and reprobated the war, reprobated, no less severely, all that part of our political system, which has been denominated continental connexions. These prints spoke the sentiments of their readers, and it is by no means uninteresting to observe how completely those sentiments have, on this topic, been changed by the publication of the convention between Russia and France.—“The present ministers may affect to depreciate the importance of all continental connexions. Between the use and the abuse there is infinite difference. We ought neither to be the slaves of the continental powers, nor altogether indifferent to their concerns. We have an interest wherever it is practicable to oppose the extension and aggrandisement of France. This can only be done by a judicious alliance with those continental powers which have the same interest to pursue. For England to withdraw wholly from the Continent, or feebly to exert her influence, is a dishonourable abdication of a great dignity and of a great power conferred by Providence for the general happiness of mankind.”—Your lordship will scarcely believe, that this passage is extracted from the Morning Chronicle (of the 21st Sept.) from the paper which took the lead in the clamour that was, for ten years, incessantly kept up against all continental connexions; from the paper, which, under the direction of Mr. Fox and his partizans, demanded peace on any terms, and which has abused and vilified all those, who expressed their disapprobation of that very peace by which England committed this act of “dishonourable abdication;” yet, it is very true, that these are the words of that paper, and they may teach your lordship how little reliance ought to be placed on the opinions and affections of what is called the people. Whether the Beckes, the Edens, and the rest of the inland navigation politicians, whether Mr. Wilberforce and the strong corps of wise-acres, will immediately follow the example of the Morning Chronicle, is more than I can say; but I venture to assure your lordship, that, before this day twelvemonth, even the most selfish and most stupid part of the nation will have changed their way of thinking and speaking of continental connexions.

The declaration of France and Russia, proceeds, according to the report of the honest Talleyrand, upon a supposition, that the present state of Germany amounts to nothing less than a dissolution of its political body; that the whole empire has undergone a revolution, that all its federative laws and usages have been effaced, that, as to the boundaries of dominion, the map is become a perfect blank, and that France and Russia have, merely out of philanthropy and a love of justice, interfered to make a new and equitable distribution of property, of power, and of honour. Whether this supposition be admitted, or not, it has been acted upon, and, therefore, the effect is the same: the balance of Germany, internal and external, is destroyed.

Germany, my lord, in that old system of balanced power, which it has, for some time past, been the fashion to ridicule, was the weight, which, more than any other, kept the scale steady on the Continent. The empire, on one side, touched the states that formerly composed the balance of the north; and, by means of the Houses of Austria, Brandenburg, and Saxony, was connected with that balance. On the other side it touches France, and 'till now much more immediately, without any naturally defensible line of separation; and thus, it affected and influenced, most importantly for this country, what was called the middle balance, consisting of Great-Britain, France, and Spain. Again, extending round the Alps, it came into contact with the balance of Italy, and was more closely connected with that country by means of the hereditary possessions of the imperial house.

Such was the operation of the external balance of Germany on the other parts of the European system; and of this Mr. Burke says, in the first of his three profound and prophetic memorials, addressed to the ministers: "If Europe does not conceive "the independence and the equilibrium of the empire to be in the very essence of the system of balanced power in Europe, and if the scheme of public law, or mass of laws, upon which that independence and equilibrium are founded, be of no leading consequence as they are preserved or destroyed, all the politics of Europe, for more than two centuries, have been miserably erroneous."—And so, doubtless, your lordship will say they have been. This was, at any rate, the language of those who defended the treaty of Amiens, as may yet, perhaps, be seen in the profound and sprightly productions of Sir Frederick Eden and Mr. Chalmers.

With regard to our own interests, the great advantage which we derived from the former state of Germany, was, that the principal military power, the imperial house of Austria, having possessions bordering upon those of France, there was a perpetual source of jealousy between those powers, which made it necessary for our most formidable rival, who was also our constant enemy in every war, to maintain a vast army for the purpose of defence, and not, as at present, with a view to overawe, to disturb, or to subjugate, the dominions of her neighbours. Her efforts were then divided, and her operations by sea crippled. On our side, we were, in a singular manner, if not in the same degree, useful to Austria. Hence a close connexion arose; and, as the maritime power of Great-Britain was, in some measure, the Emperor's, the Emperor favoured that navigation and that commerce, which are at once the foundation of our external power and the great source of our internal prosperity and happiness. But, my lord, these politics now are become fables and tales of other days: the Burleighs and Cecils, the Temples, the Godolphins, the Walpoles, the Pelhams, and the Pitts, the founder of our foreign glory as well as the assessor of our domestic freedom, William III, and Marlborough, not less illustrious in the cabinet than in the field, are all become drivellers and idiots when compared to the "safe politicians" of the present day, to the Addingtons, the Hawkesburies, the Wilberforces, to any of that innumerable crowd of prudent men, of parliamentary wise-acres, of calculating statesmen, who, upon the first exaltation of the late minister, rushed forth from the college, the inns of court, the counting-house, and the counter, and who, at the end of eighteen years intense application, have discovered, that the commerce between Manchester and London is more profitable than that with foreign parts, that the navigation on the stormy seas is less lucrative and more hazardous than that on the grand junction canal, that military and naval glory is a mere phantom of a disordered brain, and that money is the only legitimate and effectual means of national defence.

As to the internal balance of the Germanic empire, my lord, it was necessarily connected with religious differences of opinion, and principally consisted in this, that there was an ascendancy in behalf of those of the known Roman Catholic persuasion, which was the ancient religion of the empire, and always, hitherto, that of the Emperor, while, at the same time, there was such a counterpoise in favour of the established forms of Protestant worship, as effectually secured to the members of the latter communions liberty of conscience, and a just share in the honours and dignities of the empire. The number of ecclesiastical electorates gave Austria a sure preponderance in that college, and, together with the other great Catholic prelacies, also afforded the means for providing for the younger branches of the imperial family. These electorates were essential to the internal balance of Germany; and, by securing the imperial throne to the House of Austria, they were essential also to that system of English policy, which depended on our alliance with the House of Austria against the encroaching and overspreading ambition of France.

All these component parts are (as I shall endeavour more fully to show, by and bye) now completely torn to pieces. The Germanic body is dissolved. It is now to assume some other form. However, it is not to regenerate itself. France has kindly undertaken to restore it to life. The surgeons of the Humane Society at the Thuilleries have happily succeeded in this charitable experiment for the benefit of all Europe. A Russian practitioner has been called in, but this was evidently done more to wonder at the skill and dexterity of the French operator than to assist in the operation. There is, in the report of the honest Talleyrand, a studied ostentation of the superiority of France in the negotiation; and, the result was first communicated, not to the Diet of the Empire, but to the Conservative Senate of France, a body, which certainly had nothing to do in the execution of the project, and which, neither by the first nor second of Buonaparté's constitutions, appears to have any concern with the foreign affairs of the republic, but to which, perhaps, it was, in this instance at least, intended to give some shadowy likeness to that senate, which antiently bestowed kingdoms at its discretion. Observe, too, my lord, that the communication was made to the Diet of Ratisbon in the French language only, and not accompanied, as had hitherto been the invariable custom, with a translation into Latin, the constitutional language of the empire. This has been justly remarked in a late Jacobin paper to be an indication of a disposition to universal empire; but, my lord, that which startles even those who so recently saw no danger in the aggrandizement of France, who wept over our victories, because they tended to a prolongation of our struggle against that aggrandizement, who, day after day, were clamouring and hallooing to drive their country into the toils of her pursuer, who rejoiced when she was caught by the peace of Amiens, and who liked that peace the better for having severed us from the Continent of Europe; that which startles and astounds even these men, makes no impression on his Majesty's ministers, on those "safe politicians," those cool and calculating statesmen, who, with the utmost composure, publish the receipts of their custom-house as more than a balance against all the insults and injuries which they have brought upon their country and their sovereign.

The pretext for the Consul's interference is by no means less novel than the manner of it, nor less material to be weighed and considered in this discussion. It was this: a preponderating mediation of two powers, perfectly disinterested (that is, in other words, having no right to interfere) was necessary to effect, in the internal affairs of Germany, what would in vain have been expected from the internal deliberations of the Germanic body! What extent would such a principle of interference, as this, go to; or rather, how perfectly illimitable is it? It puts the internal constitution of every country, governed by balanced powers and deliberative assemblies, totally at the mercy of the strongest. On such a pretext, France, if at peace with us, might have presented a plan for the Union of Ireland, when the measure was voted here and rejected there: she may now interfere between his Majesty's cabinet in England and the house of assembly of Jamaica; and, if her present conduct be winked at and passed over in silence, who shall say that she has not a right to interfere in any of the hundreds of disputes, which are continually arising between the federal and state governments of the American union? In short, to set up, and act upon, a pretext like this, required nothing less than the perfection of impudence and insolence, together with the consciousness of controulable power. And here, my lord, I cannot help reminding your lordship, that, if ever this subject should be discussed in Parliament, you and your colleagues must certainly lay your account with the loss of the support, on this particular point, of all those patriots, who approved of the treaty of Amiens, and who were formerly so loud in their cries against all interference in the internal affairs of France, even though that country was at the time in a state of commotion; though the rebellious people had imprisoned, and afterwards murdered, their lawful sovereign, and though they openly avowed their intention to extend, by fraud or by force, their principles and their example to every nation in the world, and particularly to Great-Britain. Yet, my lord, be not alarmed: the men, who maintained that principle; the men who, even in the days of Robespierre and Buonaparté, continued to declaim against the war as a crusade against liberty; the men who could, with such wonderful facility, transfer their affections from one set of despots to another; the men who could follow, with unimpaired zeal and admiration (I might almost say allegiance) the French Republic through all the follies and all the horrors of her revolution; those men, be you assured, my lord, will not be ashamed to justify the present interference of the domineering Consul; and, therefore, your lordship may confidently anticipate, the entire, the undisturbed, and unenvied enjoyment of all the honour to be derived from their support.

From this digression I should now return to the subject of the electorates, but want of time compels me to defer it to my next. In the mean time, I am, my lord, your lordship's most humble and most obedient servant,

WM. COBBETT.

London, Sept. 24, 1802.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Paris, Sept. 7.—The Moniteur of this date contains a letter from BERTIN, the colonial Prefect of Martinico, giving an account of his taking possession of that colony, and of the great joy of the inhabitants, on the occasion.—N.B. This letter will be inserted at length in the Supplement to the present volume.—It has in it nothing immediately interesting.

The Moniteur also contains the following arrêté.—

"Sept. 1, 1802—The Consuls of the republic, on the report of the minister of finance, and with the advice of the Council of State, decree:—Art. I. New cordage of French manufacture, tarred or untarred, may be exported, on paying a simple countervailing duty. II. Pitch raw or prepared, tars and rosins of French production, may be exported on paying the following duties: 1. When exported on board French vessels, 25 cents. per myriagram. 2. When exported in foreign vessels, 50 cents. III. Undressed hides, imported from foreign parts, shall be subject, at their entry, to a duty of 25 cents. only, in the same manner as those imported from the French colonies. IV. Comfits, entered inwards from foreign parts, shall be subject to a duty on importation of 35 fr. 5 myriagrams. V. The importation of molasses, being the production of foreign colonies, is prohibited." Signed, &c. in the usual manner.

Sept. 14.—The First Consul, in virtue of 63d Article of the organic Senatus Consultum, has appointed to the rank of Senators the following Citizens:—Abrial, Minister of Justice. Fouché, Minister of Police. Dubbelloy, Archbishop of Paris. Rœderer, President of the Section of the Interior of the Council of State. And Aboville, First Inspector General of the Artillery. On the same day Citizen Regnier, President of the Section of Legislation, and Counsellor of State, was appointed High Judge and Minister of Justice. Citizen Boulay, Counsellor of State, and President of the Section of Legislation, is appointed to adjudge the claims respecting the National Domains, in the room of Citizen Regnier. Citizen Fourcroy, Counsellor of State, replaces Citizen Rœderer, and in the direction and superintendence of public instruction. Citizen Bigot de Preameneu, Counsellor of State, is appointed President of the Section of Legislation, in the room of Citizen Boulay. Citizen Regnaud (de Saint Jean d'Angely), is appointed President of the Section of the Interior, in the room of Citizen Rœderer. Citizen Lacuée, Counsellor of State, is named President of the Section of the War Office, in the room of General Brune, appointed Ambassador to the Sublime Porte. The following Citizens have been appointed Counsellors of State, viz.—Treillard, President of the Tribunal of Appeal for Paris. Collen, Director-General of the Customs, L. Haumont, Prefect of the Lower Rhine. Petit, Prefect of the department of Vaucluse. Dauchy, Prefect of the department of L'Aisne.

Basle, Sept. 12.—All the Eastern part of the Helvetic republic, with the exception of Turgovia, and a part of the Grisons, is in a state of open rebellion against the constitutional authorities.—Besides the three small cantons, those of Glarus, Appenzel, Rheintal, Zug, and Baden, have declared themselves to be in a state of insurrection.—In Zug, the presence even of a battalion of infantry could not prevent the insurrection from breaking out. The other cantons abound with emissaries from the small cantons, who hold out promises of the abolition of all taxes, of the re-establishment of the Langgemeinde, and sometimes of the plunder of all persons of property.—These perfidious suggestions have had this singular effect, that the partizans both of oligarchy and of democracy unite together to destroy that constitution which was a few months ago adopted by a large majority. If they succeed in their designs (which may fortunately be prevented by the interposition of France), there will be a civil war between those parties who have now formed a temporary union for the purpose of destroying the government.—The canton of Baden is at this moment occupied in forming its landgemein. The municipalities have been invited to send deputies to the chief town to concert measures upon this subject. Reding's brother, who has resided for some time at Baden, is at the head of the insurgents. The Argovian district of Bruck has also been invited to join with the male-contents of Baden. The central government has sent select persons belonging to Zurich and Friburg into these districts to put an end to the disturbances.—Illegal assemblies having been held at Zurich, a detachment of Helvetic troops was sent thither from those stationed in the middle district of the Pays de Vaud. The burgesses of Zurich shut the gates against them, and proposed terms which military honour obliged them to reject. Hostilities were commenced, and we this moment learn, that the city of Zurich has been bombarded by the Helvetic troops. The commissary of government, Muiy, has received orders to expedite his departure.

Paris 22d. Sep.—We learn by the way of Nantes, that at the departure of La Brune from the cape at St. Domingo, on the 1st of August, the two frigates sent to the isle of Tortue had arrived there. The Negroes had been reduced, the most mutinous punished, and tranquillity re-established. Some habitations have been burnt, and about a dozen of whites, women and children, have fallen victims to the insurrection.—The frigate La Valeureuse, returned to Brest from St. Domingo, announces the approaching return of the three ships Le Pesavoie, Tourville, and Le Zélé.—Citizen Perignon, senator, is appointed extraordinary commissioner to regulate, conformably to the basis of the 7th article of the treaty of peace between France and Spain, every thing relative to the rectification of the limits of the two states on the side of the Pyrennees.

American States.—New York papers have been received of the 11th of August, from which it would appear that some degree of alarm respecting the contagious fever still prevailed both in New York and Philadelphia. The following articles are copied from the New York Daily Advertiser:—"The favourable state of the health of this city is apparent from the list of deaths for last week, which falls short of the week preceding.—The greatest mortality prevails, as is usual through the summer months, among children—the proportion between them and adults being as three to one.—By private accounts yesterday from Philadelphia, we learn, that the alarm respecting the fever was still very great, and that the inhabitants were very generally removing from the city, as the most effectual means of preventing the ravages of this dreadful distemper.—A French frigate of 54 guns and 400 men, Capt. Tailleux, three months from Brest, on a cruise, has put in at this port for water and provisions. She had anchored at the quarantine ground. Three other frigates, it is said, may be expected."

Stuttgart, Sept. 12—The assembly of the deputies of the imperial cities of Suabia, which met about a month since, has separated without coming to any resolution. Six of the cities, amongst whom Augsburg is one, took no part in the deliberations.—The latest courier from Munich, brings the intelligence of the Austrians having occupied the county of Neuburg, which extends from the Inn to the banks of the Danube. It appears that they also proposed to interrupt the communication between the Bavarian troops posted at Vilshoffen, and at Saint Nicholas. General Deroi immediately placed troops along the Danube, to maintain those communications, and proceeded on the 5th to Passau, to confer upon the subject with the Austrian general Schanck. The result of the conference is not known.—A report has prevailed for some days at Munich, that the Austrians were disposed to evacuate Passau, but it has been contradicted by late events. We learn, on the contrary, that there is an intention of forming a second camp at Wels, on the frontier of High Austria. M. de Buol, the Austrian envoy at Munich proposed that the elector should evacuate all the countries which he had occupied, on which condition, it was added, the emperor would withdraw his troops from Salzburg, Passau, Berchtolsgrad, &c. but this proposition was not agreed to at Munich.—The Bavarian troops have delayed until now, the taking possession of the different imperial cities of Suabia allotted to the elector. The occupation of those cities has at length taken place within these few days. On the 8th, a detachment entered Noerdlingen, and another Bopfingen.—On the next day Demhulspul was occupied, and also Kauffbenem, Buchhorn, Wangen, and Ravenspurg. In many of these cities, the arrival of foreign troops caused some discontent, but the magistrates themselves addressed proclamations to their fellow-citizens, inviting them to submit to necessity, and promising that they would do every thing in their power to preserve to the cities a part of their privileges.—The count de Lerchenfeld, a commissary of the Bavarian government, charged with the particular confidence of the elector, is arrived at Augsburg. He notified on the 10th to the imperial officers of the Prévôté Saint Ulrich, that a detachment of Bavarian troops would enter the city of Augsburg to take possession of that Prévôté. It is asserted that the magistrates of Augsburg have protested against the entry of a foreign force into that city.—The Bavarian troops stationed in the bishopric of Augsburg, have drawn nearer to the frontiers of the Tyrol, and have occupied the different dependencies of the bishopric of Freysengen inclosed in the Tyrol, and have quietly taken possession of Paterskirch and Mittenwald. Their advanced posts are placed near the important passage of Schavinz, occupied by the Austrian troops.

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES.

In pursuance of the first article of the Convention, made on the 8th of January last (See Register p. 97) with the American States, the following notice has been issued.

“WHEREAS by the first article of the Convention concluded at London, on the 8th day of January last, between his Majesty and the United States of America, the said United States, in satisfaction and discharge of the money which they might have been liable to pay in pursuance of the provisions of the sixth article of the treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded at London, on the 4th day of November, 1794, between his Majesty and the said United States (which sixth article, was, by the said Convention declared to be cancelled and annulled, except so far as the same might relate to the execution of the seventh article of the said treaty), engaged to pay; and his Majesty engaged to accept, for the use of the persons described in the said sixth article, the sum of six hundred thousand pounds sterling, payable at the City of Washington, in three annual instalments of two hundred thousand pounds each, and to such person and persons as should be authorised by his Majesty to receive the same; the first of the said instalments to be paid at the expiration of one year, the second at the expiration of two years, and the third and last instalment at the expiration of three years, next following the exchange of the ratification of the said Convention; and by the second article of the said Convention, the fourth article of the Definitive Treaty of Peace, concluded at Paris on the 3d day of September, 1783, between his Majesty and the said United States, was so far as respected its future operation, recognised and confirmed, so as that the creditors therein described should thereafter meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value, in sterling money of their bona fide debts. All persons claiming the benefit of the said first article of the said Convention, are hereby required to lodge, without delay, their several claims in writing, duly subscribed by the respective claimants, or their agents, with James William Hay, Esq. at the Office, No. 7, Great Marlborough-street; and that they therein specially set forth, 1st. Their national character entitling them to claim as his Majesty's subjects: 2dly, The nature and origin of their several debts and demands, and the total amount thereof, principal and interest, reduced to sterling money (the interest being separately stated and distinguished from the principal) with a reference to schedules annexed; the said schedules to contain lists or accounts of the particular debts, the names of the debtors, and their situations and circumstances, so far as the same can be stated, at and subsequent to the conclusion of the peace between his Majesty and the said United States; 3dly, Whether the claimants have at any time proceeded, or are now proceeding at law, in America, for recovering payment of the said debts; and if not, why they have not so proceeded, or are not so proceeding at law? And lastly, the evidence, written or parole, which they are ready or undertake to bring forward in support of their several statements and demands. And all claimants who do not reside in London, or the immediate neighbourhood thereof, are required to appoint agents there residing; and at the time of lodging their claims, to give notice of the names and places of abode of their said agents at the said office. Farther it is hereby required, that all relative or incidental representations, statements, and applications shall be made in writing, duly signed by the claimants or their agents, and lodged at the office, where all necessary inquiries respecting the above matter, and the proceedings therein, may be made, and there only.—Office, No. 7, Great Marlborough-street, Sept. 11, 1802.”

On the 22d inst. their Majesties came from Windsor to Kew Palace, from whence the King proceeded to town, and held a Levee at St. James's: it being the anniversary of the Coronation, it was observed with the usual demonstrations, and the Noblemen, who were Knights of the different orders, appeared in their several insignia.—The presentations to the King were: His Excellency Baron Jacobi, the Prussian Ambassador, on his arrival from his own Court, having been absent on important business these six months.—Lord Keith, on his arrival from abroad.—Baron Herbert, from Germany, was introduced by Mr. Spencer Smith; he is quite a young man, and attracted the notice of the company by the peculiarity of his dress, being attired in a vest of white satten.—Sir J. Douglas kissed hands on being appointed Equerry to his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex.—Mr. Serjeant, Secretary to the new appointed Lords of his Majesty's Treasury.—John Smith, Esq. kissed his Majesty's hand on being appointed Master of the Mint, and was sworn a Member of his Majesty's Most Hon. Privy Council.—A relation to the late General Sloper had an audience of the King, and delivered up the red ribbon worn by that worthy Officer as Knight of the Bath.—Singer Burton, Esq. being appointed Gentleman Usher, and Quarterly Waiter, in the room of Mr. Osmer, attended, and received the usual mark of royal respect.—Lord R. Fitzgerald took leave on setting off on his journey to Lisbon.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

According to intelligence received from Martinico, the French General BERTIN has taken possession of that island, amidst, as he says, the joyous acclamations of the inhabitants. No doubt. Those who felt no joy would certainly feign it. Dispatches from the Isle of France contain, like all other dispatches from the French colonies, high eulogiums on the paternal care of the First Consul. Were Buonaparté, by some mishap, to lose his power of bestowing rewards and punishments, his power of life and death, these eulogiums would, doubtless, as in the case of poor Robespierre, be turned into reproaches and execrations; but, in the mean time, they show that all his subjects, whether near him or far from him, live and move in perfect obedience to his will.—An arrêté appears in the Moniteur of the 19th, by which all proprietors of estates in St. Domingo, with the exception of those who are disabled by age, infirmity, or sickness, or who are actually employed in the French service, are required to repair thither under the penalty of sequestration of their property. According to intelligence from the Cape, an insurrection in the Isle of Tortue has been suppressed, and several of the negroes punished, after some habitations had been burnt, and a few Whites, women and children, had fallen victims to the fury of the Blacks.

The Valais has been formed into an independant republic, and the formation has been announced to the world, through the Moniteur, by a proclamation, signed by the envoys of the French, the Italian, and the Helvetic Republics. A constitution is to be formed, by France undoubtedly. Buonaparté is styled the Restorer of the liberty of the Valais, under which title he will, perhaps, exercise a controul rather more immediate, than that which he exercises over Holland and Spain. Being upon this topic, we cannot forbear to notice, how completely the Italian Republic is identified, in all political concerns, with that of France. The French ambassadors stipulate for it with Algiers and with Denmark, in exactly the same manner as if it were called a colony, which it really is, of the French Republic. It is, as to all purposes of war, whether defensive or offensive, much more efficiently united with France than Ireland is with England; and, be it remembered, that it now maintains an army more numerous than this kingdom does. It has no commerce, no manufactures, no bank, no lord-mayor's coach, but it has sixty thousand soldiers, each of whom has sixty rounds of ball-cartridges in his pouch.

The situation of Germany cannot well be described: mortified as the Emperor must be, it is hardly possible for him to show any efficient resentment. It is stated in the foreign journals (see p. 370), that he still opposes some resistance; but it is hardly necessary to repeat the melancholy truth, that he must finally submit. The wise-acres tell us, that, by-and-by, he will recruit his strength, and then he will avenge himself! France and Russia have taken care that his strength shall never be recruited; they have annihilated the means of his recovery, they have cut off "the source from which his "current flows or else dries up;" and we have stood by, unconcerned spectators of the deed.

In Switzerland (see p. 368) the blessings of revolution seem to have arrived nearly to a state of perfection. In addition to the five cantons of Uri, Schwitz, Underwalden, Glaurus and Appenzel, those of Rheintal, Zuy, and Baden, have now declared themselves in a state of insurrection, and, it appears very evident, that the new Helvetic government will be compelled to call in the assistance of France. This is what has been long expected. Why Buonaparté should seek for a pretext of this sort, or of any sort, it would be difficult to conjecture; but there are, doubtless, circumstances which render it prudent. The selfish policy, which Switzerland, in common with Genoa, Modena, Tuscany, and, indeed, almost all the powers of Europe, adopted with respect to the early stages of the French revolution, it is now, in common with other states and princes, expiating under the well-merited lash of the French Republic.

The honest Talleyrand's avowal with respect to the object of the Egyptian expedition (see p. 353) has been thrown out for the same purpose that the French have always proclaimed, before hand, their hostile intentions towards other countries. But, how secure must Buonaparté feel with respect to our Ministry; how little must he care about the opinions of people in this country; how conscious must he be that we dare not, now or hereafter, attempt to resist him! There are persons who think that he will re-possess Egypt in less than a twelvemonth. It is possible, and, indeed, by no means improbable. The government of Turkey is completely at his command; and, should he obtain Egypt by cession, what can we urge against it? His corps of Mamelukes are not maintained with such splendor, and enjoying such singular marks of his favour, merely for the sake of their being brother Mussulmans: it is not piety but politics to which they owe their establishment.

The letter from our correspondent at Stockholm, which will be found in this sheet, page 355, is well worthy of attention; and we beg leave to point out particularly, that part of it, which (rather in an exaggerating way, indeed) speaks of a second part of the Convention between France and Russia, treating of maritime affairs, more especially of neutral navigation and trade. "Mr. President Jefferson is to be a party," and a party he will gladly be, with the hearty approbation of his country too, if he can thereby procure, not an abandonment, but a delay only, of the colonization of Louisiana. With this boon in her hands, France can obtain the accession of America to whatever league she thinks proper to form against this country.—It will soon be seen whether our connexions on the Continent had no influence on our maritime affairs, whether they in no wise tended to strengthen our defence. Mr. Wilberforce will soon see whether England can live without the Continent, and Mr. Pitt will soon see the effect of listening to the advice of such politicians.—The public are already indignant at the loss of the Emperor of Russia's friendship; what, then, will be their feelings when they come to be acquainted with the way in which it was lost! That powerful prince would, doubtless, have come forward, in conjunction with us, for the settlement of Europe; but, our ministers chose to buy a peace for themselves, and to have no communication with him on the subject. He was, of course, thrown into the hands of France. He was obliged, in order to prevent more mischief as well as he could, to concert some arrangement with France, and as we are told by our correspondent (p. 129), it was probably done through the mediation of Prussia. The Emperor Alexander was then (at least there is every reason to suppose so) willing to have supported a plan for the more effectual independence of Malta. Such a plan is said to have been agreed on. But Buonaparté, who, perhaps, knew this, forced another plan upon us. Russia, in consequence, has refused to guarantee it; and refused, too, with no small displeasure at our weak or treacherous conduct; and, the chance whether "conciliation" or "firmness" be uppermost in Lord Hawkesbury's policy, is to determine, whether we are now to make a surrender of Malta to Buonaparté, even beyond the treaty of Amiens, or to go to war again for Malta alone, when we have given up possession of all our other restitutions.—There can be no doubt which the cool, the prudent, the "safe politicians," will do.

But, if these "safe politicians" have lost the friendship of Russia; if they have abandoned the empire with all its princes, and, amongst the rest, their own sovereign; if they have brought disgrace upon disgrace on their country; if they have left her not an ally or a friend in the world; if they have endangered her existence as an independent state; they have, as a balance against all these, clearly shewn, that the receipts of the Custom-house and Excise-office have increased since the peace.—They have, with all the vanity and pomposity of a merchant's clerk, who talks of his master's profits as if they were his own, published a comparative statement of the sales in one of their principal shops, taking the two first quarters of the year 1801, and the two first quarters of 1802. Their statement is as follows:

"Exports of British Produce and Manufactures.

"Quarter ending 5th of April £4,716,416

"Ditto ending 5th of July. . . 4,024,412

1802.

" Quarter ending 5th of April 8,343,961

" Ditto ending 5th of July . . . 5,678,446

" Exports of Foreign Merchandize.

" Quarter ending 5th of April 1,109,608

1802.

" Quarter ending 5th of April 1,782,067

" The excise," it is added, " has been productive in a proportionate degree. During the last two months, it has averaged £220,000 per week, being at the rate of above fourteen millions a year. If such is already the case, what may we not expect will be the increase of our commercial prosperity, as peace continues to expand her golden pinions."—This is, we are well assured, a very fallacious statement. Advantage has been taken of every circumstance that could be brought to aid in making up a shew. We by no means, however, doubt that the exports of the two first quarters of peace have exceeded those of the two first quarters of 1801. Who ever expected the contrary? How many cargoes were kept in waiting for that diminution in the rates of freight and insurance, which peace must inevitably produce. The negotiations were going on for eight months, during the whole of which time, the shippers were keeping back all the goods which it was not absolutely necessary to send off. Let it be observed, too, (what, indeed, was a hundred times observed during the discussions on the peace) that the shops on the Continent were all empty; that the increased demand for British manufactures, for two or three years even was to be expected, unless France, before the expiration of that time, chose to prohibit them. To the colonies also an extraordinary shipment, for the first year or so of peace, must of course take place; and, therefore, to affect to deduce from the exports of the two last quarters an argument in favour of a regular increase of trade " as peace continues to expand her golden pinions," is a gross attempt at imposition, especially when the fallacy of it is so amply proved by the statement itself; for, if the 1st quarter exported eight millions and the 2d quarter only five millions, what reason is there to suppose, that trade will increase " as peace continues to expand her golden pinions."? Indeed, this sudden decrease clearly proves, that the vast rise of the first quarter (and, doubtless, part of that of the second quarter) over the quarters of 1801, is to be attributed almost entirely to the release of cargoes, locked up by the war.

But, if we were to allow, that the peace had really produced an increase of trade, and that this increase would continue to grow as long as the peace should last, are the " safe politicians," quite sure, that this circumstance is likely to contribute to the duration of that " blessing"? Are they quite sure that it may not, on the contrary, be the very thing above all others, which will make Buonaparté hasten the application of his fatal shears to the " golden pinions" of peace; more especially when he recollects that the discreet statesmen, the " safe politicians," have openly avowed, that their object is to save up a little money, in order to be able again to enter the field, and to defeat the consummation of his projects? Are they quite sure that it was prudent to indulge, on this occasion, their " proud exultation," and to " hope," that the statement will not be prohibited " in the French news-papers"? Are they quite sure, that they shall not have cause to repent of their shopkeeper-like wit, their purse-proud exultation? The coward never should cry, roast-meat. The goose with the golden eggs should steal silently from her nest.

Every thing that we have heard, since our last, strengthens, rather than impairs, the opinion expressed in Mr. Cobbett's letter (see p. 338.) as to the motives and probable consequences of the visit, which Mr. Fox and his friends are now paying to Buonaparté. The persons composing this charmingly select party, are, Lords Holland and Oxford, Mr. Adair, Gen. Fitzpatrick, Mr. Erskine, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, and the man of the people himself. " Into their assembly come not thou, my soul; unto their council be not thou united!" We do not know that the others are admitted to any private parties with the Consul, or with the honest Talleyrand; but the man of the people is so admitted almost every day, and, in short, is honoured with the perfect friendship and confidence of Buonaparté, who, in the undisguised, the marked, the ostentatious favour which he shows to the well-known and irreconcilable enemy of Mr. Pitt, fully proves, that he has, with respect to England, some object in view, which no ministry, supported by Mr. Pitt, will ever suffer him to accomplish. It is difficult, indeed, to imagine any thing, to which those who surrendered Nappy Tandy, might not be reasonably expected to consent; but, doubtless, the First Consul, who has a most fertile imagination, has, at last, made the discovery.—Mr. Cobbett, in order to shew the fallacy of the pretext for Mr. Fox's visit to Paris, observed, that, from the well-known state of the patriot's eyes, it was fair to presume, that he could not read the Stuart manuscripts, in the Scotch college; but, he might have observed, that neither Mr. Fox nor any body else could read them, the said manuscripts having been burnt long enough ago, a circumstance of which there is every reason to suppose Mr. Fox was well acquainted. This is pretty nearly conclusive as to the pretext of the visit.—The military honours, too, which were bestowed on him, have been by no means sufficiently dwelt on. The officers commanding at St. Omers, Lisle, &c. &c. might, indeed, have heard of Charles Fox; but, if we can at all suppose it probable, that they would, of their own accord, have drawn out their men for the purpose of honouring him, we must suppose, that they had heard a great deal of him, that they were acquainted with his character, his principles, and his party politics; and, if so, they must have known, that he was the leader of the opposition, the sworn foe of Mr. Pitt, and of the men who have served him as instruments in making the peace with Buonaparté. If they knew enough of Mr. Fox to have contracted for him any great degree of admiration, they must have had great fears of showing that admiration, lest, as being a mark of hostility to the British ministry, it should bring on them the displeasure of Buonaparté, whom they must necessarily suppose to have a desire to live in friendship with that ministry. Whether, therefore, they were acquainted with the character, principles, and party of Mr. Fox, or whether they were not, it is evident, that they would not have paid him military honours, or, indeed, any honours at all, unless they had received orders to that effect from Paris, and this necessarily supposes a previous correspondence with Paris on the subject of his journey.

While Mr. Fox, "the patriot Fox," the "man of the people," the "champion of British freedom," is bowing at the levees, and basking in the favour, of the absolute, the military master of republican France, in a prison, not many paces from the scene of his sycophancy, the object of his adulation has lately immured a British gentleman, who was serving his king and country at the risk of his life, while "the man of the people" was giving evidence at Maidstone, or perchance, reading lectures at the Shakespeare, on the useful science of casbicing kings. We allude here to the imprisonment of Captain D'Auvergne, who is sometimes called Prince de Boullion, as being the heir at law of the late nobleman of that name, but who is an Englishman by birth, who never has, in any way whatever, forfeited his rights as a British subject, who has been in the British navy from his infancy, and who has served in Jersey, with distinguished honour, during almost the whole of the war which has just ended. This gentleman, Buonaparté has, within these few days, imprisoned in the Temple. Under what pretext is not known. That he has no right to imprison him is certain, and we wait with impatience to see how the "safe politicians" will proceed; which of their specifics, "conciliation" or "firmness," they will make use of to defend the honour and the life of a most valuable subject of His Majesty.—That Captain D'Auvergne would sooner lose his liberty, and even his life, than owe either of them to the intercession of Charles Fox, we are certain; but, it is not inapplicable to observe here, that, at the very moment this gallant and loyal officer is deprived of his freedom, against all the laws of nations, of honour, and of hospitality, Mr. Fox is receiving public thanks from a deputation of Frenchmen, who were, during the war, prisoners in England, and who affect to have owed all the good treatment they received, not to the justice and humanity of His Majesty's government, but solely and entirely to the pathetic eloquence of Mr. Fox. Our readers must have seen, in most of the London daily papers, a translation from the papers of Paris, giving an account of the scene, to which we have here alluded, and which must have been truly diverting. Some impudent carmagnole was found to make a speech full of falsehood and bombast, reminding Mr. Fox of his generous interference in behalf of the French prisoners in England, at the close of which, the Morning Chronicle says, Mr. Fox pathetically replied, in a manner and an accent most affecting: "O, yes, Sir, I remember!" In what part of this reply the pathos is to be found we are at a loss to say, but we are told that the audience were so moved by it, that they burst into tears, in which they were joined by the man of the people! We, too, do remember something about the parliamentary speeches, relative to French prisoners of war; and, we could fill this sheet with most atrocious calumnies, uttered, on that subject, by Mr Fox and his friends, against His Majesty's government. We remember, too, that while these patriots were lavishing their care and generosity on the French prisoners in England, not one of them was ever known to discover the least anxiety respecting the English prisoners in France, though it was notorious that they were treated with savage barbarity.

None of the London news-papers have yet attempted to defend Mr. Fox's visit to the Consul. Their silence would be somewhat mysterious, if it were not evident that they know not what to say. The Jacobins will justify all; but, there is a middle race, who are, perhaps, Jacobin in heart, but who, from some motive or other, occasionally discover the semblance, at least, of English feeling, who will not, all at once, publicly approve of the cabals at Paris. No confidence, however, is to be placed in these men. They will endeavour to steer between Fox and the ministry, 'till they perceive that the former really comes backed with the efficient, active support of Buonaparté, and the moment they are well satisfied of that, they will throw themselves at his feet. This is a season of very refined speculation: the destinies of the British government and Bank occupy the thoughts of the patriots day and night. There is amongst them an animation and bustle like those which are perceivable in a flock of crows upon the approaching demise of an unfortunate quadruped.

TYRO will see that it was out of our power to insert the conclusion of his valuable article. It shall very soon appear. We hope frequently to hear from him.

More trifling trash, under the pretence of political reasoning, was never offered to the public eye, than is gravely set forth in this obvious answer, to which the reply is not less obvious, and (we trust) much more convincing. It is not "as much the interest of the King of Naples to keep on terms of amity with Great-Britain as with France," because his danger from the one power is not so immediate as from the other. Whenever the French shall perceive the approach of war, their ministers will have only to signify to the King of Naples, that hostilities being about to commence with Great-Britain, the possession of Malta is necessary to the military operations of the republic; which will immediately send four thousand troops to relieve the Neapolitan garrison during the war; that if his Majesty accedes to this proposal, he shall have the liberty of remaining neuter; otherwise the army of the Italian Republic will immediately proceed to Naples. Can it be expected that the King of Naples will hesitate a moment between this alternative? The attempt and effect will be the same thing, and a light squadron from Toulon will have completed the business, before our Mediterranean fleet (if we should have one there) could have orders to make any opposition. It would even be a cruel insult to urge the King of Naples to refuse the neutrality: for although our fleet might perhaps, six months after the evacuation of Malta, find means to destroy the city of Naples; yet we could never prevent the whole kingdom being at the absolute disposal of the French. That we have no evidence to warrant a supposition that France may take such a step is assertion against experience; and can only be laughed at by those who recollect, under what professions of peace and proclamations of good will and respect for lives, laws, and property, the French attacked and plundered Venice, Switzerland, Egypt, and the Pope's dominions. France can have no motive to make an attempt on Malta, until she shall be prepared for and most likely shall have provoked a renewal of the war; consequently no fear of incurring the risk or certainty of a war will deter her. And as for the disgrace, she will have anticipated a sufficient compensation for it in the advantage of commanding all the coasts of Italy and the Levant.

Page 15. Mr. B. says, that "it has been insinuated rather than alleged, that England ought to have prevented the transfer of Porto Ferrajo and the Isle of Elba, in which it is situated, to France." But Mr. B. adds, "in this arrangement England had no pretence founded either in policy or justice to interfere." It has been proved by experience, that Porto Ferrajo is a secure harbour for our ships, and so situated as to enable its possessor effectually to check the communication, and of course the commerce and naval operations of an enemy, on a great length of the Italian coast, viz. from Genoa quite down to Naples and Sicily. It therefore seems clear, that it would have been very good policy in England to have interfered, if her interference could have prevented a place of such importance from being for ever secured to France; experience having also shewn, that it is almost impregnable. But this is only one of many instances of Mr. B. making a positive assertion, without offering any proof, and indeed without appearing to have at all considered the subject. With respect to the justice of such interference on the part of England, her right of doing so has already been discussed in the remarks on the cession of Guiana.

Page 19. "It is alleged, that the First Consul of the French Republic having, pending the negotiation, and after signing the preliminaries, caused himself to be elected President of the Italian Republic, this was a sufficient ground for breaking off the treaty altogether; or at least for insisting upon an equivalent for the advantage thus accruing to France."—"But (answers Mr. B.) that this equivalent, had it been demanded, would have been peremptorily refused, cannot be doubted. And we must either have receded from our "demand, or have renewed the war in consequence of such refusal, &c. &c." And Mr. B adds, "Austria, Russia, and Prussia acquiesced in this nomination." It was more than once said in the House of Commons, that all the different steps of aggrandizement (but not this election alone) taken by Buonaparté subsequent to the signature of the preliminaries, were a sufficient cause for renewing the war, unless England should acquire by the definitive treaty some advantages to counterbalance the increasing power of France; and this election seemed to be the most promising opportunity of urging the demand for an equivalent. Because, notwithstanding Mr. B.'s assertion, that Austria, Russia, and Prussia acquiesced, it is far from certain, that their acquiescence did not in some degree proceed from the apparent supineness or timidity of the English government. It was even confidently reported on the Continent, that Austria had shewn strong marks of jealousy at this newly conferred dignity; and what might be more alarming to the First Consul, there appeared in Paris and other parts of France many symptoms of dissatisfaction at his having thus caused himself to be elected to a foreign sovereignty, which had certainly an appearance of providing against the worst. Now, had our government made an immediate and spirited demand of some melioration of the preliminaries, it may be reasonably doubted if under these circumstances the refusal would have been so peremptory as Mr. B. asserts. And the First Consul might have felt it to be not altogether prudent or safe to force the French, who were at that time more anxious (as indeed they might well be) for a definitive peace than we were—into a renewal of the war, merely to secure to his person the sovereignty of the Italian Republic.

Page 21 "It has been objected, that it is highly culpable (in the ministry) to have suffered the cession of Louisiana to France."—"But (adds Mr. B.) the question again occurs—how could we prevent this cession?"—By the only way in which one independent power can prevent or resist the injurious conduct of another: by England formally notifying that she would not permit France to have possession of Louisiana; and if France should persist, by declaring war.—What! (would Mr. B. say) go to war to prevent France having Louisiana?—No, not for this or perhaps any other object of the treaty separately taken: but to prevent France acquiring collectively Louisiana, Guiana, Elba, and the sovereignty of the Italian Republic, it might have been worth our while to have once more tried the fortune of war, whilst as yet none of the cessions or restitutions had taken place: "As to the danger which the United States of America are supposed to incur from the neighbourhood of France, those states are unquestionably well able to defend themselves."—So far otherwise, that divided as they are in interests, opinions, and situation, few things seem more questionable than their ability of maintaining their independence against the arms and more dangerous artifices of a powerful and intriguing neighbour, situated close upon their frontier, and notoriously possessing a decided influence over the party and persons who at present have the administration of their government.

"The vicinity of France would only tend to incline them (the Americans) the more strongly to the alliance of Britain."—Admitting this, America may not have an opportunity or may not dare to pursue this inclination. England too may have her reasons for not entering into the alliance at the time it may be proposed: and without following this speculation further, it cannot be denied that from the present appearance of affairs in that country, France seems to have a much fairer prospect of revolutionizing America, than England has of preventing it.

The omission of the renewal of former treaties, Mr. B.'s only defence is an extract from Lord Hawkesbury's excellent speech on the thirteenth of May: which excellent as it may be, Mr. B. has thought proper to bolster up by adding that—"a commercial negotiation is on foot, from which the most happy and beneficial consequences may be reasonably expected."

As for "the most happy and beneficial consequences of the commercial negotiation,"—if (as Mr. B. promises) they may be very reasonably expected, it is also certain that they have long been and may still be very fruitlessly expected. When Mr. B. told his readers, that if we had refused to restore the Cape of Good Hope we could have had no peace; if we had demanded any equivalent for the First Consul's causing himself to be elected President of the Italian Republic, it would without doubt have been peremptorily refused; if we had opposed the cessions of Elba or Louisiana, we must have renewed the war; he spoke with the authority of a man, who had been admitted into all the secrets of all the cabinets. But Mr. B. seems to have been kept quite in the dark as to this commercial negotiation; although he has ventured to predict these most happy and beneficial consequences. And in truth if the benefit (whenever we get it) should bear a fit proportion to the delay and difficulty in obtaining it, his prediction will be most satisfactorily fulfilled. Meanwhile Mr. B. himself must confess that, as far as this commercial treaty is to correct the inconveniences of the non-renewal of former treaties, those inconveniences do for the present remain uncorrected.—P. 24. “Up“on the whole it is evident to demonstration, “that the nation is under the highest obli“gation to those ministers who, entering “into a negotiation in the true spirit of con“ciliation, have with such wisdom, firm“ness and moderation brought to a felici“tous conclusion a treaty attended with such “numerous and complicated difficulties.”—

 Having stated the substance of Mr. B’s remarks and offered the foregoing observations on them, my readers must judge how far Mr. B. merits this joint compliment which he pays to himself for his evident demonstration, and to the ministry for their wisdom, firmness, and moderation. If the cause were capable of evident demonstration, most assuredly Mr. B’s remarks have rather darkened than illustrated it. Nor could this be otherwise: Mr. B. having forgotten to establish two points on which, as on first principles, all his assertions and arguments rest; namely, the indispensable necessity of an immediate peace, or a very great improbability of obtaining better terms by a continuance of the war. For it cannot have escaped the reader’s notice, that whether Mr. B. discusses the several restitutions, cessions, or objections, his most favourite arguments are—“If we “had not restored this place, we could “have had no peace”—“If we had in“sisted on that demand, we must have “continued the war.”—But this mode of reasoning, or rather of asserting, leads to no conclusion, unless we were so completely disabled from accepting these threatened alternatives, that peace was become indispensably necessary. But Mr. B. has not said that the peace was a measure of necessity, and Mr. Addington has expressly denied it. If therefore it be “evidently “demonstrated that the nation is under “the highest obligations to the ministers
 “for the felicitous conclusion of the “treaty,” (of which the nation does not at present seem at all conscious) it must be a self-evident demonstration; since Mr.

B. so far from producing any thing like demonstration, has not even produced the premises from which he principally draws all his conclusions.

The pamphlet is eked out with several more pages, containing threadbare and long related arguments against the necessity of the war, violent accusations against the late ministry, and warm panegyrics of Messrs. Fox, Addington, and above all, Mr. B’s favourite hero and statesman Buonaparté. These topics, having no connexion with the articles of the definitive treaty, may well be dismissed without further notice.

Mr. B. concludes with a very compendious view of the state of Europe, in which there are two passages which require to be briefly considered.

Page 37. “Notwithstanding the vast territorial acquisitions of France, the other “principal powers of Europe have expe-
 “ness*.”

If “greatness” means mere extent of territory, this may possibly be true; but in whatever else constitutes the greatness of a nation, Spain, Prussia, and Austria have experienced a very obvious and dangerous diminution. Spain, notwithstanding that the vices of her government had for many years progressively impaired her efficient strength, was previous to the war still respected as one of the principal powers of Europe; the “magni nominis umbra” afforded a becoming shelter to her declining dignity. But the French first conquered and then unfeelingly uncovered all her weakness.—It would be ungenerous to dwell on the particular instances of her humiliation.—The basis of all national greatness is independence, secured by the power of resenting with reasonable probability of success any injury, or of resisting any attack which may be made by any other nation: extent of territory, fertility of soil, the happy cultivation of arts, sciences, and commerce may add a splendid superstructure; but a secure independence must be the foundation. Apply this position to the relative situation of Austria and Prussia with France. Before the war their German dominions were secured by wide intervening tracts of country, presenting against any attack from France a strong frontier, formed by the Alps and the Rhine, over which river all the principal passages were commanded by places of great strength. This whole frontier is now in the hands of France. Piedmont is a French department: Switzerland is governed by a French army: the left bank of the Rhine, with all the strong places on that side, annexed to France: on the right bank, all the places, capable of opposing the passage of an army, completely dismantled: thus, in a word, the entrance into any part of the Germanic territory is laid as freely open to the generals, as its constitution has been to the ministers of France. All human affairs are liable to change. The French Colossus may fall by its own weight; or the European Princes may at last feel the necessity of making one hearty attempt to destroy a power, which will naturally (for such is the nature of power) exert itself for its own aggrandizement: but this was the situation of Austria and Prussia at the conclusion of the war; and nothing but this helpless situation could have produced the edict of indemnifications lately issued by France and Russia; which has regulated the German empire with as little ceremony, as Tuscany, Sardinia, Switzerland, and Holland had before been regulated by the First Consul. Yet Mr. Belsham gravely tells us, that "Austria and Prussia have experienced no diminution of their former greatness." Would that this assertion were correct even with respect to England! But when we see the Austrian Netherlands annexed to France, and the resources of the United Provinces placed at the absolute disposal of the French government; and when we must acknowledge that all our statesmen have ever held the perfect independence and security of the United Provinces against France to be a necessary point of defence to our naval power and commercial operations; it would be wilful presumption to say that our security, that is, the basis of our greatness, is not in a fearful degree impaired. We may, indeed, find some consolation in Mr. B.'s remark (p. 37) that "the naval preponderance of these islands has kept pace with the military preponderance of France."—And true it is, that the unparalleled skill and valour of our many gallant commanders had, to their immortal honour, obtained for their country a decided superiority over all the maritime powers in Europe, at the end of the war. But at the beginning of another war this naval superiority must be again fought for and again decided. And whoever considers that Spain was our ally at the commencement of the late war, and that Holland did not act against us until half of her fleet had declared for the Prince of Orange, both which powers must hereafter fully co-operate with France; that the victory of Aboukir was not less wonderfully fortunate than glorious; and that the Danes may be taught to form a line of defence too strong for even Lord Nelson to force; whoever (I say) gives due attention to these extraordinary circumstances and events, may reasonably doubt if the naval preponderance of England be nearly so secure or likely to be as permanent as the military preponderance of France.

To conclude.—Since it is but too evident that our enemy has made great and formidable additions to his means of attack, and that we have made no addition to our means of defence, not that I mean to undervalue the acquisition of Ceylon, but the danger lies nearer home—it follows that we must engage in any future contest with France under circumstances of disadvantage, very different from what we have ever before experienced; unless we should lessen this alarming difference by an increase of activity, vigilance and public spirit. Our activity must be shewn by maintaining a very strong peace establishment, completely efficient, strictly disciplined, and always fit for immediate service. The expense will be heavy, but we must learn to bear the burden, and let us do it without grudging or grumbling: it is a fine we ought to pay for having preferred an insecure state of equivocal peace to a secure state of successful war; I say, "a secure state"—because, at the very time when the preliminaries were signed, very few thinking men feared any thing from a continuance of the war, but a continuance of the expense. Vigilance must be shewn by our ministers in a close attention to the proceedings of the French government, and by opposing at all events any measures of further aggrandizement, whether by voluntary cession (as it may be called) or by open force and encroachment. Should France take umbrage (as it may possibly happen) at such interference, our answer should be not petulant, but firm; and this firmness of language should receive weight from an immediate addition to our military force. Such should be the conduct and declared disposition of our ministers: if those, who are now at the helm, should shew themselves unequal to the arduous task, let them quit or be forced from their situations. A Fleury or a Pelham could not serve this country in times like these: the intrepid and active genius of Alberoni did indeed ruin Spain; but an English Alberoni would have different materials to work with, more enlightened assistants, and more wholesome restraints. Our public spirit must be revived by every honest man exerting his best talents and influence in decrying that baleful and abject opinion—that war is an evil of such inhuman and extensive magnitude, that no sacrifices can be too great to avoid it. But this is the pitiful cant of cowardly luxury, hypocritical selfishness, or democratical disaffection. Between war and peace abstractedly considered there can be no comparison of good and evil: but human affairs cannot be conducted upon abstract principles; war cannot be avoided; it is a temporary evil incident to the state of man in this world, the conflict between injurious violence and justifiable self-defence: and the nation, which is apparently unable or unwilling to meet his enemy in the field, must soon submit to be oppressed and plundered by him as his slave. Above all, let us not be lulled into security by professions of amicable dispositions and a conciliating spirit: for among nations, especially rival nations, there exists no amicable dispositions, but what depend upon interest; no conciliating spirit, but what arises from the fear of attacking or being attacked. Indeed, if one may judge from the present system of port regulations in France, the amicable disposition of that country seems to be in its wane; but that the conciliating spirit remains in full force here in England cannot be denied. Every state has, without doubt, a right to regulate the trade and use of its own ports; and treaties should be religiously observed, as long as the observation of them is strictly and honestly mutual. But if there be any just cause of complaint or reasonable suspicion on our part; any strong marks of capitious delay in our negotiations or of designs of further aggrandizement on the part of France; be it remembered by our ministry, that all our conquests are not yet surrendered; and that it would be no breach of faith to retain them until every thing that relates to the letter and spirit of the definitive treaty, every thing that was publicly or privately promised, shall be fully performed.

Tyro.

TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD HAWKESBURY,
His Majesty's Sec. of State for Foreign Affairs.

My Lord,—I shall now endeavour to pursue, a little more in detail, the heads of observation, which were touched upon in my last letter, respecting the subversion of the Germanic body.

1. The breaking to pieces of the established ascendancy of the House of Austria.—There were eight voices in the election of an emperor, out of which number were three ecclesiastical electors: there will now be only one ecclesiastical elector out of nine; and, as your lordship will perceive from the very concise and correct statement of my correspondent Agricola (page 295), there will be a fearful majority of protestants in the electoral college. The Elector of Saxony is, indeed, himself a catholic, and the Elector of Hanover, though a protestant, is bound, by the terms of his creation, to vote for the House of Austria; but, the subjects of the former are protestants, and the territories of both these electors are, by the new division, placed as a pledge in the hands of Prussia. The Elector of Bavaria, who is another of the catholic electors, has long been the enemy of Austria, and must now be so from the combined and powerful motives of interest, of rancour, and of fear. So that, out of nine electors, there will be but two, at most, decidedly in favour of the present reigning house; and, it is by no means improbable, that, at another election, the imperial crown may be transferred from the constant friend and faithful ally of England, to a vassal of France.

I am aware, my lord, that, on this topic, an attempt will be made to disguise our danger and disgrace under the affectation of religious joy; and, that fanaticism, coming to the aid of political poltroonerie, will exult at the approaching triumph of the protestant faith. A notion like this, my lord, might be excused in the saints of New-England, who formerly hanged the quakers for witchcraft, and who lately celebrated Buonaparté's expulsion of the pope, as "the final extirpation of anti-christ:" nor should I be much surprized or offended, at seeing it openly avowed by the Wilberforces and the Hills; but, I do hope, that no British statesman, that no man who has either talents, wisdom, or spirit, will ever lend his voice to echo such miserable cant.

The constitution of Germany, settled by the treaty of Westphalia, having grown out of disputes that arose at the period of the reformation, when religion and politics, in the empire, naturally borrowed a strong and deep tincture from each other, the names of Catholics and Protestants are the necessary designations of the opposite interests, though all religious animosity had now happily subsided. Indeed, even when it existed, foreign powers considered them but as political parties. Thus, the kings of France, while they affected extraordinary zeal for the catholic religion, and persecuted their own protestant subjects most severely, yet were the great supporters of the protestants in Germany. Nay, the popes themselves, in order to divert the attention of the House of Austria from Italy, threw indirect obstacles in the way of the catholic cause in the German states; while, on the other hand, England, from the moment that the House of Austria was weakened, and France comparatively aggrandized, on the continent, declined taking any leading and active part in favour of the German protestants, though she countenanced them in obtaining full liberty of conscience. Our principal efforts, with respect to Germany, have long been wisely directed to unite the empire (protestants with catholics), under our great ally the House of Austria, into a strong defensive confederacy against France. If any thing can be likely ever again to excite religious troubles in Germany, it is the very subversion of rank, of titles, and of property, which has now taken place; it is the demolition of the different archbishoprics, bishoprics, chapters, abbeys, and convents; it is the abolition of the charters of so many free cities, and the reducing of independent noblemen to be the subjects of those, with whom they have heretofore been constitutionally equal as feudatories of the empire; it is the making of those whom we may call the great and opulent freeholders, no more than copyholders under the local lords, who have the power of doing as they please; and all this done, too, at the dictation of a foreign power;—if, in short, religious animosities should again distract and lacerate the empire, it will not be owing to any natural hostility between either the opinions or the interests of protestants and catholics, but to this shifting of the internal balance of the empire from one side to the other, which will, at least, and, in the nature of things, must, give birth to much political intrigue and cabal, so as to keep the several members of the empire much more jealous and irritated against each other than against France, who, on the contrary, will naturally be courted, for their own ends, as well as dreaded for her power, by them all.

2. The removal of the great military power, Austria, from all contiguity with France.—On this subject the honest Talleyrand observes, with that candour for which he is so remarkable, that the great object of the interfering powers was “to diminish the chances of war;” and, says he (see p. 259), “on this account, care has been taken to avoid all contiguity of territory between the two powers, who have most frequently involved Europe in bloodshed by their quarrels.” This sounds well; but, unfortunately for the sincerity of the honest Talleyrand, and still more unfortunately for Europe, the countries between the Emperor and France are evidently intended to serve as a defence to the latter only; and this point is secured so effectually, that even the Brisgaw seemed too considerable to remain in any prince of the imperial family. It is transferred to a prince, who must, from his local situation and weakness, be wholly dependant upon France. Indeed, it has been made an avowed principle of the new arrangements, to fortify the whole Circle of Sussia as a barrier to France against the great German powers, by interposing weaker powers; who, for their own safety, must, if required, adhere to France for offensive purposes, or may, as occasion suits, cover her with the shield of a pretended neutrality. This policy, however, in this quarter, is but a part of the same system uniformly put into execution, from one side of the continent to the other: hence the Italian Republic, the Batavian Republic, the Helvetic Republic, the Ligurian Republic, are allowed a sort of nominal independence; and hence the new Republic of the Valais, with the right, reserved to France exclusively, of a military road through it, which will occupy a considerable portion of its territory, and which leads directly to the new Austrian frontier. Austria will thus, in a manner, be shut out from the system of Europe. She will have no direction, in which her ambition can operate this way. She can look for increased power and consequence on the side of Turkey only; and, we must not be surprised, if, as a boon for the total abandonment of England, she should, at no very distant day, receive from the hands of France, a share in the division of that tottering empire.

3. Prussia also, lost, by any unforeseen accident, she should become the open and active enemy of France, is also cut off from all approach towards her.—“The same principle,” says the honest Talleyrand, “adopted, not in all its rigour, but as far as circumstances could admit, has also led to place the indemnities of Prussia beyond the reach of contact with France and Batavia.” If the British ministry were not become mere cyphers in the great transactions of the world; if they were not shut out, with marked and merited contempt, from the cabinets of Europe, your lordship might have puzzled the honest Talleyrand upon this subject. You might have asked him, why he was so anxious to interpose a barrier between Prussia and the Batavian Republic? and, if such interposition were necessary, why no barrier was placed between that independent republic and France?—The impudent frauds of these people are to be equalled only by the ignorance and cowardice of those, on whom those frauds are practised.

Prussia is, by this new partition of territory, so placed as to be worked upon equally by her hopes and fears. Her fears of Russia, fears long since felt and declared even by the Great Frederick himself; and her hopes of Hanover and Osnaburg, which, shut up as they are in the midst of her territories, she will never cease desiring till she obtains, but which France herself, as an additional surety for the submission of England, will, for some time, at least, withhold from the talons of the Black Eagle. Thus situated, there can never be any real cordiality between the electorate of Hanover and the court of Berlin. The political views, too, of the House of Brandenburg, which are known to aspire to the imperial crown, will always keep Prussia subservient to France, and, consequently, still farther disconnected from Great Britain, on account of the influence which the former will certainly have in the electoral college, and the restriction imposed on the small remaining influence of the latter, by the conditions annexed to the vote of Hanover.

4. As to Russia.—That power is, by the new arrangement, brought forward into the system of Europe, on the continent; but in complete subordination to the ambition of France. She will always be a most powerful friend to the latter against either Austria or Prussia, because she lies at the back of both, and has many causes of natural quarrel with both, but a comparatively weak enemy against France, because, from her local situation, she can never support large armies to act against France for a continuance of repeated campaigns. But, what has certainly not been the weakest motive with Buonaparté for this measure, so flattering to the views of Russia, is the desire to injure the permanent interests of Great Britain; to secure every means of facility to the French, and to take away every means of advantage that has hitherto existed to the English commerce; and, above all, to revive the spirit, at least, of the hostile northern confederacy, thereby laying the foundation for a rupture between England and Russia, or providing the certain means of rendering the naval superiority of the former perfectly useless, if she should ever make another effort to resist the hostility of France.

5. The exaltation of the family of Baden.—That the favours bestowed on this house and on that of Wirtemberg are, in some measure, to be regarded as a sop to Russia is evident; but it must, at the same time, be acknowledged, that the electoral dignity which has been conferred on the house of Baden, and the grant of territories to that house, confessedly beyond any measure of compensation for losses, have been declaredly bestowed as a reward for good-will towards the Republic of France! What a splendid example to catch all the inferior princes of Germany, to insure their non-resistance and even their active assistance, in case of another war? Those princes will not fail to compare this liberality towards the Margrave of Baden with the tardy and grudging compensation to the head of the house of Orange, mixed up, as I have before noticed, with every species of insult to this country, and, after all, in real value, not worth a tithe, no nor a twentieth, of the loss which he suffered for the attachment to the ancient politics of his ancestors and the alliance of Great Britain, and for which loss your lordship boasted of having obtained compensation by the treaty of Amiens.* To estimate the future effects of this contrast on the political character of Great Britain and France is a task by no means difficult, and the result, though it would, doubtless, produce little effect on the heart of a king-killing representative, or on the linsey-woolsey minds of his constituents, must inevitably

* At the very moment that I was finishing this sentence, the TRUE BRITON of this very day, containing a continuation of a something called a "View of Public Affairs," was put into my hands. The first words (for they are the first in the paper) which I cast my eyes on were the following:—"The opponents of the peace had complained that the preliminaries contained nothing relative to the Prince of Orange; and, determined to find fault, are dissatisfied with what the definitive treaty stipulates on that point. It is, however, evident that the article which guarantees the compensations to the house of Nassau, imports that they shall be perfectly equivalent to what it had lost."—One may easily perceive how this has happened: Sir Frederick Morton Eden, or Mr. Chalmers, or whoever else has been engaged to supply that miscellany of dulness, the True Briton, with this defence of the present ministers, having gone out of town before the declaration of France and Russia was announced to the public, and having left the manuscript with poor HERRIOT, he has committed a blunder something like that of Sir Martin Mar-all, who kept wagging his lips after the song was at an end.

excite, in every loyal and enlightened Briton, reflections the most humiliating, and apprehensions the most fearful. The cause of monarchy has suffered infinitely more from the folly and pusillanimity of monarchical ministers, than from the cunning and violence of its open enemies; and amongst all the political sins, of which the former have been guilty, the most odious as well as the most dangerous, is the abandoning, the basely sacrificing, of their most zealous and most faithful adherents; while the republicans, in the midst of all their robberies, their murders, their treasons and their blasphemies, have invariably, cost what it would, yielded to their partizans, in every quarter of the world, an honourable and efficient protection.—The Margrave of Baden, my lord, will be, to the princes of Germany, an example not less memorable or less powerful than that which Napper Tandy presents to the patriots of Ireland. Both will look to France as the only protecting and remunerating power; both will pay their court to her, and, whenever she chooses to accept of them, both will range themselves under her banners.

Having thus endeavoured to explain the nature and the general tendency of the new division of the Empire, I shall conclude by an attempt to shew, more fully than I have hitherto done, in what manner, and to what degree, England in particular is concerned in the question. This interesting topic must, however, be deferred till my next.—In the mean time, I am, my lord, yours, &c. &c.
London, Sept. 29, 1802. WM. COBBETT.

TO THE EDITOR.

Without pretending, Sir, to be as well acquainted with the affairs of Germany as Agricola, your "intelligent correspondent," as you call him, and as I also acknowledge him to be, permit me to present you with a few observations on his letter. (See p. 295). The situation of Germany a short time previous to the present era, and that to which it has lately been reduced, are, certainly, well portrayed by your correspondent; but it appears to me, at first sight, that his hypothesis "it would be necessary to know, " &c." and afterwards his "plan of conduct for Austria," naturally gives rise to two reflections.

Are we not, Sir, sufficiently acquainted with the state of Austria, by what has happened during the last three years, by the engagements she has entered into in the treaties of Campo Formio and Luneville, and by what she has published relative to them herself, to discover the line of conduct she will pursue? And how, upon these principles, and others of which I shall presently speak, could your correspondent, for a moment, think it possible, that she should adopt the plan he has laid down; which would otherwise not only be a noble line of conduct, but, at the same time, wise for the present moment, and advantageous in future? It is easy to discover that he is one of our own countrymen; such an idea would never have entered into the mind of a German; so great a degree of disinterestedness is no longer to be found on the Continent. We have given up all our conquests for peace, and renounced our influence in the affairs of Europe for—that abundance of which our funds are the barometer; but cross the channel, and you will not persuade any one, that we ought not to seize what is in our power, or, at least, that we ought to refuse accepting something in exchange for what we have lost, however small a proportion it might be of that loss. You will tell me, with Agricola, that even were the Grand Duke of Tuscany fully indemnified in Germany, which he certainly never will be, Austria, considering the portions of her adversaries, not to mention all the other considerations of prudence, of influence, of security, of dignity, of fidelity, &c. &c. would lose more by it, than by following the plan of your correspondent. But the politicians of the present day have no idea of this, it is Greek to them, they enter not into these refinements; it might do very well for our ancestors, but now, every thing is simplified, and we have only, as you well expressed it, to learn what is the will of Buonaparté, and you have very justly added, that that is not always very easy to learn; for according to the declaration of Austria at Ratisbon, Talleyrand himself, if he is to be believed, did not know it, or, at least, did not well understand it, when he assured Count Cobenzel, that it was by no means intended to impose a plan upon the empire. Imposed upon it, he certainly has in one sense or other. To this science of divination, which will, in future, constitute a necessary requisite, and the maximum of the talents of our ministers, we must add for those of the continent, that thirst after those petty ephemeral advantages, which we find among petty jew merchants; and we may also establish it as a fact, that they share with our ministers, that improvidence, which so happily lulls them asleep from day to day.

I must myself confess, that purely and simply contemplating the progress of the troops, the declarations of Austria, and the insolent provocations of Bavaria and her adherents, and further, the manner in which Austria has more than once extricated herself from situations which were almost desperate, and, lastly, what is passing under her eye in Switzerland, and which might collect like a snow-ball, I have myself been tempted to believe the possibility of a resistance to the will of the man from whom every thing emanates; but Lauriston, still proud of the triumph he gained in London, will, no doubt, by his appearance, have calmed the fury of the rising storm.

I will not pretend, Sir, to set myself up for a defender of the philosophical and philanthropical ideas with which you reproach the Archduke Charles, with paralyzing the resentments of the House of Austria; notwithstanding my respect for the laurels he has gained, I could not congratulate him much on the olive branches he has added to them, by the part he may have taken in the convention of Leoben, upon which the treaty of Campo Formio has been grafted, nor for the influence it has had on the treaty of Luneville; but whatever our opinion, Sir, may be on this subject, would you venture to advise this prince to involve his country in a war in which it would have to struggle alone, and without the co-operation of England, against the whole of Europe? for, excepting this country and European Turkey, do not Buonaparté himself and his new allies, absolutely give law to that part of the globe? We do not yet know to what generals the Archduke would wish to see the Austrian armies entrusted, should his own health prevent him from taking the command, although we cannot doubt but an army of 300,000 men must contain several; but as before a gun is fired it must be pointed, even supposing this prince should appear at the head of the army, is it from the present minister, or is it from the same hand that signed the treaties of Campo Formio and Luneville, that we can expect such a measure? And being unable to rely on our active co-operation in the war, how will Austria avert the storm which is ready to burst over her? Would the Hawkesburies, the Addingtons, the Cobenzels, the St. Helens, protect her from its fury? It is true there is a remedy for every thing, and that a great genius often produces great effects with small means; that Maria Theresa and Frederick the Second have successively astonished the world by their superior courage under still greater reverses, and which was crowned with merited success; but now it cannot be concealed, that it is only at the Thuilleries we must seek, or expect to find, grandeur of conception, boldness, foresight in forming plans, unshaken constancy in pursuing the object in view, and that alone, wisdom and prudence in the choice of means, and firmness, activity, and perseverance in its execution. My hatred towards our enemies is in proportion to the superiority of their talents over those which direct the steps of us and our allies; it is equalled only by my admiration for their address, and my indignation at our want of it.

Believe me, Sir, it is not to you that I address this language; but let our safe politicians keep their eyes open to what is about to befall us. Since the conclusion of peace, the Corsican has not lost a single day in the great work of effecting our destruction, and he is preparing, not with any mighty effort, but with unwearied assiduity, the completion of this work. We shall console ourselves, indeed, for we console ourselves for every thing—for the navigation of the Black Sea being granted to the French, because we are to participate in the same favor with the invaders of Egypt, the evacuation of which the Turks no longer think they owe to us, from the day when we made it an article of the treaty of peace. But let us not forget that France is henceforward far more exclusively than ever nearer to the Black Sea than ourselves; that she is mistress of Italy, and will be so of Malta; that by this concession of the Porte she gains a new opportunity of attacking from behind; that if she is on terms of amity with Russia, she may now assist her in partitioning the Ottoman Empire, or even without this, in threatening our East-India possessions and our commerce; that if Russia, who till now had nothing to fear from France, and who has so blindly concurred in her aggrandizement, should ever conceive an idea of separating from her, she will herself henceforward be exposed to attacks in a very vulnerable part, a part that is very weak against any enemy whatever, except the Turks—I mean the Crimea; and that what Buonaparté could hitherto obtain from the Emperor, only by the illusive advantages offered to the relations on the female side, he will henceforward extort by menaces and terror. And yet what have been called the ravings of Mr. Windham, and which it has been attempted to turn into ridicule, contained nothing of this kind! The events that have taken place since his speech, and since that of Lord

Grenville, and the events which the least discerning politicians may now easily anticipate as about to happen, far surpass the fears expressed by these two statesmen— But as Cassandra prophesied in vain, I will not assume her name, nor that of Jonas, but subscribe myself.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Ratisbon, Sept. 15.—An unexpected incident has occurred respecting the indemnities. The Imperial Plenipotentiary, M. de Hugel, has formally refused to ratify the conclusum of the Deputation of the 8th inst. for the adoption of the plan proposed by France and Russia. This refusal has been notified to the Deputation, who held yesterday its fourth sitting, when a very warm discussion took place, and several very important declarations were made. The vote of the Count de Goez, the Minister of Brandenburg, was particularly remarked: after solemnly protesting against the proceedings of the Imperial Plenipotentiary, and in general against all further adjournment, he demanded that the Deputation should regulate entirely and definitively the indemnities with the Ministers of France and Russia, without the co-operation of the Plenipotentiaries of his Imperial Majesty. The sub-delegate of Bavaria voted shortly afterwards to the same effect. The result of this sitting has been an address to the Plenipotentiary, inviting him in the most pressing manner to accede to the conclusum of the 8th of September.—M. de Hugel notified his declaration in the form of a decree of the Imperial commission, which is contrary to received usage, and the laws of the empire. He founds his refusal principally upon the adoption of the plan of indemnities being contrary to the dispositions contained in the conclusum, by which the Deputation engages to have regard to the reclamations transmitted to it by the parties interested. He offers, as to any thing further, to communicate all the reclamations which shall be addressed to him, to the Ministers of the two mediating Powers, and to enter with them into a conference upon the subject.—In the same sitting of yesterday, the Directorial Minister of Mayence communicated to the Deputation two notes, which are said to be very important, from Citizen Laforêt and the Baron de Buhler, but their contents have not transpired. They are said to be very energetic.—(Moniteur.)

Berne, Sept. 16.—We learn from Basil, that an insurrection has broken out there. It was occasioned in the following manner:

There had for some time subsisted a considerable degree of jealousy between the armed citizens and the regular troops of the Canton. A party of the former, encouraged, no doubt, by recent events, assembled suddenly, disarmed the battalion of soldiers, and nearly assassinated the commandant, Citizen Buxtorf. They afterwards took possession of the arsenal and the town-house. The soldiers who were disarmed have been sent home, and the gates of Basil have been kept shut for two days. A subscription has been entered into, and 500,000 livres have been collected and sent to the chiefs of the insurrection in the smaller cantons. Persons who have lately arrived from Zurich, circulated some alarming accounts, which we do not think entitled to entire credit.—They state, that the suspension of arms agreed upon between General Andermatt and the inhabitants of Zurich were suddenly violated by the latter, who made an unexpected sortie from the city, and at first succeeded in repulsing the Helvetic troops, but at length the citizens were driven back into the city, with the loss of 200 men. That after this event General Andermatt had bombarded the city a second time, and had entered it as conqueror, but that fortune had once more changed sides—the inhabitants rose upon the Helvetic troops, defeated them, made General Andermatt prisoner, and cut off his head. These reports, though they do not obtain entire credit, yet cause a great deal of inquietude.—Sept. 17.—Our troubles assume a more threatening aspect. The government every day loses its partisans. The hostile measures employed against Zurich have alienated the minds of the inhabitants of several cantons who have not hitherto taken any part. The deputies of the smaller cantons have threatened a rupture of the armistice, on learning the re-commencement of the bombardment at Zurich. The strong castle of Arbourg has surrendered to the insurgents in Argovia. Fear, trouble, and anarchy every where prevail.

Basil, Sept. 17.—We have not yet received any positive information respecting the events which are said to have lately happened at Zurich. The armistice concluded by General Andermatt and the smaller cantons, has enabled him to collect all his forces near that city; they amount to about 3000 men. In the negotiation between the General and the Municipality of Zurich, the former proposed the following terms:—1st. The disarming of the citizens. —2d. That the inhabitants of Zurich should make good all the expenses which the Helvetic republic had been put to in consequence of their insurrection.—3d. That certain persons who were chiefs in the insurrection should be given up.—The deputies from the city agreed to the two former propositions, but refused to submit to the last. The negotiations were then broken off, and the town was bombarded; but in consequence of an insurrection in the canton of Bâle, General Andermatt was obliged to raise the blockade of Zurich. An insurrection broke out in the neighbourhood of Lucerne, but the chiefs having been taken, the peasants soon dispersed.

We are assured that the Prussian ambassador at Paris has announced to the Helvetic Minister there, that his Prussian Majesty has recognized the present Helvetic constitution and government.

Vienna, Sept. 11.—The capitulation made between the Sublime Porte and the famous Passwan Oglou has been actually signed. The Pacha, as might be expected, has obtained a complete amnesty for all past offences, and has even been assured by his government of payment of the arrears due to his troops. On his part, Passwan engages to remain perfectly obedient, and moreover to disband his troops immediately on their receiving the money due to them. It is not very probable, however, that this celebrated rebel, who has exercised pillage during so many years, and who has been the sovereign of one of the provinces of the Turkish empire, will consent to deprive himself of his forces, when he may obtain new means of supporting them on an imposing footing. The peace which prevails at this moment throughout Europe, furnishes, it is true, to the Sublime Porte the means of attacking the rebels in its states, but Passwan Oglou has already evinced, that he knows how to maintain his power either in peace or war, being assured of the neutrality of the neighbouring powers.

Florence, Sept. 8—Our Sovereigns and the Prince Charles Louis set off from this city on the morning of the 4th, with a suite of about eighty persons, and a numerous guard. The King has been detained at Pisa by a slight indisposition, but it is hoped that in two or three days he will be able to continue his journey to Leghorn, to embark on board the squadron which is to convey the Royal Family to Spain.

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES.

His Majesty's acceptance of the offer of service from the Wiltshire Yeomanry Cavalry, has been signified in the following letter from the Secretary of State to the Lord Lieutenant, dated Aug. 31, 1802.—“My Lord, I have received and laid before the King your Lordship's letter of the 20th instant, containing the offer of the Wiltshire regiment of Yeomanry Cavalry to continue its services, according to the provision of the Act of the last Session of Parliament; and I have the honour to acquaint your Lordship, that his Majesty has been graciously pleased to approve and accept this offer.” Signed Hobart, and addressed to the Earl of Pembroke.

At a meeting of the Committee of Ship-Owners, for the port of London, held the 9th day of September, 1802, at Wills' Coffee-house, Cornhill:—present. Mr. Hill in the chair; Mr. Blacket, Mr. Gillespy, Mr. Robinson, Mr. Akenhead, Mr. John Jackson, Mr. Williams, Mr. W. Curling, Mr. Fletcher, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Davison, Mr. Fairles.—The secretary reported, that he had written to Mr. Wells, chairman of the committee of ship-builders, according to the resolution of the last meeting, but that he had not received any answer from him.—The secretary also stated, that he had received letters from G. Smith, Esq. master of the Trinity-house, Leith; Mess. Thomas and Joseph Hillicar, Bristol; and Mr. Michael Longridge, Sunderland; acknowledging the receipt of the several papers which the committee had directed to be sent to them, and expressive of their determination to co-operate with the committee in promoting the various and important objects of this society.—Resolved unanimously, that the thanks of this committee be given to G. Smith, Esq. Leith; Messrs. Thomas and Joseph Hillicar, Bristol; and to Mr. Michael Longridge, Sunderland; for their early attention to the communications addressed to them by the committee.—The committee then took into consideration the letter addressed to the secretary, respecting a Mediterranean pass; which letter being read:—RESOLVED, That it be recommended to the parties in question to apply to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, to exonerate them from the bond entered into by them, for the Mediterranean pass mentioned in their letter to have been lost under the circumstances therein stated.—RESOLVED, That a special general meeting of ship-owners be held at the London Tavern, on Thursday the 30th instant, at twelve o'clock at noon precisely, to take into consideration the draft of a petition to Parliament, for a repeal of the tonnage duty, agreeable to the resolution of the general meeting of the 22d day of June last, and on other business of importance; and that such general meeting be advertised in the newspapers.—RESOLVED, That an extract from the minutes of the proceedings of this committee of the 20th day of May last, including the 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, and 5th resolutions of the committee at that meeting, be printed and sent to the persons named in the 2d resolution; and also transmitted to the ship-owners at the out-ports.—The draft of a petition to the honourable the House of Commons for the repeal of the tonnage duty was then read by the secretary, and agreed to.—A letter from James Smith, Esq. master of the Trinity-house, Scarborough, respecting a claim made by the directors of Ramsgate Pier, for dues on ships returning in ballast; and on the construction recently given of an Act of Parliament respecting the admeasurement of ships, and the inconvenience resulting from it; and also a letter signed 'A Ship-owner,' which appeared in the Hull Advertiser, on the same subject, were read: but the consideration of them, as well as of the termination of the differences between the ship-builders and their men, was adjourned until the next meeting of the Committee.—RESOLVED, That this Committee do adjourn to Thursday the 23d inst.

Signed J. Hill, Chairman.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

A report of the vice-president of the Italian republic (which shall have a place in our next) has attracted some attention; but, the more important transactions in Switzerland and in Germany seem, at present, to have engrossed the thoughts of all those who take an interest in public affairs.

The civil war between the smaller cantons and the Helvetic government still rages. Much blood has been shed. French troops have been called in to the aid of government; and, did not Buonaparte perceive a greater advantage in the occasional neutrality of Switzerland, there is no doubt but the whole country would, in the course of a very few weeks, be united to the republic of France, with as little ceremony as Piedmont has been, and with as little fear of exciting the jealousy and the resentment of foreign nations.

At Ratisbon, the scene (as will be perceived by referring to p. 403) is far from being so smooth as it was expected to be. On the 13th Sept. the Baron de Hugel transmitted to the deputation a decree of the imperial commission, which was immediately replied to by the French and Russian ministers. These papers (which will appear in our next) fully prove, that, if the Emperor does, at last, yield to the iniquitous, the imperious and insolent mandates of Russia and France, his submission must be ascribed, not to his want of great enlightened and honourable views, but to the degradation and imbecility of other nations, particularly this fallen and foolish England. If England had not been in such haste to conclude a peace, of which Buonaparté alone ought to have wished for the conclusion, in order thereby to complete the subjugation of France, of Europe, and of St. Domingo, and to enter on his Spanish and Portuguese cessions; if England had not pressed the accomplishment of the views of her deadly foe, what a prospect would the present moment have offered! Austria burning with rage, a civil war in Switzerland, which, while it covers the weak part of Austria, opens to her the weak part of France. Piedmont, Lombardy, and Tuscany would instantly rise against their task master; all the Catholic part of Germany would declare decidedly for the Emperor. Prussia would not dare to move; and, most assuredly, Russia, under such circumstances, would, notwithstanding the want of the zeal and address of Lord St. Helens, never think of undertaking a war for such an object and with such an ally. The accusation, too, the just accusation, of having, merely for purposes of ambition, plunged France into a new war, at a moment when (whatever may be said to the contrary) a famine, or, at least, an alarming scarcity, is apprehended, could not have failed to excite a formidable opposition against the troubler of the world.—But, such an opportunity, once neglected, never returns. The miserable policy manufactured by the Wilberforces, and, unfortunately, adopted by Mr. Pitt (for it is really a shame to affect to attribute the evil to those who are almost literally no more than tools in his hands) has banished us from the continent of Europe, and, it would require, in this cabinet, such a change of sentiment and of conduct, as, it is to be feared, we never shall behold, to obtain a repeal, or even a mitigation, of the sentence.

On this subject we have just noticed an article in the Morning Chronicle, which appears to be a continuation of that, from which we made a short quotation in our last, p. 362. The present article we shall insert entire, not only because it is an admirable piece of political writing, and expresses, from one end to the other, in the happiest manner, precisely what we ourselves could have wished to express, but, because, when the former sentiments of the Morning Chronicle are considered, it will serve to show the change produced in the mind of, at least, one part of the public, by the recent alarming transactions in Germany. Those who recollect the sentiments delivered by the noblemen and gentlemen who opposed the peace, and who recollect the censure (not to say abuse) bestowed on those sentiments by the Morning Chronicle, and, indeed, by almost every news-paper in London, must be forcibly struck with the following article, nearly every sentiment of which may be traced to some part or other of the speeches delivered by the opposers of the peace, and particularly to that of Mr. Windham on the preliminaries, which, being printed in the form of a book, may be referred to with the greater facility.

“ A few days ago we laid before our readers a faithful view of the decline, or rather absolute extinction of the influence and consideration of Great-Britain upon the continent of Europe. A just sense of that situation, so humiliating to our pride, and which ultimately may be fatal to our safety, [Mr. Windham's Speech, p. 19 and 91.] ought to rouse the people of England to reflect on the real source of the greatness—nay, of the safety of state. We are in danger of becoming the dupes of the wealth of which, with so much ostentation, we perpetually boast. We have contracted the vices of new-gotten inordinate riches; a coarse and vulgar affectation, founded on no better pretence than the weight of the purse, and a disgusting air of superiority to others, with no better qualities to justify it than the habits of accumulation and the practice of gain. However valuable an accessory and instrument commercial wealth may be, it does not constitute the greatness of a nation [Mr. Windham's Speech, p. 21.]

“ When we compare the temper and the character of the French government with that of our own, we see room for infinite alarm. We may inveigh with just indignation against the ambition, the perfidy, the injustice of Buonaparté, and dilate with complacency on the meekness and pacific disposition of Mr. Addington.—Till the period, however, arrives when the lamb may lie down in safety with the lion, we shall not be greatly reassured by a comparison of moral qualities. After the in"finite declamations on the wickedness of "ambition, ambition is never thoroughly

 "odious but when it is unsuccessful. There "is a defect in the moral sense of mankind,
 "for they never cease to admire great qual"ities however exerted to dishonest ends,
 "[Mr. Windham's Speech, p. 100] and it "will be in vain ever to attempt to elevate "innocent imbecility to the rank of a great "and able ravager of the world. Mr. Ad-
 "dington's weakness, with all the humble
 "virtue his friends can ingraft upon it, will "never be raised to the level of Buonaparté's
 "usurped dominions; and woe to England
 "if we are condemned to lean on such a de"fence against the enterprises of the First "Consul.

"Laying aside the office of moral censors
 "(a function that will serve us little, unless
 "we can remove Buonaparté from his Se"nate by our assumed prerogative) it is pro"per to consider like practical politicians,
 "how the dignity, honour and independence
 "of this country are to be maintained in so "critical a state of the world.—It were a "puerility deserving more than contempt to "rely solely on the pacific intentions of the "First Consul. [Mr. Windham's Speech,
 "p. 29, 31, 39] Indeed it is impossible to "hear Buonaparté insulting our statesmen
 "(as his own journals report him to have "done), [alluding to the words said to be "spoken to Fox, respecting Mr. Windham]
 "by inveighing against those who would "kindle the flames of war in Europe, with"out indignation. At the moment when "he issues from his senate, after having pas"sed a decree, uniting all Piedmont to "France, and thereby invading the rights
 "and independence of mankind, it is intol"erable to be so derided. In happier times,
 "when the resources of Europe were more
 "entire, and the tone of its statesmen more "dignified, that annexation would have pro"duced a new and most just war, [This was "urged, with respect to Elba, &c. &c. by "every gentleman who opposed the peace]
 "yet (oh incredibilem audaciam, oh impu-"dentiam prædicandam) Buonaparté in"veighs against those who would kindle the "flames of war in the great family of Europe!

"It must be confessed that the First Con"sul displays a capacity, a vigour, in the ex"ecution of his designs, that insure their "success, and elevate his character by con"trast with the imbecility on which he tram-"ples. Glory and dominion are the ends of "his administration. In war and negotia"tion he displays the same energy, the same "spirit of command. He assails, with equal "energy, with equal daring, by his diplo"macy as by his arms. In both he con-"founds and dismays his adversaries. Their "feeble resistance only adds to the credit of "the success. In every negotiation, in every "pretension, he decides the question in his "own favour, even before discussion. His "opponents may shew a hesitating, timorous

 "opposition, but their minds being already "subdued, they end with implicit submis"sion, and their reluctance only proves that "they are compelled.

"A neighbour, who thus conquers in "peace as well as in war, ought to be op"posed by a vigour, an energy, a daring in "diplomacy equal to his own. Timid re"monstrances, torpid discussion, are lost
 "upon such an adversary. But vigour and "decision are only to be employed by great "abilities, and commanding reputations.—
 "Weak men may be precipitate and rash.
 "They can never be vigorous and stout, be"cause they have no wisdom, no prudence.
 "They are sure to produce contention;
 "while the decision of firmness, of genius,
 "always secures victory. From the cha"racter of the present administration, in"deed, it would be in vain to expect acts
 "of vigour. It would be even dangerous "for them to assume a tone of firmness.
 "Their talents, their reputation, do not "warrant those bold and decisive steps
 "which succeed only with superior men.
 "Knowing this, Buonaparté has, from the "beginning, treated ministers with an air
 "that bespeaks consciousness of his ascen"dancy. In every disputed question during "the negotiation, he was ultimately victo"rious. It may well be remembered, dur"ing the negotiation at Amiens, what an "appearance of vigour was assumed, what "note of preparation was sounded! The "definitive treaty at length was published,
 "and in every principle, in every detail, it
 "was found more advantageous to France
 "than the preliminary articles. [*The very "words of all those who opposed the peace,
 "as every person who reads the newspapers
 "must well remember.*] With the same
 "domineering superiority Buonaparté con"tinues to act towards them. He knows
 "their want of true firmness, as he knows
 "their want of real capacity. He cavils,
 "demands, refuses. He expects a momen-
 "tary reluctance, an argument in a memo"rial, but he knows that, by perseverance,
 "his object will be attained. By this con"duct with such a ministry, he is perpe"tually gaining. It is not the rapid con"quest of arms, but it is a conquest per"haps more fatal. [Windham's Speech,
 "p. 24 and 25, where the whole process is

" minutely described.] The habit of dictating on the one hand, and of submitting upon the other, is contracted. The spirit of command, and the spirit of obedience, become the respective attributes of the two countries, and absolute conquest is prepared by the utter subjugation of national dignity, and extinction of national pride.

" At a time when such a formidable rival, one never content with acquisition, but in the perpetual act of acquiring more, is presented to us, it would have demanded all the talents, all the reputation combined, which this nation possesses, to oppose his encroaching spirit. It would have required a ministry singularly adapted to the conduct of foreign affairs to have given us weight, and to have given France limits on the continent. Foreign powers ought to have been solicited, and gained over to the general interests of the community. The family of Europe (to use Buonaparté's own phrase) should have been united against the rebellious, unnatural disposition of one of its members. But IT REQUIRES A GREAT AND COMMANDING REPUTATION TO GAIN THE CONFIDENCE OF FOREIGN POWERS.—ANY MAN, HOWEVER INSIGNIFICANT, MAY SUPPORT A COURT INTRIGUE, OR LEAD A VENAL, SPIRITLESS CREW, WHO ADHERE TO ANY MINISTER; BUT OUT OF THE CIRCLE OF OUR OWN KINGDOM SUCH MEN TRULY FIND THEIR LEVEL. NO FOREIGN COURT, NO CONSENT OF MEN, NO FEELING OF SOCIETY IN DANGER AND IN ARMS, CAN RALLY ROUND SUCH HOLIDAY MINISTERS. NO DEPENDANCE CAN BE PLACED ON THEM."

[This is the very sentiment contained in the letter of our Stockholm correspondent, p. 361.]

" Thus, when union is most wanted, union is made impossible. Hence the wonderful effect of reputation for the achievement of good; hence the sacred infeasible duty of great men guarding their reputation free from reproach, because it is a public property. Foreign powers that would commit themselves to the bark which carries Cæsar, will not trust themselves with a low, obscure, nameless crew. Hence the abandoned state in which we are left naked to our enemies."

To every sentence, phrase, word, and syllable, of this extract do we most heartily subscribe, and our readers will do us the justice to recollect, that, in so doing, we strictly adhere to those principles and opinions, which, ever since the signature of the peace, it has been our constant endeavour to instil into the minds of the public. The last paragraph, particularly, we would beg leave to direct the attention of Mr. Pitt. While the world remained in its old-fashioned state; while England enjoyed the benefit of those connexions, which had been formed by the wisdom and the valour of our ancestors, while we were supported in the world by that vast stock of reputation, which they had treasured up for us, to conduct the affairs of this country required only credit at the bank and a majority at St. Stephen's. The times are changed. Mr. Pitt, if he continues to rule, must look abroad, or the ground will slip from beneath him. He must discard the politics of the wise-acres and the wise-acres themselves, or the monarchy of England is not of many years duration. When we contemplate the fallen state of this country and the strange situation of Mr. Pitt, we are naturally led to inquire, who, or what, has produced this wonderful change; and when, at last, we trace the mighty mischief to some half dozen canting candidates for popular favour, our surprize, our disappointment and indignation, are like those of the hunter, who, at the end of a long and intricate pursuit, finds a weazel concealed in the den of the wolf. There is one reflection, however, which, we must confess, is always somewhat consolatory to us; and that is, that a people, who can basely turn their backs on men of honour, and yield themselves to the guidance of these political vermin, deserve every species of chastisement that Buonaparté and his legions can inflict.

Mr. Coke, member for Norfolk, at a dinner, which he gave at Dereham, told the company he had a letter from Charles Fox. He then gave them an account of Mr. Fox's honourable reception by Buonaparté, and endeavoured to impress them with an opinion, that Buonaparté has a strong predilection for Mr. Fox, and that, if the latter were Minister, England might rely upon the continuance of peace, and also upon the friendship of France.—On the correctness of this statement, our readers may place perfect reliance; and, when they have well considered the sort of person that Mr. Coke is, the information which Fox must have given him, together with the motive for giving him that information, then let them compare the language of Mr. Coke with the opinion stated in the Letter to Fox, p. 344 of the Register.

PUBLIC PAPERS.

Decree of the Imperial Commission, addressed to the Extraordinary Deputation of the Empire, at Ratisbon, Sept. 13, 1802.

The Imperial Commission has seen, by the advice of the extra-deputation of the 9th inst. and by the votes emitted in the two last sittings, which served as the basis of it, that by their unanimous conviction and judgment, there exist well-founded claims against the plan of indemnities proposed by the ministers of the mediating powers; that the deputation have also reserved to themselves all the observations which they deem it their duty to make, and that fully convinced of the good intentions of those powers towards the German empire, they promise the admission in common of these claims and observations.—The Imperial Commission thinks it its duty to set out with the supposition, that it is the intention of the deputation to make all the observations to which they are bound by their instructions, and by the duties which result from the direct principles established in the treaty of Luneville; that the idea of modifications reserved, includes all the amplifications and instructions which a legal discussion of all the parts of the plan cannot fail to give rise to; and that at the regulating of these observations and founded claims we may expect with confidence, both from the justice of the mediating powers and their regard for the inviolable rights of an independent state, an arrangement conformable to the stipulations of the treaty of Luneville. The Imperial Commission cannot reconcile at all this point of view and this mode of deliberation, with the declaration to be made at present to the minister of the mediating powers, that the deputation accept previously the plan of indemnities in general.—Such an adoption makes us foresee, that each party, whom it would be necessary to indemnify by the plan, would think that he had acquired a right to insist upon the share that should be adjudged to him, and to check and impede the changes and modifications, which well founded claims might render necessary. It would be equally incompatible to reserve expressly observations of this nature, and yet to deprive ourselves at the same time of the means of satisfying them for the indemnities already fixed in the plan once adopted, exhaust the mass of indemnity to such a degree, that nothing or very little remains to do justice in the end to claims founded upon the clearest principles of justice.—In short, the nature of the affair requires, before the plan in general be adopted, that the deputation should previously occupy itself with the examination of the observations made against several of its parts, and to infer from the examination of each of those parts, what it will be proper to do upon the whole.—In this state of affairs the Imperial Commission has been glad to find in the second advice of the deputation an opportunity of acceding to the opinion contained in it. Always disposed to concur in every thing that can serve to accelerate the task of the deputation, the Commission declares that it is ready to transmit, without delay, the three claims mentioned to the ministers of the mediating powers, and it thinks that this communication ought to be accompanied with the following declaration:—"It is acknowledged with sensibility, that the two powers have wished to take upon themselves the mediation in an affair so complicated and important, and to cause to be submitted to the deputation by their ministers, declarations relative to the regulating of the objects reserved for a particular Convention in the 5th and 7th articles of the treaty of Luneville.—Fully convinced of the good intentions of the two powers towards the empire, and of their justice, care will be taken to communicate to the ministers, the pressing representations made against the plan proposed, as well as the observations which the deputation themselves may deem necessary, and to concert with the said ministers, after having obtained the requisite information, in order to procure with impartial justice for each the indemnity due to him in virtue of the treaty of Luneville, and to come to a resolution as soon as possible, which shall be submitted to his Imperial Majesty and to the empire."—The Imperial Commission expects to receive soon an ulterior advice from the deputation; it recommends it to them at the same time to take into consideration, as soon as possible, the fresh claims that may be made; for the rest, it cannot dispense with making known the full assent of his Imperial Majesty to the principles of equity and justice established by common consent in the first advice of the deputation with respect to those who, without any fault on their side, shall be the victims of the peace.—(Signed)—Baron De Hugel.

Notes of the Ministers of France and Russia, addressed to the Extraordinary Deputation, at Ratisbon, and dated Sept. 15, 1802.

Note of the French Minister.

The undersigned Minister Extraordinary of the French Republic to the Diet of the Germanic Empire, has taken the earliest opportunity of transmitting to his government the rescript communicated by the sub-delegate of Bohemia to the extraordinary deputation of the empire, in the sitting of the 24th of August, and communicated also to the undersigned on the 28th of the said month. He is charged to transmit to the deputation the following observations:—The First Consul has been much affected to see that his intentions for securing the peace and prosperity of the Germanic body have been misunderstood, since they reproach him with not having answered the overtures made by his Imperial and Royal Majesty since the conclusion of the treaty of Luneville, and having thus retarded to Germany, that interesting portion of Europe, the advantages of the peace, he must declare that the overtures which, though confidential and secret, are at present publicly alluded to by the Court of Vienna, far from being calculated to procure the execution of the 9th article of the treaty of Luneville, could tend only to remove, not to promote, the means of providing for the indemnification of so many secular princes, who had sustained such considerable losses; their only object was to regulate the indemnification of the Archduke Ferdinand, by employing lay and hereditary dominions. The projects of the Court of Vienna tended to extend its territory beyond the Lech, and their effect consequently would have been to erase Bavaria from the number of the powers.—Justice and generosity, which are always the first heard in the heart of the First Consul, made it a law with him to forget what wrongs the elector might have done to the republic, and not to suffer to perish a state weakened and threatened, but however hitherto secured by the policy of the governments interested in maintaining a just equilibrium in Germany; for, if the equilibrium of Europe requires that Austria should be great and powerful, that of Germany requires that Bavaria should be preserved entire and protected from all further invasion. What would become of the Germanic body, if the principal states which compose it should see their independence every moment endangered? and would not the honour even of that ancient federation suffer, by weakening a prince whose house has concurred in so honourable a manner to the establishment and support of the Germanic constitution? It is not then at Paris that the insinuations of the Court of Vienna, in regard to the affairs of Germany, could be received, and, though it has since renewed them at Petersburg, they could not meet with better success. The great and generous soul of the Emperor Alexander could not permit him to neglect the interests of Bavaria, which were recommended to him also by the ties of blood and by every consideration of sound policy. Having been unable to succeed either at Petersburg or Paris, the Court of Vienna nevertheless pursued at Munich the execution of its projects, and it was the communication of his uneasiness made by the Elector to the French and Russian governments, which contributed above all to make them feel the necessity of uniting their influence to protect the hereditary princes, secure the execution of the seventh article of the treaty of Luneville, and not to suffer to fall to the lowest rank one of the oldest, and not long ago one of the most powerful houses of Germany.—The undersigned, therefore, is charged to declare to the deputation, that the states of his Serene Highness the Elector Palatine of Bavaria, as well as the possessions destined for him as indemnities, and as necessary for re-establishing the equilibrium of Germany, are naturally and indispensably placed under the protection of the mediating powers; that the First Consul, personally, will not suffer the important place of Passau to remain in the hands of Austria, nor allow it to obtain any part of the territories which Bavaria possesses on the right of the Inn; for he considers that there would be no independence for Bavaria, the moment when the troops of Austria should be near its capital. It remains to the undersigned to express to the deputation, the regret which the First Consul feels for divulging negotiations which took place only under the seal of confidence, and the secrecy of which ought consequently to have remained sacred; but he has been constrained to it by just reprisals, and by the value which he attaches to the opinion and esteem of the brave and upright German people.—(Signed)—Lasféré.

Note of the Russian Minister.

The undersigned Plenipotentiary of his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, to the Germanic Diet, has seen a Note, dated the same day, which was transmitted to the Extraordinary Diet of the Empire, in the name of the French Republic, in consequence of the rescript communicated by the Sub-delegate of Bohemia to the deputation, in its sitting of the 24th of August, and communicated also to the undersigned on the 28th of the same month. At present he can only refer to the contents of his note delivered to the deputation next day, August 29, without dwelling on the facts which preceded and rendered necessary the concert between Russia and France. But he must again declare, that his Imperial Majesty has manifested the sentiments of justice by which he is distinguished, and the interests he takes in the happiness and equilibrium of the Germanic Empire, in the declaration which he caused to be transmitted on the 18th of August last, conjointly with the First Consul. His Imperial Majesty cannot then but expect its speedy accomplishment. He particularly considers the hereditary states of his Serene Highness the Elector Palatine of Bavaria, as well as the possessions assigned to him as an indemnity, as indispensably placed under the protection of the mediation; and has no doubt that the town of Passau will be immediately given up to its destination.—Baron de Eukler.

The following Votes were also delivered in the same Sitting at which these Notes were read.

Bohemia.—Before the result of the votes respecting the declarations of the two mediating powers had been converted into a Conclusion, in the sitting of the 8th, the Sub-delegate entered into an exposition of the reasons which did not permit him to accede to the plan contained in these declarations. But now that the Conclusion has been come to, fresh orders from his court impose it upon him as a duty to confirm his first refusal, by a second still more formal. In one view of the question, and in that which should be considered before all others, the acceptance of the plan in its ensemble, is incompatible with that justice which it was the object of the extraordinary deputation of the empire, and of the mediating powers, to attain. It cannot, therefore, be looked upon by the present generation, nor by posterity, as the result of a mature examination, in which every right, and every bearing and relation have been duly weighed and considered; on the contrary, it must rather appear to be the work of precipitation and of an exclusive premeditation.—The importance of the business entrusted to our charge, and the desire, that after its being brought to a close, every thing may be established upon a durable basis, ought equally to suspend both of these decisions. In another point of view, this acceptance raises against the best grounded remonstrances, an adversary in each of the persons, who by the tendency of the plan have been favoured beyond all measure. From this instant the latter will look upon themselves as completely secure against the best grounded remonstrances; and will regard the share assigned to them, as an inviolable property, into the possession of which they have just entered. The deputation of the empire must raise by this circumstance a new obstacle between the accomplishment of its own views, and the assistance which it owes to those who have been injured.—The justness of this observation cannot escape the eye of any impartial person; and whosoever hesitates openly to assent to it, must at least secretly yield to the conviction of his own mind, and to the judgment of the public at large. If hereafter a matter of such weighty importance should come reasonably under discussion (and indeed since the treaty of Westphalia, no more important matter has been agitated) the first step will not necessarily lead into labyrinths without an out-let. It seems, however, to be adopting a step of that nature, to follow a plan which, on its first blush and developement, leaves in a great measure unexecuted the most precise obligations of the 5th article of the treaty of Luneville, which establishes indemnities for a third, on the very same basis which was to complete the indemnity which the empire had bound itself to ensure to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and which thus gradually breaks in upon a fourth and a fifth; a plan, in a word, which proceeds to rest upon new principles, upon new bases; which have nothing in common with either the letter or the spirit of the treaty of peace with the empire. Is not such, however, the step taken by the deputation of the empire; when, instead of exploring and of ascertaining a fixed point to guide it amidst this complicated mass of confused object, it appears, on the contrary, to yield to them in the most passive manner?—It is the interest of all parties, and even the interest of the two mediating powers, that such occurrences should not take place; and that what is necessarily called for by the exigency of circumstances, should not appear under the seal and sanction (which must have destructive consequences) of an absolute omission of all spontaneous judgment.—To the end, therefore, that the affair may assume a better aspect, and that this change may take place in the least possible delay, his Majesty, the Emperor and King, has already made new overtures to the two powers—overtures which unequivocally evince the most moderate and the most conciliating dispositions.—His Majesty may naturally look to a happy issue from this his proceeding. In the mean time, his Imperial Majesty ought to reserve to himself, upon this occasion, the decision of the deputation, in order the more solemnly to avail and strengthen himself against every premature adoption of the plan that has been submitted to him. As to the notes on the part of the ministers of France and of Russia, which have just been read, the contents of these notes, more particularly those of the former, were on the one hand unexpected; and, on the other, they appear of so strange a nature, that the sub-delegate cannot venture to anticipate the opinion or the declarations of his court.—The character, however, of veracity, to which he professes to aspire, and of which he will afford the most convincing proofs as often as an opportunity shall offer, imposes it upon him as a duty to affirm, that as long as he took a part in the negotiations at Paris, nothing came to his knowledge from which could be drawn an inference that there existed any pretensions to the Bavarian possessions of the electoral house of the Palatine as far as the Lech, or any project of infringing on his actual possessions: that, on the contrary, the fullest equivalent was uniformly offered whenever the subject of cession or exchange was agitated; and that in general there never was conceived or harboured any project of change which was not perfectly in accord with the interests and the expressed acquiescence of that house.

Saxony.—The minister of Saxony requires that the Directory shall address to the Imperial Plenipotentiary suitable representations to induce him to accede to the Conclusum of the Diet. He protests against the expression of the decree of the Imperial Commission, which is at the head of the declaration of the minister of Bohemia, an expression which would change the nature of the relations of the Diet of the Empire.

Brandenburgh.—After the example of Saxony, the sub-delegate of Brandenburgh likewise objects to the title of Decree of the Imperial Commission. He declares that he does not recognize, in the most distant manner, in the sub-delegate of Bohemia, the quality of Imperial Commissioner, and that such a designation is inconsistent with the usages applicable to an extraordinary Diet, formed to treat with foreign powers. Passing then to the object of the deliberation, he expresses his surprise and grief, that under circumstances so urgent as the present, the Imperial Plenipotentiary not only refuses to accede to a resolution required by the general interests of the empire, but did not make known his refusal to the Diet till after an interval of six days.—He thinks that notwithstanding this refusal, the resolution ought to be maintained in all its force, and that the Diet ought to continue tranquilly and without interruption, to deliberate and to treat with the ministers of the mediating powers. “Extraordinary circumstances, says he, require extraordinary measures; formalities established for ordinary occasions, cannot be rigorously adhered to in circumstances of peculiar emergency. The sub-delegate would think that he failed in his duty to Germany, and to Europe; to his contemporaries, as well as to posterity, if he did not unequivocally declare his opinion, that the Diet ought not to interrupt their functions through any defect of formality, resulting from the refusal of the Emperor to accede to their decision. He is convinced that in order to provide against any subsequent delay, the Diet, in case of any new difficulty started by the Imperial Plenipotentiary, is from that moment obliged to enter into an immediate communication with the ministers of the mediating powers.”

Note, dated Ratisbon, Sept. 17, 1802, given in to the Austrian Plenipotentiary, and also to the Extraordinary Deputation of the Empire, by the French Minister at Ratisbon.—A similar Note was given in by the Russian Minister.

The undersigned envoy extraordinary from the French Republic to the German Diet, has seen from the printed protocol of the sittings of the extraordinary deputation of the Empire, that the said deputation has passed several conclusums which have been transmitted to his Excellency the Austrian Plenipotentiary, in order that they all, without exception, and especially the principal conclusions of the sitting of the 8th of September, may be communicated by him to the ministers of the mediating powers; he therefore requests the Austrian Plenipotentiary, at length, to make this communication, which in the present state of things cannot longer be deferred without great inconvenience, unless his Excellency wishes to depart from the established custom, and would rather chuse that the undersigned should apply to the directory.—The undersigned renews to his Excellency the Baron Von Hugel the assurance of his high esteem.

Laforest.

Bonaparté, First Consul of the French Republic, President of the Italian Republic, to the Eighteen Cantons of the Helvetic Republic.

INHABITANTS OF HELVETIA, St. Cloud, Sept. 30.

You have afforded, for two years, an afflicting spectacle. Opposite factions have successively taken possession of the sovereign authority; they have signalised their temporary rule by a system of partiality which proved their unskillfulness and weakness.—In the course of the year 10, your government desired that the small number of French troops in Helvetia should be withdrawn. The French government willingly availed themselves of that opportunity to honour your independence; but soon afterwards your different parties began to be agitated by fresh fury; the blood of the Swiss was shed by the hands of Swiss.—You have been disputing for three years, without coming to any understanding; if you are left longer to yourselves, you will be killing each other for three years, without coming to a better understanding. Your history proves besides, that your intestine war could never be terminated but by the efficacious intervention of France.—It is true that I had determined not to interfere at all in your affairs; I had constantly seen your different governments ask advice of me, and not follow it, and sometimes abuse my name, according to their interests and their passions.—But I neither can nor ought to remain insensible to the misery of which you are the victims; I recall my determination—I will be the mediator of your differences, but my mediation shall be efficacious, such as befits the great people in whose name I speak.—Five days after the notification of the present proclamation, the Senate shall assemble at Berne.—Every Magistracy that shall have been formed at Berne since the capitulation shall be dissolved, and shall cease meeting and exercising any authority.—The Prefects shall repair to their posts. All the authorities which may have been formed shall cease meeting.—Armed assemblages shall disperse.—The 1st and 2d Helvetic demi-brigades shall compose the garrison of Berne.—The troops who have been on service for upwards of six months, shall alone remain in corps of troops.—Finally, all individuals disbanded from the Belligerent armies, and who are now in arms, shall deposit their arms at the municipality of the commune where they were born.—The Senate shall send three deputies to Paris, each Canton may also send deputies.—All Citizens who, for the last three years, have been Landamman, Senators, and have successively occupied, places in the central authority, may repair to Paris, to make known the means of restoring union and tranquillity, and conciliating all parties.—On my part, I have a right to expect that no city, no commune, no corps, will do any thing contrary to the dispositions which I make known to you.—Inhabitants of Helvetia, awake to hope!!!—Your country is on the brink of a precipice; it shall be immediately drawn from it; all men of good intentions will second this generous plan.—But if, which I cannot believe, there be among you a great number of individuals who should have so little virtue as not to sacrifice their passions and their prejudices to the love of the country; people of Helvetia, you will have indeed degenerated from your forefathers!—There is no sensible man who does not see that the mediation which I take upon myself is a benefit to Helvetia, from that Providence, which, in the midst of so many shocks, has always watched over the existence and independence of your nation, and that this mediation is the only means of saving both.—For indeed it is time you should see, that if the patriotism and union of your ancestors founded your Republic, the bad spirit of your factions, if it continue, will infallibly destroy it; painful would it be to think, that at a period when several new republics have arisen, destiny had marked out the termination and fall of one of the most antient.

(Signed) Bonaparté.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

United States of America—New York, Sept.—From the newspapers under this date, it appears that two French frigates and a sloop of war, with 800 black insurgents on board, had arrived at New York on the 14th of Aug. These blacks, with several hundreds more, on board of two other frigates and another sloop of war, were destined (as the French say) for Carthage; but the Spaniards having objected to receiving them, the squadron stood for the United States. The Mayor of New York had officially forbidden the landing of the people, which prohibition was complied with by the commodore; but the sick, of which there were sixty, had been landed, and sent to the marine hospital in Staten Island.—The same papers say, that it is reported, that the President of the United States is seriously ill.—The yellow fever had much abated at Philadelphia and Baltimore.

Leghorn, Sept. 10.—Their Etrurian Majesties are detained here in consequence of the illness of the King. Their embarkation for Spain will depend on the state of his health.

Semlin, Sept. 10.—The navigation of the Danube is entirely free since the reconciliation between Passwan Oglou and the Porte. That Pacha has engaged to repair, as far as he can, all the damages occasioned by his troops contrary to his intentions, and to punish the authors. Already much merchandize which had been taken from the caravans, has been delivered at the office of quarantine at Orsova, and several commanders of troops have been hung. It is expected that Passwan Oglou will be ordered to march to reduce the rebellious janissaries of Belgrade.

Vienna, Sept. 17.—It is confirmed, that the two ambassadors from the imperial court, the count Cobentzel at Paris, and the count Saurau at Petersburg, are recalled. The motive assigned for this step, is, that neither of them had any intelligence of the arrangement concluded between Russia and the French government, respecting the indemnities, although the negotiations on that subject were opened at Petersburg, and terminated at Paris. The court de Stadion will in consequence go from Berlin to Paris, and will be replaced at Berlin by general Meerteld. The prince de Schwartzberg has refused the embassy to Petersburg.

Vienna, Sept. 18.—The PRINCE of ESTERHAZY was sent for here three days since, and immediately after his arrival had a conference with the minister of state Count Cobentzel, when he received important dispatches for the court of Russia, with which he set out on the 16th inst. for St. Petersburg.

Ratisbon, Sept. 19.—A note exactly similar to that given in by the French Plenipotentiary, was given in, on the same day, by the Russian Plenipotentiary Baron Buhler, to the Directorial Minister Baron D'Albini, to be communicated, together with the French note, to the deputation of the empire.—The Austrian Plenipotentiary, in consequence, yesterday transmitted to the Envoys of the Mediation the principal Conclusionum of the 8th, with the accessory resolutions, but without acceding to the former.—On the 18th the sixth sitting of the deputation took place, in which it was resolved that the Directorial Minister should again apply to the Austrian Minister, to accede to the Conclusionum of the 8th. The deputation likewise took into consideration the memorial from the Swabian Towns.

Sept. 21.—At the seventh sitting of the deputation, the Imperial Minister declared that he hoped the minister of the mediating powers would be satisfied with the answer he had given, but that it was not in his power to accede farther than he had done to the Conclusionum, and that he reserved himself for further explanation on that subject.

Switzerland.—Lausanne, Sept. 21.—On the evening of the 18th, after a cannonade of an hour, which produced little effect, C. Gaudaurb, Commander in Chief of the Helvetic Troops at Berne, concluded, after being authorized for that purpose, with the Chief of the Insurgents, in the environs of that town, the following convention.

The Commander of the Helvetic Armed Force at Berne, in order to avoid any further bloodshed, and particularly with the intention of sparing the inhabitants and the City, on the one part: and M. E. EMAN de WATTEVILLE, in the name of the Council of War of the Troops who have attacked Berne, on the other, have agreed upon the following articles:—Art. I. There shall be an armistice between the Helvetic Troops at Berne, and those which have attacked the city, to commence from the signing of the present convention.—II. The Helvetic Troops shall give up the place in twenty-four hours after the signature.—III. The leaders of the troops in arms against Berne, engage to obtain from the municipal authorities, the carriages, waggons, and horses, and all the necessary facilities for the departure of the government, and those in office, with their families and effects of every description, and also for the conveyance of twenty pieces of artillery, with the powder and ammunition necessary to serve them; in a word, every thing belonging to the government. The records, papers, and other articles, which cannot be carried off, will be respected, and remain under the guarantee of the parties stipulating. The sick and wounded soldiers in the hospitals shall be maintained, taken care of, and sent to their respective corps.—IV. The leaders of the troops in arms against Berne ensure to the government a free passage to the frontiers of the Cantons of Vaud and Friburg.—V. Should any members of the government, or any person in its employment, not be able to accompany the government itself, they shall have passports to follow it at full liberty. Should they be obliged to leave behind them their families and effects, these shall be respected.—VI. The ministers of foreign powers to the Helvetic Republic, with their suite, and property of every description, remain under the guarantee of the law of nations.—The leaders of the troops in arms against Berne, shall respect their character, and promise to furnish them, at any time, with the facilities requisite to their removal, whithersoever they think proper.—VII. General Andermatt, the troops under his orders, and all other Helvetic Troops on detached service, are comprised in the present convention, and may rejoin the Helvetic Government, at its departure from Berne, without any molestation, with their arms, baggage, and train of artillery; and for this purpose couriers shall be immediately dispatched to the general and the detachments, to inform them of the present convention. These troops shall march by the shortest road, without the city, at the rate of at least five leagues each day.—VIII. The other columns in arms against the government are equally included in the present convention.—IX. Until the junction of the above-mentioned detachments shall have been effected, the troops in arms against the Helvetic Government shall not enter the territory of the Cantons of Vaud or Friburg. Hostilities shall not take place on either side.—X. As a security for the performance of the present convention, two officers of equal rank shall be reciprocally delivered as hostages until the complete execution of all its articles.—XI. Such articles as may appear doubtful, shall, if necessary, be explained by commissioners on both sides in favour of the besieged.—Done and agreed upon at Berne, Sept. 18, 1802.—eight in the evening.

(Signed) Gaudaurb, E. D. Wattenille.
Berne, Sept. 22.—The convention was concluded in consequence of an obstinate action, fought with much bloodshed, immediately before the walls of Berne. The army, commanded by Messrs. Watteville, D'Erlach, and Eslingueur, was composed of peasants, from Argovia, Soleure, Oberland, Petit Lac, Niddaw, and Arberg. Dolder's troops fired from the ramparts, and the peasants threw some cannon-balls into the town, which damaged nothing but the town-house. Mr. Eslingueur was introduced to a parley with his eyes under a bandage. No agreement could be effected, and the attack was renewed.—After a severe and warmly-sustained combat, at one of the gates, the usurpers proposed to capitulate. It is doubtful whether they may find a gracious reception at Lausanne. The whole Pays de Vaud is in commotion—the peasants are up in arms—but whether to support the revolutionary cause, we know not.—General Andermatt, abruptly recalled by the now exiled government from Zurich, left to the townsmen his heavy artillery. He proceeds by forced marches towards Lausanne. But he is pursued by Reding: he is between the army which has conquered at Berne and that of the small Cantons: and unless he be comprehended in the capitulation, his troops will be entirely dispersed.—M. de Watteville was, on the 29th, named commander in chief, and paid a visit to the French minister, Verninac, who gave him a very obliging reception. The bear, and the colours of Berne, are already restored to their wonted places. Friburg has surrendered to the peasant army. Soieure likewise surrendered on the 17th. All Switzerland, except the Pays de Vaud, will soon enjoy the renovated authority of its ancient constitution. The two demi-brigades promised by Buonaparte are to come from Italy, and cannot arrive within less than fifteen days. In the mean time, all will be over. And it is expected that France will not, then, think its interposition necessary.—The ministers of France, Spain, and the Italian Republic, accompanied the usurpers to Lausanne.—Two state papers, of great importance, have been circulated through all the Cantons. The first of these pieces is a letter from the deputies of the five democratic Cantons of Uri, Schwytz, Unterwalde, Glaris and Appenzel, to general Andermatt, the commander in chief of the Helvetic troops. It is dated Schwytz, Sept. 18, and is signed by M. Aloys Redin, who was the president of the deputies. "The total dissolution of the central government of Berne (says he), authorizes us, as well as every patriotic inhabitant of Switzerland, no longer to recognize a government, springing originally from faction, and formed by the influence of a few individuals. All your obligations to obedience have ceased, and as you, as well as your troops, no longer belong to any legal government, whatever opposition you make against the troops of the democratic states, whatever hostilities you are guilty of against the inhabitants, villages, cities or districts of Switzerland, will be considered as acts of personal hostility, and you and your officers shall be personally responsible for the consequences, since we cannot longer consider you as troops paid by a government legally formed and recognized.—On the other hand, it is in your power, and in the power of your officers and soldiers, quietly to return to your homes, and if you there conduct yourselves as orderly and peaceable citizens, a preference will be given to you at the period when a new legal central government shall be formed by order of the respective Cantons.—You are charged to communicate our pleasure to your officers and soldiers, and to answer within three hours at farthest after receiving our letter, by a declaration whether, as Swiss attached to their country, you wish to put an end to civil war, or whether you are desirous of being considered as wandering banditti who menace the repose, the liberty, and the safety of their fellow citizens."—The conclusion of the other assumes the form of a proclamation of the five democratic Cantons to the inhabitants of the other Cantons of Switzerland. It begins in these words:—"The Swiss name is for ever degraded by the most detestable of all crimes with which the dissident Helvetic government closed its career (the bombarding of the town of Zurich). We are fully resolved to rescue our country and to break the chains which tyrants were preparing to impose upon it. We enter into your country and cantons, not as enemies, but as friends, animated by a laudable anxiety to establish an equal participation of rights and of liberty between the towns and the villages, and to second you by every sinew of our strength in order to secure to you a re-union between the towns and villages by means of a central government, emanating from the Cantons.—To that effect we call upon you to send two delegates to Schwytz before the 24th September, one of them representing the towns, the other the villages.—You will at the same time also take care to establish in your canton an adequate armed force in the following proportion: for Zurich, 2000 men; for Berne, 3000; for Lucerne, 1200; for Friburg, 800; for Soleure, 1000; for Schaffhausen, 500; for Basle, 400; for the Grisons, 2000; for Bellinzona, 600; for Lugano, 600; for Turgovia, 500; for St. Gall, 1200; for Baden, 400; and for the democratic Cantons, 6000 men."—This address bears date Schwytz, Sept. 18, and is signed by the president Reding.

Berne, Sept. 23.—In giving an account of the taking of this city, the numbers of the besiegers have been much exaggerated. The fact is, this grand affair was effected in two hours, with only two hundred and forty men. After the convention which followed the second bombardment of Zurich, general Andermatt, with the 1200 men which remained with him, marched to Ergen, from which place an equal number of insurgents had marched for the relief of Zurich; but as they had taken a different route, they did not fall in with general Andermatt. That general, however, was stopped in his march near Aarau, by a body of 500 men, under the command of M. May, who compelled him to sign a convention, by which he agreed to retreat to Berne, and not to interrupt the proceedings of the Berneze army. Twelve hundred men of that army marched to Soleure, and took possession of it on Friday 18th September. On the next day 1500 men proceeded from Soleure to Berne. The advanced guard of this corps consisted of 240 men, and was commanded by M. Essinguer Mulinen. In his march he met M. Laharpe, who was reconnoitring with 300 men. The latter immediately prepared to defend himself, but at the same time offered an armistice of two hours. To this M. May consented, on condition that Laharpe should retire into Berne, without leaving a guard upon the heights. M. Essinguer having passed Warblen, collected his force at Breifeld, which then amounted to 800 men; he advanced to attack the out-posts of Berne, in hopes of entering the city with the fugitives; but there were no outposts. Being arrived upon the heights, he formed the resolution of going himself to the city, and summoning the Landamman to surrender, allowing only half an hour to deliberate upon the proposition, which was rejected.—At three o'clock the attack commenced. Mr. Essinguer chose 240 men who were the best armed, and ordered them to advance under the command of Messrs. Wagner, Kirchberger, Delohr, and Delverth. M. de Luterman placed three pieces of cannon on a height which commands the town. M. Wagner conducted the riflemen by the way which leads down to the esplanade, and Messrs. Kirchberger and Delverth, with four peasants, volunteers, had the boldness to drag a small piece of cannon opposite the gate of the bridge, though exposed to a most dreadful fire. They exhausted all their ammunition without being able to succeed in destroying the beams of the draw-bridge, which they battered in vain with their small balls. M. Delverth received a wound, of which he died in the course of the night. They brought back the piece of cannon; at that moment a flag of truce came from the city, with proposals to capitulate. There were then 1100 men in the city, and general Andermatt was only six leagues off. The capitulation was agreed upon, and the city taken possession of.—The following paper has been posted up in this city:

PROJECT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

"ART. I. The cantons shall be allowed a month to form each a government, adapted to its usages, its local situation, and its actual wants."
 "—II. The cantons, when once constituted, shall each name their deputies, who shall be made acquainted with the intentions of their constituents, and furnished with the necessary full powers.—1st. To assemble in general diet, and organise a central power, which may be suited to the powers in alliance with Switzerland.—2d. To make the first nomination of the members of the central power.—III. The central government shall be charged with the external, political, and foreign relations, and the general organization of the military. It shall guarantee the cantonal constitutions.—IV. If any difficulty should arise in any canton in regard to its constitution, it shall be referred to the central government. The case shall be the same in regard to any difficulties that may arise between one canton and another.—V. Sufficient sums for the ordinary expenses shall be assigned to the central government.—VI. Each deputy to the central government, shall be indemnified by the canton by which he is nominated.—VII. The number of the deputies which each canton must nominate, shall be regulated according to its population.—VIII. The rights of city in those towns heretofore sovereigns, shall be open to every inhabitant of the canton, which can prove a right to a property in money or land of a fixed value, and paying a retribution in order to have a share in the enjoyment of communal property. Political advantages to be acquired by the right of city shall not be subject to any retribution whatever.—IX. No one shall be eligible to places in the government in the cantons heretofore aristocratic, except those who possess the right of city above mentioned.—X. The new cantons, such as Turgovia and others, which have not yet had a constitution, shall be free to give themselves one, or to unite themselves to other cantons.—XI. The cantonal governments shall be in possession of all the powers which shall not have been expressly delegated to the central government.—XII. To present this general measure under a constitutional and conciliating form, the Citizen Minister of the French is requested to employ his good offices.—Berne, Sept. 21, 1802."

Berne, Sept. 24.—The council of two hundred met on Tuesday morning. They appointed M. de Watteville de Landshtut, general in chief, with full powers, and a committee of ten members to exercise the functions of government. A body of 2000 men, under the command of Udermanner, have arrived from Underwalden, Uri, Glarus, and Schwitz. They bring intelligence that Reding is at Lucerne.—Fresh corps are daily arriving, and whole platoons of deserters from the Helvetic troops of the line. We now have under arms in this city nearly 8000 men. Parties have been detached on the road to Friburg and Morat.—We are forming three battalions of troops of the line, which will, in all, consist of 1500 men.

Hazet, Sept. 25.—Citizen Lauriston, who arrived here a few days ago from Ratibon, after having a conference with the Minister for Foreign Affairs and with the State Directory, set off for Paris. He delivered a letter from the First Consul, which is supposed to relate to our intentions.—We are assured, the French troops will continue only seven weeks longer in the pay of our Republic.

Frankfort, Sept. 26.—The Prince of Nassau Orange quitted this place the day before yesterday.

Hamburg, Sept. 28.—The Portuguese Envoy to the court of Russia, the Chevalier D'Arânjo, is arrived here on his way to St. Petersburg.

Lucerne, Sept. 28.—Yesterday was mustered the whole reserve of Lausanne, and to-day a company sets out for Yverdon.—Citizens Rutiman, Stalt-halter, and the senator Mesmer, set off yesterday for the army.—The minister at war received the following dispatch from general Andermatt, dated yesterday, from his head-quarters at Morat:—"Citizen minister, the moment I effected the junction of the three battalions of Vaudois, at Payerne, I set off from it to take a position here. The insurgents retreated on the approach of my troops, who pursued them as far as Guminen; night put an end to a very hot cannonade: yet we had only seven men slightly wounded; those of the enemy must be much more considerable. We have made a dozen prisoners, who make but a poor appearance; three of them are wounded. The enemy has retreated from before Friburg. A copy of the orders was found on a dragoon who was killed. I shall send out some reconnoitring parties to-morrow."

(Signed) Andermatt."

Russia.—St. Petersburg, Sept. 30.—His Imperial Majesty has published the following Ukase.—"Having perceived in my late journey through several governments, that notwithstanding previous orders that no particular preparations which might be burdensome to the people should be in any case made on account of this journey, the magistrates had, however, permitted several things to the contrary; that in many towns and villages, gates with various ornaments were purposely erected, the streets filled with trees and illuminated, and other similar arrangements made by the people.—We have thought it necessary, to prevent similar occurrences on the occasion of any future journey either of myself or of any other person of the Imperial House, to publish the following Rescript to the senate.—1st, That no one be ordered by the magistrates either to meet or to escort us on the road.—2d, That the high roads be no where repaired on the occasion of such journey, but only at the usual time.—3d, This prohibition is to be applied with particular strictness, to ornamenting the streets and villages, and decking them with trees without roots, as the forests are thereby destroyed only for the sake of a temporary appearance.—4th, That no person of the nobility be ordered to receive us at the different stations, except an assessor of the court of the district, or according to the direction of the marshal of the nobility, one or two persons of the nobles to provide for the regulation of the relays of horses, and the due payment of the money for the same."

Convention concluded between the Municipality of Zurich and the Commissary of the Helvetic Government.

Different circumstances having given rise to hostilities between the Helvetic troops and the inhabitants of the city of Zurich, citizen May, commissary of government, in virtue of his full powers, has taken upon himself the office of mediator; and has, in consequence, agreed upon the following convention with the municipality of the city.—Art. I. The commissary of government, May, resigns, in full confidence, to the townsmen of Zurich, the military service of that city, and engages that he will establish no garrison there, but will personally repair thither as the chief place of the Canton, bringing along with him only a few pieces of ordnance.—II. All past proceedings shall be buried in oblivion. All the inhabitants of Zurich, as well as all the inhabitants of Helvetia, who have taken part in the late events, are discharged from all responsibility. Consequently all those who on either side have been made prisoners, or arrested by the civil or military power, shall be instantly set at liberty, if there be no other accusation against them.—III. Immediately after the signing of the present convention, the speediest means will be taken to put an end to all hostile proceedings.—Zurich, Sept. 15, 1802, eight o'clock in the morning, in name of the municipality, (Signed) Hinzel, Rheinard.

Head-quarters at Zurichberg, Sept. 15, 1802, nine in the morning. (Signed) May, commissary of the government.

Paris, Oct. 4.—The First Consul has appointed general Beurnonville ambassador of the French republic in Spain.—Citizen Didot, prefect of the palace, minister plenipotentiary of the French republic at Stuttgart.—Citizen Cavaignac, resident and commissary of commercial relations for the French republic at Mascate.—Citizen Parandier, late agent for foreign affairs, first secretary for the French legation at Constantinople.—Citizen Lamarre, late secretary to the department of foreign affairs, second secretary of the same legation, and citizen Recordin third secretary.—Citizen Kiefler, interpreter of the French legation at Constantinople, secretary of the same legation, fulfilling the functions of secretary interpreter.—Citizen Lefebvre, first secretary of the French legation at Florence, secretary of the French legation at Naples.—Citizen Simon, second secretary of the French legation at Florence, first secretary of the same.—The general of division of artillery, Marmont, inspector general of artillery.—Two vessels which set sail from St. Domingo towards the latter end of August, have arrived. The sickness in that island had greatly abated, and cultivation and commerce were fast reviving.—On the 26th ult. the squadron under the command of admiral Leissegnes arrived at Toulon from Tunis. The admiral's dispatches state, that he was received by the Bey in a very distinguished manner, who granted the request made by the rear-admiral, to liberate twenty-two slaves, whose mothers were born in the island of Corsica, and also consented to renew the ancient commercial relations subsisting between France and Tunis. The Bey deputed an ambassador to treat with the First Consul, (and congratulates him on his being appointed consul for life,) who took his passage on board the admiral's ship.

DOMESTIC.

On Tuesday the 25th ult. Lord St. Helen's and suite arrived at Sheerness from Russia, in the Lationa frigate. On landing his Lordship immediately proceeded to Chatham, on his way to town.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

The political topics, with which the present time furnishes us, are so numerous and so important, that our whole sheet would scarcely afford room for a bare enumeration of them, much less for a development of the origin, the nature and the consequences of the events and transactions to which they relate. The eyes of the politicians are still fixed, however, more directly, on Germany and Switzerland, where, indeed, events are passing, which would, at any time heretofore, have set all Europe in a blaze.

The public papers given in at Ratisbon (p. 417) together with our articles of intelligence from thence (p. 425) shew clearly enough the situation of affairs at the Diet ; but, the question which remains to be determined, is, whether the Emperor will persist in his refusal, or whether he will, after some further altercation, yield to the mandates of France and Russia, backed as they are by Prussia, Bavaria, and the other envious upstarts of the Empire. The dangers of war, in his present circumstances, and against such a monstrous combination, are, indeed, fearfully great ; but, it may well be doubted, whether they be greater than the dangers of peace, upon such terms as peace is now offered to him. A war, however unfortunate, could do no more than confine the House of Austria to its own territories, and place the imperial crown on another head ; and these are the very objects contemplated by the arrangement imposed on the Empire, by the arrogant declaration of France and Russia. If that arrangement should be adopted, if it should go quietly into effect, it will be very difficult indeed to undo it, at any time hereafter. This his Imperial Majesty perceives, and, therefore, he may well hesitate before he finally rejects a war, by which he may lose the crown of Germany, for the sake of a peace, by which he must lose it.

Should he determine on war his prospect is, in our opinion, far from being so desperate as is generally imagined. He is, indeed, beset by a ministry not much unlike our own : Cobenzel advised and concluded a peace, which, if not quite so disgraceful as the peace of Amiens, is sufficiently so to characterize him as a minister totally unfit for the conducting of any important enterprise, particularly an enterprise of honourable motive and of arduous and dangerous execution ; but, like our minister, he and his colleagues may be replaced by men of other minds : and, though the Archduke Charles has but too often lent his ear to the insidious partizans of France, the present daring assault upon the interests and honour of his House will, doubtless, have broken the charm by which he has so long been bound, and which has largely contributed to the overthrow of Europe. The people in the Emperor's dominions are loyal and brave, and it is yet in his power to bring three hundred thousand of them into the field.

That Austria could not maintain a long war against Russia, Prussia, France and her other satellites, is certain, if all these were heartily to co-operate ; but, that they should do so, for any length of time, is not only improbable, but almost impossible. A bold movement of Austria would at once keep the Russians in check and completely overawe Prussia, while Buonaparté, placed at a great distance from the Austrian frontier, greatly embarrassed with Switzerland, fifty thousand of his best troops gone to the West-Indies, his Italian Republic held as yet by a feeble tie, and without a shilling in his treasury, would find it very difficult to enforce, by means of an army, the adoption of his plan of indemnities ; and, he must perceive the danger to be apprehended with respect to the duration of his government (to say nothing of his life) from the plunging of France into a new war, in which he could promise to Frenchmen neither plunder nor glory, but merely the honour of shedding their blood for the sake of what the honest Talleyrand calls " sealing the pacification of " Europe and guaranteeing its stability."

From such a league against Austria, if it were actually formed, Russia would, we hope, be detached ; but, this supposes the sincere, zealous, and efficient interference of England, and that interference can never be expected from those ministers, who have made a merit of having abandoned the Continent of Europe, and who, had they not disgusted the Emperor of Russia by their conduct (which deserves a much harsher epithet than we think proper to bestow on it), respecting our faithful ally, the King of Sardinia, might have prevented those negotiations between Russia and France, the first object of which is to nullify the military power of Austria, as a prelude to the destruction of the maritime power of Great-Britain. The Emperor of Russia was ready to co-operate with us for the settlement of Europe, and for the purpose of providing an efficient guarantee for Malta : his propositions were agreed to by our ministers, but Buonaparté threatened a continuation of the war, and the men with "an hereditary disposition for office," made no scruple of leaving Malta and Europe to their fate. The Emperor of Russia, finding himself thus treated, naturally sought to obtain influence in the affairs of Europe by some other means. Of the means he has had recourse to we now see the first part : the second part, which will, probably, not be fully made known to the world, 'till the affairs of Germany are finally settled, we shall feel, if its execution be not prevented by a timely interposition of other councils than those which at present prevail in this country.

Russia once detached from the combination against the Emperor, the latter would have nothing to fear, even though Russia should not become his ally. Prussia would continue to do as it has hitherto done : it would observe a neutrality, insincere without doubt, but sufficient to answer the purpose of the Emperor. On the side of Italy he would have nothing formidable; and, if the Swiss were to hold out but two months, Europe might yet be rescued from the fangs of the Corsican. Three months more of delay, and all is lost for ever: Germany partitioned, the House of Austria shut out from the system of Europe, the Italian Republic completely organized, Switzerland subdued, and Russia irretrievably fixed in the politics of France. All this might be prevented, but to prevent it requires the interference of Great-Britain, which is not to be expected from the present ministry, nor, indeed, to be desired; for such is their want of talent and of public character, that there is neither confidence in their promises nor terror in their threats. In answer to this observation we shall, perhaps, be reminded of our remark in p. 411, that "the present ministers are almost literally no more than tools in the hands of Mr. Pitt," a remark which we by no means retract; for, though we are fully persuaded, that all the principal measures, which have been adopted, since the unexpected exaltation of Mr. Addington, have been adopted by the advice, or, at least, with the entire approbation, of Mr. Pitt; yet, it does not follow, that Mr. Pitt, had he been minister, would have pursued the same measures: weapons which he himself could have wielded with safety and even with facility, he may well have been afraid to trust in the hands of his impotent substitute. What were his motives for choosing a substitute at all, and such an one in particular, and how he will answer, to his king and country, for the consequences, we do not, at present, think it necessary to enquire.

The progress of events in Switzerland may be traced with tolerable accuracy through our various articles of intelligence from that country (p. 425), and the intentions of Buonaparté's relative threats, will be found clearly enough signified in his Proclamation of the 30th ultimo (p. 423). To attempt to characterize this proclamation would be vain, so far does it surpass, in the insolence and arrogance of its language as well as the injustice of its object, whatever has hitherto been seen or heard of in the world. Our readers will remember, that, it is not long, since Buonaparté declared Switzerland to be perfectly independant, and withdrew his troops from the Cantons, in order to give the colour of truth to that declaration; but the moment he finds that the people of that country have discarded the vile creatures of whom he had composed the new government, he recalls his declaration, and, in a moment takes upon him the absolute command of the country, issues orders for the disbanding of its armies, the cashiering of its magistracy, and commands the Swiss Nation (in the persons of certain base wretches of his own choosing) to appear before him at Paris; and, for this daring outrage on the rights of a country, which he himself has so lately declared to be perfectly independant, he has no other pretext than that of acting under the direction of Providence. "In the name of God," said he to the Egyptians, "there is no God but God: he has no son or associate in his kingdom." — Buonaparté is now arrived, and the "Almighty, the lord of both worlds, has sealed the destruction of the Beys.—The French are true Mussulmans. Not long ago they marched to Rome, and overthrew the Pope, &c. &c."—The Morning Chronicle has well observed, that the famous Attila, the Goth, called himself the Sword of God; but that Buonaparté more humbly calls himself the instrument of Providence. A closer comparison might, however, have been found in the modest pretensions of our countryman, the usurper and tyrant CROMWELL, who, when he went to the Parliament House and drove out the members, very gravely told them, that he had besought the Lord to slay him rather than put him upon that work, but that all his supplications had been in vain. Whether Buonaparté did really pray to be excused from the execution of his present pious undertaking, and, if so, whether he gave the preference to the intercession of St. Peter, or to that of Mahomet, are matters, with which we cannot, of course, be acquainted; but it is absolutely impossible to read his proclamation without remarking the striking similarity between it and the summons of Cromwell.

To complain, however, is useless, and of full as little use is it to attempt an exposure of the conduct of Buonaparté: the interesting object of enquiry is, to what extent the Swiss will be able to resist his interference. But, before we offer the confined observations, which our room will allow us to make on this subject, we cannot refrain from adverting to certain passages in the London newspapers as to the principle of that interference.

The Morning Post (of the 7th instant), while it justly reprobates the proclamation of Buonaparté, seems aware, that this glaring instance of the restless and encroaching disposition of Republican France, affords a new and irresistible proof, of the necessity of the late war to prevent the overthrow of the English Government; and as is the custom with those who feel that they have a weak part, it endeavours to fortify itself by enlisting into its own service the argument which it perceives will otherwise be employed by its adversary. The passage we allude to is as follows:—"The charge he makes against the Swiss, of having for three years afforded an afflicting spectacle, is precisely of the nature of the charges the Allies made against France some years ago. They provoked crimes, and then accused the French as the sole perpetrators. Switzerland was tranquil and happy, till France, in a manner the most atrocious, revolutionized the country, at the moment Buonaparté was in his highest glory, just after the peace of Leoben. Since that time, since massacre and pillage were spread over the inoffensive Cantons, by the Frenchmen now in power at Paris; and since the Swiss agents of France, the traitors to their country, have been raised to power, Switzerland has displayed an afflicting spectacle, the spectacle of a noble minded people, constantly struggling for their freedom in defiance of every difficulty."—So hard is it for a jacobin to be thoroughly converted! This is, indeed, the hideous ghost of jacobinism, walking after the body is dead. It is false that the Allies "provoked the crimes" committed in France, or by the French elsewhere. Was it the allies who caused all the numerous treasonable, rebellious, and bloody deeds that were committed previous to the year 1792, before the allies were in arms? Mr. SHERIDAN once observed, in the House of Commons, that the massacres in France ought to be attributed to the allied powers: "You hunt them," said he, "like wild beasts, then you complain of them for being ferocious." This reasoning was particularly applied to the murders committed in the prisons of Paris, while the Austrians and Prussians were on their march into France. But, can we possibly conceive how the murder of eight thousand poor prisoners, locked up and bound, could be necessary to the defence of a capital containing half a million of inhabitants? Can we believe that the sabres of the assassins would not have been more effectually employed against the invaders, than against defenceless priests and women? The deluded populace were told not "to leave the wolves in the fold while they went to attack those that were without." But these wolves, if they were such, were in prison; were under a guard an hundred thousand times as strong as themselves, and could have been destroyed at a moment's warning. There is something so abominably cowardly in this justification, that it is even more base than the crime. Suppose that an hundred thousand men had marched from Paris, to make head against the Austrians and Prussians, there were yet another hundred thousand left to guard the unhappy wretches that were tied hand and foot. Where could be the necessity of massacring them? Where could be the necessity of hacking them to pieces, tearing out their bowels, and biting their hearts?—Subsequent events have fully proved, that it was not danger that produced these bloody measures; for we have ever seen the revolutionists most cruel in times of their greatest security. Their butcheries at Lyons and in its neighbourhood, in Italy, in Egypt, in Syria, did not begin till they were completely triumphant. It was then, at the moment when they had no retaliation to fear, that they commenced their bloody work. Carrier, lolling at his ease, sent the victims to death by hundreds. The blood never flowed from the guillotine in such torrents, as at the very time when their armies were driving their enemies before them in every direction. How the hunting as Mr. Sheridan called it, could drive the French to butcher one another, we cannot see; but if it was a justifiable reason for them, it might certainly be applied with much more justice to their enemies; for these have been oftener obliged to fly than the French. The revolutionary armies have "hunted" the Flemings, the Dutch, the Germans, the Italians, the Swiss, the Spaniards, and the Egyptians; but we have heard of no massacres amongst any of these people, except those in which the French Republicans were themselves personally concerned.—The French most unmercifully put to death eight thousand of their country people, who were in the prisons of Paris, and, as an excuse for this, they tell us that the Duke of Brunswick had invaded the province of Champagne; but they themselves have overrun one half of Europe, and have found but one place in all their career, where the people could be prevailed on to erect a guillotine, and that was at Geneva. Here their army was more numerous than the whole population of the state, and therefore their system was fully adopted; yet, even here, among this little debased and tyrannized people, there were to be found no villains infamous enough to imitate their masters in murdering women and children.

There is something so exceedingly cowardly and ridiculous in this justification, that even the French revolutionists are ashamed of it. They have recourse to another, still more dishonourable, it is true, but less cowardly: they alledge, and Buonaparté's Moniteur has lately repeated the allegation (see p. 179), that the crimes committed in France, during the whole course of the revolution, are to be ascribed to the late ministry of England, or, in their own favourite phrase, "the gold of Pitt." This is an acknowledgment of some importance! The cruelties that have been committed were not, then, necessary to the establishment of a free government; they were not "the effect of irritation, of anarchical confusion, of vindictive retaliation;" they were not the "natural consequence of a long-oppedressed people's breaking their chains and rising on their tyrants:" all these excuses (which we must allow were weak enough) are at once done away by this new justification; for we are here told, that the French people have shed rivers of each other's blood, in every part of their dominions, purely for the love—not of liberty, but of the gold of Pitt.—The reader will certainly feel, with us, inexpressible indignation at a people, who, because an hostile army was on their frontiers, could be prevailed on to butcher thousands upon thousands of their innocent countrymen; who could cut the throats of their fathers and mothers, rip up the bowels of women with child, and carry about the trophies of their base and savage triumph on the points of their pikes and bayonets; but what will be his feelings, when he is told, that all this was undertaken and perpetrated for foreign gold?—Between foreign armies and foreign gold, between fear and corruption, between the defence of Mr. Sheridan and the more modern one contained in Buonaparté's official paper, we now leave the French republicans and their advocates to choose.

Now, as to the "charge" brought against the Swiss by Buonaparté, let us see, whether it be "precisely of the nature of the charges, which the allies made against France, some years ago." The Consul's charge (if indeed, it can be so called) against the Swiss amounts to this: that they have, in the affairs of THEIR OWN GOVERNMENT, acted unskillfully and weakly; that they have shed EACH OTHERS blood, and will continue to do so, unless he immediately interferes. Is this precisely similar to the charge of the allies against France? The allies charged France, and truly charged her, not with unskillful management of her own government, but with an intention and endeavour to overthrow theirs; not with shedding the blood of her own people, but with a design, openly avowed, of plunging every other people, not governed according to her will, into confusion, civil war, and bloodshed, a design which she unhappily effected in but too many countries, but not quite so soon as she would have done, had she met with no resistance from the allies.—With respect to the right, which one nation has, in certain cases, and under certain restrictions, to interfere in the domestic concerns of another, we hold it to be undoubted; and we scruple not to attribute the failure of the war entirely to Mr. Pitt's want of resolution and magnanimity to act, in this respect, upon the liberal and universally recognized maxims of public law: but, waiving this point, and allowing, for argument's sake, that the allies did, what they will long repent that they had not the honesty to do; that is, that they formed and acted upon a plan for the restoration of the family of the Bourbons, was the principle of their interference, in that case, "precisely," of the nature of that now set up by Buonaparté? The allies saw, in France, a people in open rebellion against their lawful sovereign, whom they first deprived of his authority, then imprisoned, and afterwards murdered; Buonaparté sees, in Switzerland, a people who have driven out a band of traitors, which band, by the aid of a foreign nation, had usurped the powers of the government. The allies might have interfered to re-establish the ancient and lawful government of France; Buonaparté interferes to prevent the re-establishment of the ancient government of Switzerland. "Switzerland," says the Morning Post, "was tranquil and happy, till France, in a manner the most atrocious, revolutionized the country;" but was France tranquil and happy when the allies were said first to interfere in her domestic concerns? How often have those, who wished to prosecute the war for the sake of the Bourbons, been accused of injustice, in wishing to "impose a government upon France?" How often have the Jacobin senators chuckled at the effect which this sophism produced on the selfish and factious herd? But, the friends of the Bourbons and of monarchy in general, wished to "impose" no government on France: they only wished to restore to that kingdom her lawful government. The object of Buonaparté, with respect to Switzerland, is not "precisely the same," but precisely the contrary: and yet there are men so perverse as to affect to regard them as perfectly similar! Nor is it a little curious to observe, that the True Briton (which, in some instances, seems lately to have deserted Mr. Pitt) should favour this opinion. Speaking of the proclamation respecting Switzerland, it says: "the mode, in which this interference has been made, is not the most respectful to the dignity of a foreign state, nor, in a free country, can the principle, on which it is done, be approved. It is the PRINCIPLE, indeed, THE RESISTANCE TO WHICH roused into such stupendous action the natural energies of France." Five hundred paragraphs, at least, have been published in the True Briton, for the sole purpose of combating the notion, which it here inculcates! Who would not "rather be a dog and bay the moon," than the conductor of such a publication!

Well may those, who opposed the war, as unjust and unnecessary, be alarmed at the force of the argument, with which the present conduct of Buonaparté, the present situation of Switzerland, and the fate which apparently awaits that country, will furnish their opponents. To justify the war, on the part of England, upon the ground of necessity, there wants nothing but a faithful relation of what has happened in Switzerland, which could not be prevailed upon to join in that war. "Switzerland," says the Morning Post, "was tranquil and happy, till France, in a manner the most atrocious revolutionized the country. Since that time, since massacre and pillage were spread over the inoffensive Cantons, by the Frenchmen now in power at Paris; and since the Swiss agents of France, the traitors to their country, have been raised to power, Switzerland has displayed the spectacle of a noble-minded people, constantly struggling for their freedom in defiance of every difficulty."—Such has been the consequence of keeping peace with France; of observing that strict neutrality, which Mr. Fox recommended to England, and which would, very probably, have succeeded full as well here as in Switzerland. There is, to be sure, an arm of the sea between us and France; but, as the business, in the latter case, was effected, not so much by the French armies, as by "the Swiss agents of France, the traitors to their country, who," (as a reward for their treason) "have been raised to power in Switzerland," it is by no means certain, that the same sort of process would not have taken place in England. Nay, we should be very loth to promise, that it will not take place in England yet; but, whenever that unfortunate day arrives, we shall, with thanks to the late ministry, acknowledge, that the yoke of France has been put on our necks ten years later than it would, had it not been for the war; we shall acknowledge that the "atrocious interference of France," that "revolution, massacre, and pillage," have not reached us so soon by ten years, as they would have done, had the country yielded to the councils of Messrs. Fox and O'Connor.

The means of defence, which the Swiss may possess, cannot be very correctly estimated. We should suppose, that at most, their effective numbers will not amount to more than 40,000 men, even after some weeks of preparation; and, it is evident, that this army must be destitute of many things essentially necessary for a campaign. If, however, they can hold out to November, or if the French troops should be tardy, in coming up, and, if the Emperor is, as it is rumoured, marching a considerable body of men towards the Cantons, resistance may yet be opposed to the master of the world. But we must again and again observe, that, to render this resistance effectual, and to give Europe one more chance of deliverance, the concurrence of Great-Britain must be obtained; and, under the present ministry, that is impossible. This short message, "leave Germany and Switzerland to themselves or you have war with us," from an efficient English ministry to Buonaparté, would yet preserve the world; but the present ministry dare not utter a syllable in the tone of hostility: they vainly imagined that our enemy was satiated, and they consented to bind their country hand and foot. They can never, on any occasion, or on any account, do that which will expose us to even the hazard of war, without a manifest departure from both their theory and their practice. They have killed the spirit of the country: they have caused it to be held as a fundamental maxim in politics, that all war is evil, and that peace, on any terms, is good. One of the grounds of their hope, in peace, was "the chapter of accidents," forgetting that, when once our arms were grounded, fortune would offer her favours in vain, a truth which is at this moment strikingly illustrated. "It is curious," said Mr. Windham, in his speech on the preliminaries, "to hear these chances gravely brought forward, as the best foundation of our hopes, and by those too, who a few weeks ago, while the war continued, would never hear of them, as entering, at all, into calculation. It seems, that the chapter of accidents, as it is called, which could do nothing for us in war, may do every thing for us

"in time of peace. Whereas I should have thought just the contrary; that chances, such as are here intended, were not only more likely to happen in war, but, what is a little material, might then be better improved and turned to account. While war subsists, while armies are ready to act, while confederacies are in force, while intelligences are going on, while assistance may be lawfully and avowedly given, every chance of this sort may, if properly improved, lead to consequences the most decisive. In peace, all that fortune can do for us, falls dead and still-born. Nobody is ready, nobody is authorized to move a step, or stretch forth a hand, to rear and foster those chances, however promising, which time and accident may bring forth."

How soon have events verified these remarks! Had we been now at war, we should have profited from the provocations of the Emperor and the Swiss, or Germany and Switzerland would still have remained unpartitioned and unsubdued; but, being, as we are, fettered by a peace, made on the implied, if not the avowed, condition of never again having recourse to arms, we dare not move even our lips, scarcely can we venture to endeavour by our prayers, to prevent the states of Europe from falling, one by one, under the grasp of that power, whose evident, and, indeed, declared intention is to consummate its projects by effecting our complete and radical destruction. "The consequence is, that France is our mistress; that there is nothing she can ask, which she must not have; (she has only to threaten war, and her work is done;) —that all the objects of interest and ambition which France can have in view, lie open before her, to be taken possession of whenever she pleases, and without a struggle: her establishments will accumulate round us, till we shall be lost and buried in them; her power will grow over us, till, like the figures in some of Ovid's Metamorphoses, we shall find all our faculties of life and motion gradually failing and deserting us:

— "Torpor gravis alligat artus; Mollia cinguntur tenui præcordia libro."

"If, in this last extremity, we should make any desperate efforts and plunges, that might threaten to become troublesome, and give us a chance of extricating ourselves, she will call in the aid of her arms, and with one blow put an end at once to our sufferings, and our existence."

Was this (as it was represented by a vile pensioned caricaturist) "a dream" of Mr. Windham? or was it a description of real dangers? Is there a man in the kingdom, who does not now see these dangers? Not one, except, perhaps, Mr. Addington, who, while his country stands tottering on the brink of destruction, is amusing himself with assisting at provincial balls and suppers, given in honour of that peace, in the concluding of which (according to his own words, on the occasion) he was "the humble instrument in the hands of Providence!"

The length, into which we have been led on the preceding topics, compels us to draw to a conclusion.—Capt. D'Anvergne, prince of Bouillon, whom we mentioned (p. 380) as being confined in the Temple, at Paris, is, we are glad to find, safely arrived in His Majesty's dominions. He went to Paris with a view of recovering some part of the property he had in France, which he naturally enough concluded he might do, under the sanction of the treaty of Amiens. He had been in Paris about fifteen days, when he was seized by the runners of the police, taken out of his bed, and conveyed to the Temple as a state prisoner, where he was detained several days, without being able to learn the cause of his detention. When he was released, he was invited to quit the country, where his presence gave uneasiness. In two or three mock interrogatories, to which he was put, his service in Jersey was held out as the cause of his apprehension; and, we are informed, that, in these interrogatories, attempts were made to draw from him an acknowledgment, that Messrs. Pitt and Windham had directed incendiaries and assassins to execute the most horrible crimes through his agency.

In a former sheet (p. 376) we made some remarks on the statement, lately published in the ministerial papers, respecting the export trade of this country. According to that statement, the exports during the two first quarters of 1802 amounted to £17,174,230, whereas the two first quarters of 1801 amounted to no more than £11,012,250, from which comparison was drawn a strong and conclusive argument in favour of "the blessings of peace," which, it was asserted would continue to encrease the amount of the exports.—We observed on this statement generally, that it was very fallacious; we admitted (what every one who opposed the peace had done,) that the demand for manufactures might increase, for two or three years, but we denied, and we think we proved our position to be true, that, admitting the correctness and fairness of the statement, it afforded any argument in favour of a progressive increase of trade, seeing that the last quarter fell three millions short of the first. In addition to this we have now to observe, that, from adverting more at leisure to the situation of our trade in 1801, we find that the two first quarters of that year were greatly injured by that temporary part of the war, the rupture with the Northern Powers, and that the two last quarters of the same year were, as we before observed, injured by the delay in shipping, occasioned by the daily expectation of peace. This is the reason why the two first quarters of 1801 were particularly chosen to form a contrast with those of 1802, and to exhibit a comparison between the effects of war and the effects of peace! But this suited the candid Mr. Addington better than to go back to 1800, or 1799; for, he would have found the first two quarters of either of those years of war to surpass, by almost a million, his first two quarters of peace. Such tricks might be expected from pettifoggers and quacks, but not, surely, from ministers of state!

The following extract is taken from a letter dated Nassau, New Providence, August 10, 1802.—“A petition has been handed “about by several respectable characters, “for the purpose of procuring signatures to “allow the importation of the usual American commodities, the governor’s proclamation having expired on the 1st inst. “The chief motive was from a well-founded “idea that the trade in English bottoms would be monopolized by a few rich individuals here, who would keep up a high price for every article. The governor, I understand, had paid no attention to the petition when presented.”—The pretext of this petition is truly childish: “a well-founded idea, that a few rich individuals “(trading in English bottoms) would monopolize the trade, and keep up a high price for every article” imported by them! We cannot read this without recollecting the clamour that was, some time ago, raised against monopolists in England. To annihilate the whole system of our navigation laws a better argument need not be found than the one here made use of. It is what the lawyers call a sweep. How can the trade be monopolized, if the ports are open to any and every British ship, whose owner chooses to partake in the trade? If the trade yields an uncommon profit to the “rich individuals” now concerned in it, the people of Nassau may rest assured, that there are other “rich individuals,” who will soon find it out, and participate in it, until the profit is no greater than that of other trade, that is to say, just as great as it should be; and, if the trade, at present, yields not uncommon profit, what ground is there for a charge of monopoly? This is a charge very convenient for all those, who, whether in the mother country or her colonies, whether they purchase by cargoes or by the quartern loaf, wish to make the interests of all others, and the laws of the land even, give way to their private interests. That provisions would arrive cheaper at Nassau, in American bottoms, is very true, and it is equally true, that sugar would come in the same sort of shipping, cheaper from Jamaica to England. India goods would, by the help of such a conveyance, come infinitely cheaper from Calcutta or Bengal; nor is it by any means certain, that the American and other foreign ships might not, if employed in the trade between Newcastle and London, greatly assist in defeating the “monopoly,” by which “rich individuals” keep up the price of coals.—Absurd, however, as this argument is, it appears to us by no means improbable, that it will, if possible, be acted upon in the West India Islands. The colonists of New Providence have done no more than second the motion of the Jamaica assembly, who complained of “the difficulties attending their commercial intercourse “with the United States, from whence “many most essential articles for carrying “on the cultivation of their properties, and “for the subsistence of the inhabitants of all “descriptions can alone be obtained.”—The difficulties they allude to here, comprehend every restriction, that prevents a free trade between Jamaica and the United States, every regulation that gives British ships an advantage over American ships, and the remedy contemplated is neither more nor less than the annihilation of our navigation laws, as far as relates to the trade between the continent of North America and the West India colonies.—The governor of New Providence has done well not to pay any attention to this unreasonable request, but he would have done better if he had instantly signified his resolution not to yield to it, and had given his reasons for such refusal. We hope His Majesty’s ministers will, neither actively nor passively, ever give the least encouragement to these dangerous encroachments.

TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD HAWKESBURY,
His Majesty's Sec. of State for Foreign Affairs.

My Lord,—I now, agreeably to my promise (p. 399), shall conclude my observations on the proposed new division of Germany, with an endeavour to shew, more fully than I hitherto have done, in what manner, and to what degree, England in particular is concerned in this important question.

I know, my lord, and I shall speak more fully respecting it hereafter, that the prejudice against continental connexions, which was once confined to the mere vulgar, has, of late years, been rising in the world. I know, that the base spirit of trade has grudged the expense of such connexions, and, as an apology for its niggardliness, has pretended that this island stands in no need of foreign aid to defend it against the assaults of its constant and powerful enemy. This opinion has, too, been fostered by vanity as well as by selfishness. It is the subject of songs, exhibitions, farces, and poems, without number; it is the great burden of all modern orations, from the stage in Goodman's Fields to the hustings of the county of York. It is little wonder, therefore, that the great mass of the nation does, as yet, remain unalarmed at the dangers, which we have to apprehend from the Emperor's power being annihilated in Germany, or, at least, so far removed from the dominions of France as to leave to the latter the choice of the place as well as the time when to attack this kingdom with the whole of her mighty force.

To combat this opinion, so dangerous to England, so certain, if it continue to prevail for a few months longer, to produce her ruin and her subjugation, I will, my lord, appeal to the political maxims of those, who, in former as well as latter times, have given their attention to this subject. In the reign of Elizabeth, when the nations of Europe had assumed pretty nearly the relative state in which they were at the commencement of the French Revolution, there were not wanting (as is observed by the author of the Historical Essay on the Ambition and Conquests of France) English politicians, who thought, that the queen did not interfere with sufficient energy in continental affairs. Lambarde (says the same author), a celebrated topographer in those days, asserts, that if Flanders falls into the hands of the queen's enemies, the trade and manufacture of England will be lost; and, the well known maxim of Elizabeth's reign was, "do not suffer the French to extend their dominion to the North Seas."—The correspondent of the Earl of Strafford wrote to him thus: "this day we have letters come, that Gravelines is given up to the French, which will make open war (meaning between France and Spain), yet not ease us. For we are not out of as near a danger, that a growing state doth get HARBOURS RIGHT AGAINST US."—In the reign of Charles I. (1637) the Count D'Estrades was sent to England to prevail upon Charles to remain neutral, while France and the Prince of Orange attacked the towns on the coast of Flanders. King Charles, upon learning the object of this embassy, and upon hearing the great offers made by the King of France, answered, that he would do all in his power to shew his friendship, "provided it was not prejudicial to his honour, his interest, and the interests of his kingdom; and that, if the King of France, or the States of Holland, attacked the maritime towns of Flanders, he would keep his fleet in the Downs to act in their defence, and have fifteen thousand men in readiness to pass over the seas."—Howell's Familiar Letters have the following passage: "I believe these distractions of ours (meaning the grand rebellion) have been one of the greatest advantages that could befall France, which, otherwise, never could have attempted Dunkirk; for England, in true reason of state, had reason to prevent nothing more, because no one place could have added more to the naval power of France." What would this writer have said, my lord, had he lived to see an English ministry ordering, and setting the example of, a general illumination, to celebrate a peace, which leaves in the hands of France, not only Dunkirk, but Ostend and the Scheldt, nay, even Flushing itself, and puts her into uninterrupted possession of a chain of ports, whence, from the top-masts of her ships, she can count the number of vessels lying in our harbours!—Sir William Temple thought, that “any firm conjunction of France and Holland, either by confederacy or the submission of Holland (which has now taken place) “would prove “the nearest approach that ever was made to “our ruin and servitude,” and he doubted, “whether it were possible, on the conquest of “Flanders by France, to defend ourselves in “war, either by our own forces, or the alliances of our neighbours.”—You, my lord, have called your peace “an experiment;” was the object of it to try, whether Sir William Temple was right or wrong? A few years, perhaps a few months, may decide the question.—The statesmen of the reigns of William and Anne have left us a memorable proof of their persuasion as to the importance of a barrier between France, Flanders, and Holland. The terms of the barrier treaty and of that of Utrecht, are the best possible commentary on those of the treaty of Amiens, with which they form a contrast that strikingly exhibits the degeneracy of English ministers, and but too plainly indicates the decline and the approaching fall of the country they govern. Bolingbroke, who hated the whigs, and who was far from being an enthusiast in enterprises against the power of France, allows the war of the Spanish succession to have been unavoidable for the purpose of maintaining the balance of power in Europe, and especially for preventing France and Flanders from being in the same hands. He considered the want of greater security to Flanders and Germany as a solid objection to the peace of Utrecht, though Flanders itself was taken from the house of Bourbon and given to Austria as a safer neighbour to England, and though several of Lewis's conquered towns were given back to Flanders, while several others of them opened their gates for the reception of the garrisons of the Dutch.—From the time that the house of Austria became possessed of Flanders to the French revolution, this possession has ever been regarded as indispensably necessary to the security of England, and upon this maxim all our statesmen have invariably acted. Since the commencement of the French revolution, and even since the French have overrun Flanders, the same opinion has been repeatedly expressed, both in Parliament and out of it; nor has there, to this hour, that I know of,

been one writer hardy enough explicitly to deny the danger to be apprehended from the conquest of Flanders, except the profound Sir Frederick Morton Eden, who, in his defence of the peace, observes, with an equal degree of sagacity and novelty, that, “notwithstanding all the various changes in “the states on the Continent, Britain has “long flourished great and free, the dread and “envy of them all;” and who has further informed “an enlightened public,” that “history shews the rise of one nation is “not necessarily accompanied with the “downfall of its neighbour; that the French “Republic may possess the Rhine, and yet not “annihilate the commerce of the Thames; and “that England may yet be free, though Holland is in chains.”—Alas, my lord! it is not the repetition of the threadbare chorus of a vaunting hyperbolical song; it is not assertion upon assertion, conveyed in a strain of flippant antithesis, and totally unsupported by facts or by arguments; it is not a Treasury pamphlet, never read, though circulated gratis, and though so earnestly recommended by those sapient, independent, and impartial reviewers, the Editors of the British Critic; it is not any or all of these, my lord, that will overset the wisdom of a system of policy, invariably pursued by the statesmen of England from the reign of the Tudors to the present day, much less is it by means like these, that we shall be able to defeat the hostile regulations and armaments, which will be directed against us from the coasts of Flanders and of Holland, when Austria is completely removed, not only from the French frontiers, but from all the west of Europe; when other little republics, or states of some sort or other, are placed as a barricado between them; when, in short, the key of the whole German empire is finally and irretrievably lodged in the hands of France.

Being cut off from our natural ally, the house of Austria, it were to be wished that we could look to Prussia, as being the next power, which, from its magnitude and local situation, might afford us an efficacious alliance; but, the truth is, that we have for a long time, from one cause or another, been, with Prussia, upon terms worse than indifferent; and France has availed herself of all our errors and misunderstandings to make a system for Germany, which, in its very origin and essence, prevents cordiality between Hanover and Prussia as well as between England and Prussia. Hanover must be uneasy and sore at being stripped of her own territories by Prussia, and Prussia must be always fearful, that Hanover will watch for an opportunity to regain them. The feelings entertained by the sovereigns, seem to have been already pretty fully expressed by their respective subjects, on the entry of the Prussian troops into part of the Hanoverian territory allotted to that power.

Besides, Prussia, were she ever so well affected towards this country, will not, when the new plan of partition has been fully executed, have it in her power to render us any prompt or efficacious assistance. For, in addition to the double hold of hope and of fear, which France has in his Prussian Majesty, we must remember, that, by way of superabundant precaution, the honest Talleyrand has taken care to place him "beyond the reach of contact with France and Bavaria;" that is, in plain English, to interpose between him and the possessions of France and Holland obstacles sufficient to defeat any enterprize, on his part, for preventing, or clogging, the operations of France against England, which is, indeed, the principal object that Buonaparté has in view in every measure that he adopts, whether foreign or domestic. In short, if the consular plan of partition be carried into effect; if his machiavelian system be once completely organized and consolidated, it will be next to an impossibility for England ever again to derive the least degree of support, either directly or indirectly, from Austria or Prussia.

From Russia we bad much to expect.—Russia is in little danger from the military projects of France, gigantic as those projects may be, while, on the other hand, she might, possibly, though at so great a distance, by acting in conjunction with Austria, or Prussia, again carry her arms to the borders of France. Nor is it the interest of Russia to suffer France to destroy the trade of England, from which she derives so great a profit. It may be said, for the sake of argument, that it is indifferent to Russia, whether France or England purchase her commodities; but, as a writer who supposes this assertion to be made, very truly observes, that, for two reasons the assertion cannot be maintained: first, the merchants of Russia cannot trade with France upon the same degree of security as they do with those of Great-Britain: secondly, France having retained her conquests on the Rhine, &c. she will not have occasion to purchase from Russia commodities to the extent even which she formerly purchased. The timber and masts, the pitch and the tar, of Alsace, Lorraine, and Burgundy; the hemp which is produced in great abundance in the conquered departments; the iron of Namur and Liege; this new source of commerce, opened to France by the free navigation of the rivers of which she has now obtained the command, not only lessens her demand for all the principal commodities of Russia, but renders her, in some measure, the rival of that power.

But, my lord, in spite of all these favourable circumstances, we see, that Russia is become the associate, or, more properly speaking, the instrument of France, for the purpose of humbling and crushing Great-Britain. France has been enabled, in consequence of the ignorance and pusillanimity of those, who have lately directed our foreign affairs, to inveigle Russia into measures directly contrary to her interest, but to which, when consolidated into a system, it will be her interest to adhere. In truth, this system will give her new interests, and will operate a total revolution in her politics. It will bind her fast to the French Republic, who will revive and foster her revenge against England by some malignant compact relative to neutral navigation, and who will find room for all her ambition on the side of Hindostan.

Such, my lord, with respect to England, will be the new balance of power on the Continent, which the wise-acres affected to discover in "the recent aggrandizement of Austria, Prussia, and Russia." It may well be doubted, whether the former two have derived any real addition of strength from their allotments in Poland and Italy; but, it is certain, that, if Buonaparté be permitted to carry his present schemes into effect, all these powers, however aggrandized, will thereby become only more formidable to each other, France having conceived a plan for placing them all at a distance from herself, and for cutting them off from any alliance or communication with England.

Nor is the contemplated project of France and Russia indifferent to this country in a mere mercantile point of view. The tolls of the Rhine, exacted at the entrance of every new territory, were very unfavourable to the trade of France, while we enjoyed favours from some of the princes having dominions on the banks of that river. These tolls are twenty-eight in number, from the city of Mentz to Holland. The revenues arising from them were very considerable, and were much more oppressive to France than to Germany, and principally vexatious to her commerce between Alsace and the provinces of the Upper and Lower Rhine, the free navigation of which river will also greatly injure the trade of England on the Weser, the Elbe, &c. The anxiety of France to do away these tolls will be perceived from the stipulations in her treaties of peace with the princes on the Rhine (See Vol. I. p. 481, &c.); but, she has now precluded the necessity of again having recourse to specific stipulations, on this subject, by one general sweeping mandate, addressed to all whom it may concern, and abolishing, for ever and ever, these shackles on her commerce. "All the tolls of the Rhine" [in whatever sovereigns' dominions they may be] "shall be abolished,* without the power of re-establishment," (Signed) "CH. MAU. TALLEYRAND," emphatically styled "the honest," a man, my lord, who, in such cases, seldom flinches from his word.

What the result of this abolition of tolls may be is, however, of little importance, compared to the fact, that France, from the beginning of her revolution to this moment, has never, in any one instance, let slip an opportunity of manifesting, that one great use that she means to make of her political power, is, to retrench, if not destroy, the commerce of England. From the savage ravings of Marat and his goaty crew down to the cool and malignant speeches of the Consular orators, this object has constantly been the favourite theme. The several sects as well as the several individual tyrants, whether levellers, democrats, or federalists; whether atheists, theophilanthropists, mahometans, protestants, or catholics; however they may have differed as to any and to all other points, they have all been perfectly of one mind with respect to the necessity and the justice of annihilating the commerce of this country; and, if they could succeed in so doing, without endangering the existence of the monarchy, and without bringing poverty and shame on any part of his Majesty's subjects, except those who have clamoured against continental connexions, I, for one, should most sincerely rejoice at their success.

If, by way of reply to this long and gloomy enumeration of dangers, to be apprehended from the consummation of the projects of France in Germany, your lordship should ask me whether we can interpose, by arms, to prevent these dangers, I answer, that we cannot, until the spirit of the nation, petrified by the present soul-less ministry, can once more be re-animated. Can we hope, that, by waiting for a better opportunity, we ever can recover what we have lost and are about to lose? That will every day become more and more desperate. It will require ten times the force to break this settlement of the Empire, than it would to have resisted its introduction with efficacy. Could we have prevented it, then? We could. The Consul would never have ventured to propose this plan, which is intended to fetter our allies forever, if we had still had our arms in our hands. He followed the old maxim of dividing to govern. He made peace on the plan avowed by the convention, in 1795 and 1796, as the first principles of French diplomacy: he made it by separate negotiations and separate treaties. He extorted a peace from Austria (or rather he obtained it, some how or other, through the joint aid of Lerbach and Cobenzl), which was, however, not much more than an armed truce, because it left the great, and most essential point to Austria, the settlement of Germany, wholly in suspense; a point likely, above all others, to produce fresh dissensions and quarrels. The argument then was, amongst our jacobinical and ministerial defenders of the peace: "What can you do? Where are your allies?"—"Mr. Burke himself," said the Master of the Rolls, "observes, 'that we can never by our military force make any considerable impression upon France, without the co-operation of some force or other on the Continent. Why, then, in our present circumstances, should we continue the contest?' Peace, therefore, was made, and at such a time, in such a tone, and on such terms, that spoke most emphatically to France, that she had nothing more to fear, and to the rest of Europe that it had nothing more to hope, from the exertions of this country, in favour of that established scheme of balanced power, which had so long been the principal guardian of our own independence, and the great source of tranquillity and happiness to the civilized world.

Up to that time, to the very moment of the signature of the fatal treaty of Amiens, Austria showed a readiness and desire to enter on the discussion of the German indemnities; but France procrastinated. Her ascendancy was not yet securely fixed, till she had obtained from England, in the conditions of peace and in her conduct throughout the negotiations, a confession of infirmity more convincing to all mankind but ourselves, than the most direct and abject terms of submission could have been. Up to this disgraceful period, too, Russia, in spite of the wet blanket which your lordship threw over the youthful and generous warmth of the new Emperor, manifested a disposition to interfere in favour of the old system against the encroaching ambition of France. This was clearly enough declared to the world in the notes of M. Kalitscheff (see Register, Vol. I. p. 74); and, my lord, it is well known, that, if they had not been discouraged by this country, both Austria and Russia showed dispositions to attempt once more the deliverance of Europe. But no: the statesmen with "an hereditary disposition to office," were resolved on peace, popularity, and place, totally disregarding "the time, the tone, and terms," in which and by which they were obtained. They taught Austria, that she had nothing left but patience under new injuries: they taught Russia, that her ambition to interfere in the affairs of Germany and the south must not look for gratification but through France, and, of course, in necessary subordination to her. For good, this powerful and ardent prince was not allowed to interpose; for evil, he might. It was not till after the 1st of Oct. it was not 'till after the preliminaries of Downing street, it was not 'till after the triumphal entry of Lauriston, the rejoicing of Mr. Fox, and the Treasury illuminations, that Russia was prevailed on to take part in those disgraceful and fatal negotiations, carried on, under hand, by France, and, at length, when France had got possession of most of our restitutions, promulgated to the world, in open violation of her assurances to Austria, and with every circumstance of affront and indignity towards her and Great-Britain. Whatever, therefore, our ancient ally, Austria, suffers from the unjust and insolent interference, which has been the subject of the letters, with which I have troubled your lordship, whatever Hanover suffers, in whatever degree our own interest, safety and honour, and the happiness and glory of our gracious and beloved Sovereign may suffer from the same cause, is all to be directly ascribed to the preliminaries of Downing-street, and the subsequent definitive treaty; that treaty, my lord, which has laid the axe to the root of the British monarchy, and of which your lordship, like another EROSTRATUS, wished "to be known to posterity as the author."

I have the honour to be, &c. &c.

EXTRACTS FROM DEMOSTHENES.

The following Extracts from the Orations delivered by Demosthenes, at the time when the war was breaking out between the Olynthians and Philip, are so applicable to the present juncture, and so descriptive of the character and conduct of our enemy as well as of our own character and conduct, that we cannot refrain from submitting them to the perusal of our readers, who will, doubtless, remember the fate of the Athenians.

In many instances (Athenians!) have the gods, in my opinion, manifestly declared their favour to this state: nor is it least observable in this present juncture. For that an enemy should arise against Philip, on the very confines of his kingdom, of no inconsiderable power, and, what is of most importance, so determined upon the war, that they consider any accommodation with him, first, as insidious, next, as the downfall of their country: this seems no less than the gracious interposition of Heaven itself. It must, therefore, be our care (Athenians!) that we ourselves may not frustrate this goodness. For it must reflect disgrace, nay, the foulest infamy upon us, if we appear to have thrown away not those states and territories only which we once commanded, but those alliances and favourable incidents, which fortune hath provided for us.

To begin on this occasion with a display of Philip's power, or to press you to exert your vigour, by motives drawn from hence, is, in my opinion, quite improper. And why? Because whatever may be offered upon such a subject, sets him in an honourable view, but seems to me, as a reproach to our conduct. For the higher his exploits have arisen above his former estimation, the more must the world admire him: while your disgrace hath been the greater, the more your conduct hath proved unworthy of your state. These things therefore I shall pass over. He indeed, who examines justly, must find the source of all his greatness here, not in himself. But the services he hath here received, from those whose public administration hath been devoted to his interest; those services which you must punish, I do not think it seasonable to display. There are other points of more moment for you all to hear; and which must excite the greatest abhorrence of him, in every reasonable mind. * * *

There are no people who ever made the least use of him, but have suffered by his subtlety: his present greatness being wholly owing to his deceiving those who were unacquainted with him, and making them the instruments of his success. As these states therefore raised him, while each imagined he was promoting some interest of theirs; these states must also reduce him to his former meanness, as it now appears that his own private interest was the end of all his actions.

Thus then, Athenians! is Philip circumstanced. If not, let the man stand forth, who can prove to me, I should have said to this assembly, that I have asserted these things falsely; or that they whom he hath deceived in former instances, will confide in him for the future; or that the Thessalians, who have been so basely, so undeservedly enslaved, would not gladly embrace their freedom. When forces join in harmony and affection, and one common interest unites the confederating powers, then they share the toils with alacrity, they endure the distresses, they persevere. But when extravagant ambition, and lawless power (as in his case) have aggrandized a single person; the first pretence, the slightest accident, overthrows him, and all his greatness is dashed at once to the ground. For it is not, no, Athenians! it is not possible to found a lasting power upon injustice, perjury and treachery. These may perhaps succeed for once; and borrow for a while, from hope, a gay and flourishing appearance. But time betrays their weakness; and they fall into ruin of themselves. For, as in structures of every kind, the lower parts should have the greatest firmness, so the grounds and principles of actions should be just and true. But these advantages are not found in the actions of Philip.

I say then, that you should dispatch succours to the Olynthians: (and the more honourably and expeditiously this is proposed to be done, the more agreeably to my sentiments) and send an embassy to the Thessalians, to inform some, and to enliven that spirit already raised in others. And let it be your care, Athenians, that our ambassadors may not depend only upon words, but give them some action to display, by taking the field in a manner worthy of the state, and engaging in the war with vigour. For words, if not accompanied by actions, must ever appear vain and contemptible.

Would you indeed regain attention and confidence, your measures must be greatly changed, your conduct totally reformed; your fortunes, your persons, must appear devoted to the common cause; your utmost efforts must be exerted. If you will act thus, as your honour and your interest require; then, Athenians! you will not only discover the weakness and insincerity of Philip, but the ruinous condition of his own kingdom will also be laid open. The power and sovereignty of Macedon may have some weight indeed, when joined with others. But of itself, unsupported, it is infirm, it is totally distempered: for by all those glaring exploits, which have given him this apparent greatness, his wars, his expeditions, he hath rendered it yet weaker than it was naturally. For you are not to imagine that the inclinations of his subjects are the same with those of Philip. He thirsts for glory: this is his object, this he eagerly pursues, through toils and dangers of every kind; despising safety and life, when compared with the honour of achieving such actions as no other prince of Macedon could ever boast of. But his subjects have no part in this ambition. Harrassed by those various excursions he is ever making, they groan under perpetual calamity; torn from their business, and their families, and without opportunity to dispose of that pittance which their toils have earned; as all commerce is shut out from the coast of Macedon by the war.

Hence one may perceive how his subjects in general are affected to Philip. But then his auxiliaries, and the soldiers of his phalanx, have the character of wonderful forces, trained compleatly to war. And yet I can affirm, upon the credit of a person from that country, incapable of falsehood, that they have no such superiority. For, as he assures me, if any man of experience in military affairs should be found among them, he dismisses all such, from an ambition of having every great action ascribed wholly to himself: (for, besides his other passions, the man hath this ambition in the highest degree.) And if any person, from a sense of decency, or other virtuous principle, betrays a dislike of him, he loses all favour and regard; so that none are left about him, but wretches who subsist on rapine and flattery. And these things, Athenians, trifling as they appear to some, are to men of just discernment great indications of the weakness both of his mind and fortune. At present, his successes cast a shade over them; for prosperity hath great power to veil such baseness from observation. But let his arms meet with the least disgrace, and all his actions will be exposed. This is a truth, of which he himself, Athenians! will, in my opinion, soon convince you, if the gods favour us, and you exert your vigour. For as in our bodies, while a man is in health, he feels no effect of any inward weakness; but, when disease attacks him, every thing becomes sensible, in the vessels, in the joints, or in whatever other part his frame may be disordered ; so in states and monarchies, while they carry on a war abroad, their defects escape the general eye : but when once it approaches their own territory, then they are all detected.

If there be any one among you who, from Philip's good fortune, concludes that he must prove a formidable enemy ; such reasoning is not worthily a man of prudence. Fortune hath great influence, nay, the whole influence, in all human affairs : but then, were I to chuse, I should prefer the fortune of Athens (if you yourselves will assert your own cause, with the least degree of vigour) to this man's fortune. For we have many better reasons to depend upon the favour of Heaven, than this man. But our present state is, in my opinion, a state of total inactivity ; and he who will not exert his own strength, cannot apply for aid, either to his friends or to the gods. It is not then surprising, that he who is himself ever amidst the dangers and labours of the field ; who is everywhere ; whom no opportunity escapes ; to whom no season is unfavourable ; should be superior to you, who are wholly engaged in contriving delays, and framing decrees, and enquiring after news. I am not surprised at this, for the contrary must have been surprising : if we, who never act in any single instance, as becomes a state engaged in war, should conquer him, who, in every instance, acts with an indefatigable vigilance. * * * * *

I am not so unhappily perverse, as to study to be hated, when no good purpose can be answered by it : but it is my opinion, that every honest speaker should prefer the interest of the state to the favour of his hearers. This (I am assured, and perhaps you need not be informed) was the principle which actuated the public conduct of those of our ancestors who spoke in this assembly (men, whom the present set of orators are ever ready to applaud, but whose example they by no means imitate) : such were Aristides, Nicias, the former Demosthenes, and Pericles. But since we have had speakers, who, before their public appearance, ask you, "What do you desire? What shall I propose? How can I oblige you?" The interest of our country hath been sacrificed to momentary pleasure, and popular favour. Thus have we been distressed ; thus have these men risen to greatness, and you sunk into disgrace, * * * * *

Such was the state of Athens at that time, when the men I have mentioned were in power. But what is your condition under these indulgent ministers who now direct us? Is it the same, or nearly the same? Other things I shall pass over, though I might expatiate on them. Let it only be observed, that we are now, as you all see, left without competitors ; the Lacedæmonians lost : the Thebans engaged at home ; and not one of all the other states of consequence sufficient to dispute the sovereignty with us. Yet, at a time when we might have enjoyed our own dominions in security, and been the umpires in all disputes abroad ; we have expended above one thousand five hundred talents to no purpose ; the allies which we gained in war have been lost in time of peace ; and to this degree of power have we raised an enemy against ourselves. (For let the man stand forth who can shew, whence Philip hath derived his greatness, if not from us.)

"Well ! if these affairs have but an unfavourable aspect, yet those within the "city are much more flourishing than ever." Where are the proofs of this? The walls which have been whitened? the ways we have repaired? the supplies of water, and such trifles? Turn your eyes to the men, of whose administrations these are the fruits. Some of whom, from the lowest state of poverty, have arisen suddenly to affluence ; some from meanness to renown : others have made their own private houses much more magnificent than the public edifices. Just as the state hath fallen, their private fortunes have been raised.

Favours are all dispensed, affairs all transacted by the ministers ; while you, quite enervated, robbed of your riches, your allies, stand in the mean rank of servants and assistants : happy if these men grant you the theatrical appointments, and send you scraps of the public meal. And, what is of all most sordid, you hold yourselves obliged to them for that which is your own, while they confine you within these walls, lead you on gently to their purposes, and soothe and tame you to obedience. Nor is it possible, that they who are engaged in low and grovelling pursuits, can entertain great and generous sentiments. No ! such as their employments are, so must their dispositions prove.—And now I call Heaven to witness, that it will not surprise me, if I suffer more by mentioning this your condition, than they who have involved you in it ! Freedom of speech you do not allow on all occasions ; and that you have now admitted it, excites my wonder. * * * * *

Phillip, as he is a man of consummate policy, complete in the art of turning every incident to his own advantage; there is the utmost reason to fear, that partly by concessions, where they may be seasonable; partly by menaces, (and his menaces may be believed) and partly by rendering us and our absence suspected; he may tear from us something of the last importance, and force it into his own service.

Those very circumstances, however, which contribute to the power of Philip, are happily the most favourable to us. For that uncontrolled command, with which he governs all transactions, public and secret; his entire direction of his army, as their leader, their sovereign, and their treasurer; and his diligence, in giving life to every part of it, by his presence; these things greatly contribute to carrying on a war with expedition and success, but are powerful obstacles to that accommodation, which he would gladly make with the Olynthians. For the Olynthians see plainly, that they do not now fight for glory, or for part of their territory, but to defend their state from dissolution and slavery. They know how he rewarded those traitors of Amphipolis, who made him master of that city; and those of Pydna, who opened their gates to him.

Convinced of what hath now been offered, and possessed with every other just and worthy sentiment; you must be resolved, Athenians! you must exert your spirit; you must apply to the war, now, if ever; your fortunes, your persons, your whole powers, are now demanded. There is no excuse, no pretence left, for declining the performance of your duty. For that which you were all ever urging loudly, that the Olynthians should be engaged in a war with Philip, hath now happened of itself; and that in a manner most agreeable to our interest. For, if they had entered into this war at our persuasion, they must have been precarious allies, without steadiness or resolution: but, as their private injuries have made them enemies to Philip, it is probable that enmity will be lasting, both on account of what they fear, and what they have already suffered. My countrymen! let not so favourable an opportunity escape you: do not repeat that error which hath been so often fatal to you. * * * * *

And in my opinion, Athenians! if a man were to bring the dealings of the gods towards us to a fair account, though many things might appear not quite agreeable to our wishes, yet he would acknowledge that we had been highly favoured by them; and with great reason: for that many places have been lost in the course of war, is truly to be charged to our own weak conduct. But that the difficulties, arisen from hence, have not long affected us; and that an alliance now presents itself to remove them, if we are disposed to make the just use of it; this I cannot but ascribe to the divine goodness. But the same thing happens in this case as in the use of riches. If a man be careful to save those he hath acquired, he readily acknowledges the kindness of fortune: but if by his imprudence they be once lost; with them he also loses the sense of gratitude. So in political affairs; they who neglect to improve their opportunities, forget the favours which the gods have bestowed; for it is the ultimate event which generally determines men's judgment of every thing precedent. And, therefore, all affairs hereafter should engage your strictest care; that by correcting our errors, we may wipe off the inglorious stain of past actions. But should we be deaf to these men too, and should he be suffered to subvert Olynthus; say, what can prevent him from marching his forces into whatever territory he pleases.

Is there not a man among you, Athenians! who reflects by what steps, Philip, from a beginning so inconsiderable, hath mounted to this height of power? First, he took Amphipolis: then he became master of Pydna; then Potidæa fell; then Methone: then came his inroad into Thessaly: after this, having disposed affairs at Pheræ, at Pegasus, at Magnesia, entirely as he pleased, he marched into Thrace. Here, while engaged in expelling some, and establishing other princes, he fell sick. Again, recovering, he never turned a moment from his course to ease or indulgence, but instantly attacked the Olynthians. His expeditions against the Illyrians, the Pæonians, against Arynbas, I pass all over.—But I may be asked, why this recital, now? That you may know and see your own error, in ever neglecting some part of your affairs, as if beneath your regard: and that active spirit with which Philip pursueth his designs: which ever fires him; and which never can permit him to rest satisfied with those things he hath already accomplished. If then he determines firmly and invariably to pursue his conquests: and if we are obstinately resolved against every vigorous and effectual measure: think, what consequences may we expect! In the name of Heaven, can any man be so weak, as not to know, that by neglecting this war, we are transferring it from that country to our own! And should this happen, I fear, Athenians, that as they who inconsiderably borrow money upon high interest, after a short-lived affluence are deprived of their own fortunes ; so we, by this continued indolence, by consulting only our ease and pleasure, may be reduced to the grievous necessity of engaging in affairs the most shocking and disagreeable, and of exposing ourselves in the defence of this our native territory. * * *

It is worthy your attention to consider, how the affairs of Philip are at this time circumstanced. For they are by no means so well disposed, so very flourishing, as an inattentive observer would pronounce. We must suppose that the Pæonian and the Illyrian, and all the others would prefer freedom and independence to a state of slavery. They are not accustomed to subjection, and the insolence of this man, it is said, knows no bounds ; nor is this improbable : for great and unexpected success is apt to hurry weak minds into extravagancies. Hence it often proves much more difficult to maintain acquisitions, than to acquire. It is your part, therefore, to regard the time of his distress as your most favourable opportunity : improve it to the utmost ; send out your embassies ; take the field yourselves, and excite a general ardor abroad ; ever considering how readily Philip would attack us, if he were favoured by any incident like this, if a war had broken out on our borders. And would it not be shameful to want the resolution to bring that distress on him, which, had it been equally in his power, he certainly would have made you feel ?

This too demands your attention, Athenians ! that you are now to determine whether it be most expedient to carry the war into his country, or to fight him here. If Olynthus be defended, Macedon will be the seat of war : you may harass his kingdom, and enjoy your own territories free from apprehensions. But, should that nation be subdued by Philip, who will oppose his marching hither ? will the Thebans ? let it not be thought severe when I affirm, that they will join readily in the invasion. Will the Phocians ? a people scarcely able to defend their own country, without your assistance. Will any others ?—" But, Sir," cries some one, " he would make no such attempt."—This would be the greatest of absurdities ; not to execute those threats, when he hath full power, which, now when they appear so idle and extravagant, he yet dares to utter. And I think you are not yet, to learn how great would be the difference between our engaging him here, and there. Were we to be only thirty days abroad, and to draw all the necessaries of the camp from our own lands, even were there no enemy to ravage them, the damage would, in my opinion, amount to more than the whole expense of the late war. Add then the presence of an enemy, and how greatly must the calamity be increased : but, further, add the infamy ; and to those who judge rightly, no distress can be more grievous than the scandal of misconduct.

PUBLIC PAPERS.

Note of Baron de Hugel, Plenipotentiary of His Imperial Majesty, addressed the 26th Sept. 1802, to C. Laforêt, Minister extraordinary of the French Republic.

The declaration delivered at Ratisbon in the name of the intervening Powers contained an heavy and unmerited imputation upon the delays which attended the meeting of the Deputation of the Empire. His Majesty owed it to himself as well as to the Germanic Empire, to prove by facts that nothing had been neglected on his part to abridge these details. Far from wishing to inculpate any body, the faithful exposition of what is passing had only for its object to evince the purity of the conduct of the Emperor.—Such is also the motive which obliges His Majesty to call to mind here other facts relative to anterior conferences which had taken place upon the Indemnity of Tuscany, for the purpose of opposing them to assertions contained in the Note transmitted the 13th of this month to the Undersigned, by C. Laforêt, Minister Extraordinary of the French Republic. His Majesty willingly submits it to the judgment of all Europe, whether he can be charged with injustice or ambition, for having insisted upon the full and entire Indemnity which the Treaty of Luneville assures to his august Brother. As to the means which he has employed to obtain the execution of so formal a stipulation, far from entertaining a fear of exposing them in full day, he can only feel a desire for their publicity, inasmuch as all his efforts have had exclusively for their object to combine the strict execution of the Peace of Luneville with the maintenance of the Germanic Constitution. Some indirect insinuations made at Vienna, by a distinguished person in the service of the Court of Munich, have given reason to think that the Elector Palatine himself wished to settle with the Grand Duke of Tuscany upon the exchanges for their mutual convenience ; nobody then doubting but that the Indemnity of His Royal Highness would be such as the Treaty imported. In the supposition that the complement of the Indemnity of Tuscany could not be found, except in the ecclesiastical properties of Suabia, it was in question to concentrate the respective possessions by an exchange of the part of Bavaria, in the neighbourhood of the Bishop of Salzburg.—His Majesty, having no motive to object to such an arrangement, did not shew himself disinclined to give effect to these overtures. Insinuations of the same kind took place at Paris at the time of the ratification of the Treaty of Luneville, and they went even so far as to put in doubt what had been said to the Austrian Plenipotentiary, whether the Elector would be able to preserve the City of Munich ; but it never had been, nor could be, a question, in these different conferences to carry so far as the Lech the Indemnity of the Grand Duke of Tuscany.—Upon what title could the Elector be deprived of the whole of Bavaria? Where could the means be found to indemnify him? and though His Majesty should have had views so foreign from his sentiments, how could he conceive the idea solely to engage the French Government to adopt them? He appeals, in this, to the testimony which he has himself furnished, to that of the Court of Munich, and to that of the Imperial Court of Russia, to which every thing was communicated upon this subject. All those who had a knowledge of the subject which was then in treaty, know that the only question was, that of the Iser, with the addition of the proposition made by Austria to leave to the Elector a suitable extent of County, for the purpose of removing the City of Munich from the frontier; and that this projet, which surely was not exaggerated in the supposition of a full and entire indemnity for Tuscany, at the same time that His Palatine Highness should have obtained in Suabia a complete equivalent of cessions, to which it would be willingly carried, was entirely abandoned by the Emperor, the moment it was perceived that the Elector was not inclined to put his hand to it. Since that time the views of His Majesty for a supplementary portion to be given to his august Brother have been solely fixed upon Ecclesiastical Properties and Free Cities, situate in the circle of Suabia. The plan of it has been drawn up in Paris, and afterwards proposed by His Imperial Majesty of Russia, who in his wisdom adopted it in full. In confining himself to this faithful statement of every thing that passed upon the subject, he may dispense with noticing the inductions contained in the Note of Citizen Laforêt. Never could the Emperor have entertained a thought of procuring for his august Brother any part whatsoever of Bavaria in any other manner than by an arrangement of mutual consent, to the perfect convenience of the Elector Palatine. His Majesty has already given, relative to the City of Passau, every assurance that could be expected from his justice and moderation. He is ready to surrender that City to the person, who by the legal and definitive arrangement of the Indemnities shall be acknowledged its lawful owner. It is not until then, that the present possessor shall cease to be so, and that His Majesty will be disengaged from the obligation which he has contracted, at the request of the Prince Bishop, to provide for his safety until the decision of his fate. The Emperor would not willingly renounce the hope, that the moderate and equitable propositions with which he has recently charged his Ambassador to the French Republic, shall put an end to all differences of opinion between him and the First Consul, but should it be otherwise, his august Brother, without having any pretensions to make to any part of Bavaria, which he never entertained an idea of acquiring, except by the way of exchange with mutual consent, will not the less retain the incontestible right secured to him by the Treaty of Luneville, to a full and entire indemnity in Tuscany; a right, of which the Empire and France have solemnly bound themselves to put him in possession.

The Undersigned eagerly embraces this opportunity to repeat to C. Laforêt, Minister Extraordinary of the French Republic, the assurance of his high consideration.

Note addressed the same day to the Minister of Russia by the Imperial Plenipotentiary.

The Undersigned has not failed to make his august Master acquainted with the Note which Baron de Bukler transmitted to him the 13th of September. He is charged to inform him, in answer, that the welfare of the Germanic Empire, and the most prompt arrangement of what still remains to be regulated in consequence of the Treaty of Luneville, form equally the object of the most ardent wishes of His Imperial and Apostolic Majesty and King—in claiming the accomplishment of what the Treaty of Luneville secures to the Grand Duke of Tuscany, as His Majesty cannot dispense with it, the means of conciliation which he has himself proposed, in that respect, the moderation of his demands, notwithstanding the incontestible rights of His Royal Highness to a full and entire Indemnity; every thing unites to prove that it is not His Majesty's fault that the issue of important affairs, which are at this moment treating of, should not be as prompt as all those interested in them might desire. The Emperor is convinced of the sentiments of equity entertained by His Imperial Majesty of all the Russias; he relies with confidence upon his friendship; he cannot doubt but that august Sovereign appreciates, at once, both the justice of his demands, and the spirit of conciliation that directs his whole conduct.—His Imperial Majesty shall be, no doubt, immediately informed of all the circumstances which have rendered necessary the occupation of the City of Passau by the Imperial troops. He will acknowledge in his wisdom that this occupation having taken place at the instance of him, who is still its lawful possessor. His Imperial, Royal, and Apostolic Majesty, has satisfied every thing that could be required of him, in declaring, that this City should be delivered up, without any obstacle on his part, to the person to whom it should be legally adjudged by the definitive arrangement.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Rome, Sept. 18.—A meeting was held on the 12th instant, of the Order of St. John of St. Jerusalem, in the Palace of Cardinal Braschi, the Grand Prior, to elect Candidates for the Office of Grand Master. The result of their proceedings was then submitted to the Pope, to whom the final decision of this affair has been referred by the powers interested.—His Holiness' choice has fallen on the Roman Prince Ruspole, and a courier has been sent off to carry his appointment to him, to Paris or London, in one of which cities he will be found.

Berne, Sept. 26.—The Council of Two Hundred issued a Proclamation on the 21st, from which the following is an extract:—"We, the Great and Lesser Councils of the City and Republic of Berne, do by these presents assure all our faithful adherents of our good and patriotic intentions towards the same, &c. At length, after repeated sufferings, and four years of disaster and misfortune, we are all arrived at the object of our wishes, to which our good fortune, as well as our duty, invited us some time since. We return to the bosom of our Common Mother, the capital City of Berne, which your courage and fidelity have assisted us to regain.—We are "filled with gratitude and admiration, in contempting that sublime and generous devotion with which you have braved such multiplied dangers, in order to re-establish your Laws and your Government.—The Sovereign Power has resolved to be on terms of amity with those who, during unsettled and turbulent periods, have deviated from the line of their duty;—to those it opens the doors of reconciliation. Of you it expects an oblivion for all the injuries you have sustained, and that you will not sully the glorious triumph of your Country by acts of individual vengeance. It is incumbent on us to hold with a steady hand the reins of Government, and to punish with severity all those who in any manner impair public confidence, or who attack the persons of their neighbours, or injure their characters or properties."—Our Canton is now under a Provisionary Government. The majority of votes was in the first instance for the complete re-establishment of the ancient regime; but they were soon convinced of the necessity of yielding to the spirit of the times. The Provisional Government of Zurich have solemnly engaged that that City and District shall be put into the enjoyment of equal rights and liberties. Those Cities which formerly enjoyed exclusive rights of Sovereignty, are endeavouring to obtain declarations in their favour.—General Aufdermaur returned to this quarter the day before yesterday from Berthoud, whence he brought 500 prisoners, part of the garrison of Lucerne. Yesterday the Deputies from the Lesser Cantons arrived; they have since ratified the scheme for levying 20,000 men, as proposed by the Central Committee at Schwitz. These troops are to be commanded by General Bachman. They have also agreed to make a common cause against the Helvetic Government. The Provisional Diet established at Schwitz is engaged in forming necessary and immediate regulations. Berne and the other Cities, formerly aristocratical, have engaged not to lend their aid to form a Constitution which shall be disagreeable to the inhabitants; they have also engaged to several Cantons not to intermeddle in their internal government. M. de Mulinen has been dispatched to Paris; we are impatient to learn the resolution of the French Government. Other Foreign Powers have been written to, but Ministers have not yet been sent.

Vienne, Sept. 20.—The Royal Family are plunged into the greatest sorrow, on account of the unexpected death of the Archduchess Maria Louisa, Princess of Naples, and wife of the ci-devant Grand Duke of Tuscany. This Princess died yesterday at six in the evening, in child-bed. His Imperial Majesty came to-day from Baden, to console his august brother, who is deeply afflicted at the loss of his wife. The body of the illustrious deceased, will lie in state to-morrow in the chapel of the palace, and will be interred on the 23d in the evening, in the vault of the Imperial Family, at the convent of the Capuchins.—The Batavian Envoy, Citizen Van Spaan, yesterday had his audience of entry of his Imperial Majesty.

Morat, Sept. 29.—The insurgents were attacked at the gates of Morat, and several prisoners made; on the part of the government, the loss was but trifling.

Berne, Sept. 29.—The Bernese Deputies sent to the French Minister at Lausanne are returned, without having fulfilled the object of their mission.

Verninae refused to recognise them as deputies from the Canton of Berne.

Lausanne, Sept. 29.—During the night, between the 25th and 26th, the Helvetic General in Chief received a dispatch from the insurgent commander, acquainting him that the suspension of arms had ceased.—At six in the morning Fribourg was attacked. After an hour's cannonade, the commandant was summoned to surrender. He answered he could not treat with those who had manifested their ill faith, in violating the capitulation of Berne, and disarming the Helvetic troops.—The cannonade then began a-new, and continued about an hour, when a second parley took place, but which produced a similar answer from the besieged. The cannonade then continued briskly until evening, but without the desired effect. The attack was renewed with increased vigour, on the morning of the 27th, when, at length, the commandant was under the necessity of capitulating.—Immediately after possessing themselves of Fribourg, the insurgents proceeded towards the Canton de Vaud, the only one which remains faithful to the Helvetic government. The Confederate Generals have addressed the following proclamation to the inhabitants of the Pays de Vaud:—"We understand that the soi-disant Helvetic government have adopted the most tyrannical measures, with a view of raising the whole Pays de Vaud against us. In entering your territory we come but to fulfill these engagements which we have already made, and promise to wage no war but against that mis-called government. We come to you as friends, and not in the smallest degree to influence your choice respecting a constitution, and our intention is to retire, as soon as, with the Divine permission, we accomplish the end we have in view. Entertain no fears; be not alarmed. Public tranquillity, so far from being interrupted by our presence, will be durably established by our success. We have issued the strictest orders for the observance of discipline, and that no individual whatever be molested.—Every well founded complaint made to us shall be redressed.—Such, dear compatriots, are the intentions with which we enter your territory.—Rely upon our loyalty and forbearance; in like manner, we shall depend upon your amicable dispositions, and above all, trust to Providence for the final triumph of our just and legitimate cause.—Dated at head-quarters at Fribourg, Sept. 27, 1802.—The Commanders in Chief of the troops of the Swiss Cantons.

"D. Aufdermaur. E. de Watterville."

The National Prefect of the Canton de Vaud being temporarily invested with the powers of the minister of the police, immediately issued the following proclamation—"To arms, citizens! they promised to permit our troops to arrive at the frontiers: they have violated their oaths.—They promised not to attack the Pays de Vaud: They have attacked it.—And will you trust to their farther promises? What true Vaudois but feels his heart swell with indignation, and will not take up arms in order to defend his house and his family from pillage, from robbery, and from slavery? Let every brave man come forward, and we shall avert those accumulated evils!"

Basle, Sept. 30.—The provisional government has re-established the ancient arms of the Sovereign

City of Basle, and taken down those of the Helvetic Republic.—In the present conjuncture, the Frickthal does not consummate its union with Switzerland, and the authorities of that country are to remain provisionally charged with the government.

Lausanne, Oct. 1.—The column, which left this place last night, arrived before Orbe in the night; it attacked the insurgents this morning intrenched before the city: the latter made a vigorous resistance. It appears that this insurrectional movement was combined with another. The Bernese were to debark some troops at Vaumaren, on the Lake of Neuchâtel, but the plan failed. Our troops forced the insurgents to retreat to the mountains. As Orbe had participated in the insurrection, it has been laid under a contribution of 12,000 livres.

Basil, Oct. 3.—The confederation between the smaller Cantons and Berne has been signed.—They all agree to use every means in their power to drive those who constituted the Helvetic government from the Swiss territory. The other Cantons have been requested to concur in this confederation, and to furnish troops. The forces of the insurgents are daily augmenting, and their army now amounts to 20,000 men. The ancient form of government has been established in most of the aristocratic Cantons. The great and small councils have been established, with all the rights which they exercised before the year 1798; but it has been thought proper to entrust provisionally the direction of general affairs, and of government, to particular committees.

Strasbourg, Oct. 3.—A large army is to be formed near Huningue, to enter Switzerland under the command of General Rey. Several corps stationed in our department, and a part of our garrison, have received orders to repair thither.—We learn from Lausanne, that the Helvetic Government has quitted that city, and gone to Geneva.

Amsterdam, Oct. 5.—For this last week rumours have been in circulation of an insurrection which was to take place, and the principal persons who were to direct it were openly talked of. The names of Generals Daendels, Dumonceau, Walchenaer, &c. were mentioned. There is not the least truth in these rumours, and it has appeared astonishing that the government should seem to place any credit in them by offering a large reward for the discovery of the author of a pamphlet upon the subject. The party which was supposed to be on the point of rising, was the Jacobins, whose cause seems now perfectly hopeless. They would never have had any consistency in this country, if the French government, when it was Jacobinical itself, had not supported them, and appointed them to places of importance.—General Daendels went this morning to the Executive Authority. The result of his conference is not yet known, but the General is at liberty, and does not appear to entertain the slightest apprehensions. Dumonceau and M. Shimmelpenninck are expected to-morrow. The latter, in a letter addressed to government, has assured them that he is totally ignorant of the business, and that he never had any conferences with Daendels or Dumonceau upon the political affairs of the country: every thing is tranquil.—Semonville is not yet arrived, and this delay is attributed to a political motive. It is said that France will not interfere in any manner in our affairs; and that Semonville will not arrive till every thing is arranged.

Paris, Oct. 5.—Arrête of the 21st of Sept.—The Consuls of the French republic having seen the report that has been presented to them by the Minister of Foreign Affairs upon the French merchants of the Levant, who have passed under foreign protection, decree,

"Art. I. All French merchants and other natives established at Constantinople, and in the other parts of the Levant, who, before and since the rupture between the Republic and the Ottoman Porte, have passed under the foreign protection of any nation whatever, are maintained in the rights and prerogatives attached to the quality of French citizen. (Signed) Buonaparte."

Oct. 8.—At the audience of the First Consul on Thursday last, Mr. Merry, the British Minister Plenipotentiary, presented Lord Cathampton, a general in the army, Major Eustace, aid-de-camp to Lord Cathampton, Lord Frederic Montagu, lieutenant-colonel, the Earl of Oxford, the Chevalier Callander, major-general in the army, the Chevalier Turtton, major-commandant of a corps of volunteers, Mr. Johnstone, member of the new parliament, Major Christie, Captain Brodie, commander of a frigate, Captain Pater, captain of a ship, Captain Mackay, an officer of marine, Mr. Mackintosh, a barrister, Mr. Dallas, King's counsel and member of parliament, Captain Bathurst, Mr. Bennett, Captain Maitland, an officer in the guards, Lieutenant-Colonel Scott, an officer of infantry, Lieutenant-Colonel Hay, an officer of cavalry, Lieutenant-Colonel Blaquiére, an officer of dragoons, Lieutenant-Colonel Harvey, Mr. Roche, Captain Clifton, an officer of artillery, Mr. Anstruther, Mr. Halifax, Mr. Garnier, Mr. Smyth, Mr. Weyland, Mr. Foster, Major Allen, Lieutenant-Colonel Ruddock, a captain in the guards, Mr. Porter, Mr. Robson, member of parliament, Major Aubrey, Lieutenant-Colonel Cockburn, Lieutenant-Colonel Tyndall, an officer of horse-guards, and Mr. Crawford.—The last news from St. Domingo, is of the date of the 28th of August. The Captain-General Leclerc, and Generals Rochambeau and Dugua, were in good health. The mortality in the hospitals was considerably diminished. Some bands of negroes had again risen in insurrection, but were soon repressed.—General Leclerc reviewed his army on the 28th. He had already obtained by the disarming of the negroes 30,000 muskets, and expected to obtain 10,000 more.—The Captain-General Leclerc was occupied with the greatest activity in re-organizing all the parts of the administration.—The last intelligence from Guadeloupe is dated the latter end of August. General Lacrosse had been re-established in his post of captain-general, and had been received with all the necessary ceremony, in order to atone for the outrage which had been committed by a handful of brigands against the agent of government. It is time the colonies should learn that there is no mercy for those who endeavour to create disorder; and that the government will severely execute the laws upon those who revolt against the authority of the mother country.—The individuals who composed the committee of insurrection, calling itself the provisory council, who created an insurrection in the colony against the captain-general, are in the prisons of Erest, and will be delivered over to the tribunals. The tribunals will feel the importance of their functions, and that there can be neither colonies nor national authority, if a handful of individuals may hope for impunity in carrying on conspiracies against the agents of government.—The last intelligence from Martinique is extremely satisfactory: more than forty French vessels have already arrived, and sold their cargoes well.

Rotterdam, Oct. 9.—Citizen Dumonceau, Schimelpenninck, and the French Ambassador Semonville, are arrived at the Hague. General Daendels has had a conference with the President of the Executive Government.

Lieutenant General Daendels and Dumonceau to the Council of War of the Batavian Republic.

"It would be unbecoming the rank we have the honour to hold, were we to enter into an exculpation of ourselves, with respect to a certain bulletin, of which we have been informed by the publication of the government of state of the 28th Sept. Yet we think it necessary to declare publicly, as officers, who love honour, that our sentiments have been entirely misinterpreted, imagining that by inserting our names in the said bulletin, the army would be persuaded that we approved of the propagation of the spirit of opposition among the troops, to the government, and that we wished to excite them to disturbances. We intreat the Counsellors of War to make known our sentiments to the Government of State. Health and respect.

(Signed) "Daendels. Dumonceau."

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

In Holland there has been discovered a plot, or a pretended plot, against the present government; and, it has been suggested by some, that it is a contrivance of the French for the purpose of exciting commotion, and providing themselves with an excuse, as in the case of Switzerland, for taking the country more immediately under their command. This appears to us to be speculating rather too deeply. France is certainly at the bottom of the plot, which we believe, too, to be no more than a mere sham; but the object is, we should think, not to provide an excuse for seizing on the country, but to obtain a plausible pretext for delaying the departure of the French army. Holland cannot, in the present crisis, be completely evacuated, without great danger to the interests of France in that country. The example of the Swiss might embolden the Dutch to make an attempt at breaking their chains. Belgium lies between Switzerland and Holland—two magazines of combustibles connected by a train of powder! The French know this, and they will not, 'till affairs are settled in the former country, withdraw their troops from the latter.

The Emperor still resists the insolent mandates of France, with respect to the projected division of Germany; and, if the interposition in behalf of Switzerland, on which, it seems, our ministers affect, at least, to have determined, should actually take place, it is possible that the Empire may yet be preserved from the fangs of the Corsican wolf.

With regard to the grounds, the nature, and the object, of this interposition, we shall lay them before our readers precisely as we find them described in an article, which appeared in the True Briton of Thursday, and which we look upon as the unofficial manifesto of the ministry. "The extraordinary interference of the French government in the internal affairs of Switzerland, and the evident intention of the First Consul to prescribe to the people of that country the form of government which he chooses they should live under, seems to us to be of more importance to this country, as well as to all Europe, than we apprehend is yet generally conceived. [Bless us! how vigilant we are become all of a sudden!] "It is not only the generous feelings for an oppressed and injured people that Englishmen have, upon this occasion, to indulge (and surely the conduct of France towards Switzerland must arouse all our indignation against the one party, and awaken all our sympathy for the other), but the question embraces that which, perhaps, involves our own safety and welfare as a free and independent state. If the government of France is to assume to itself the right of invading at pleasure, and modelling the government of one independent country, it may claim the privilege of doing so for all. The principle must be considered as a general one, and, as such, affects all independent countries alike. It springs from that system of gigantic and hideous ambition, which would revolutionize all nations, and render all people tributary to France. It was reasonable to hope [yes, the solid young lord, and Lord Castlereagh, the "safe politicians," thought so; but Mr. Windham, in his Speech on the Preliminaries, p. 29, said it was not reasonable. He said, on the contrary, that such a hope was base and extravagant] that when general tranquillity took place, the views of conquest and aggrandizement which France indulged and practised during the war, would have given place to sentiments more equitable and pacific—that the principles which the revolution had called forth would have been abandoned upon the restoration of a fixed government, for something like moderation and justice, as applied to other states. If we are to judge from the present conduct of France towards Switzerland, however, such hopes are not very likely to be speedily realized, and the dictatorial language used towards that unhappy country, cannot be considered as very respectful to the powers of Europe at large. The proclamation of the First Consul deciding the fate of a free people, is issued from the Consular Palace, without even the compliment of previous communication to any other power, at least certainly without any previous communication having been had with this country. Under these circumstances, the cause of Switzerland becomes a common one with every Power, that is not a voluntary slave to the influence of France, and a resistance to the system at present pursued by Buonaparté becomes a duty in the rulers of every free country. [Stand to that, whatever you do.] "Knowing, as we do, how important it is to the interests of this nation that the peace should be preserved, we cannot be supposed to be the advocates for war" [Oh! by no means!] "Far from it—We have ever thought, and we still continue to think, that the present ministers deserve the warmest gratitude of their country for having procured peace at the time, and upon the terms, they did." [Though it has produced such tremendous mischiefs!] "Peace was ardently wished for by the whole nation, and ministers, by procuring it, shewed a praise-worthy attention to the public voice." [So, so! the "experiment" having failed, the blame is now to be laid on the poor mob!] "But the greatest blessings which humanity can enjoy, may be purchased or preserved at too dear a rate. There are evils in the lot of nations, as well as of men, between which wisdom has only to make its election of the least," [Wisdom had then, nothing to do in the choice of peace.] "In the abstract, peace is always preferable to war; but, in the course of events, the latter may become a lesser evil than the price which a continuance of peace may demand; and certain we are, that it is not in the nature of Englishmen to purchase the greatest national blessing by any sacrifice of the national honour and independence. By such a conduct, indeed, we should only embrace a delusion, and should have voluntarily paved the way for our own disgrace and downfall. —While we reason thus, we wish to be understood as reasoning merely hypothetically, and from the first impression which the parent conduct of the French government excites. We still hope it has moderation and justice enough to listen to a remonstrance on the part of a government equally independent as itself, against such monstrous aggressions as it threatens to practise against the people of Switzerland. —We believe that this subject has occupied for some time the attention of our cabinet, and we cannot but express our hope that such a remonstrance will be made as may convince the Chief Consul, that however desirous we may be of preserving peace, we are not yet prepared to

"submit to any glaring acts of violence and injustice. The honour, the dignity, the safety of the country, seem to us to demand some interference on our part in behalf of the Swiss, and we leave it to the wisdom of our Government to decide in what manner that is best and most effectually to be done. Whatever they may determine upon, in vindication of the honour, and in support of the rights of their country, they may rely upon it will be warmly seconded by the energy and the patriotism of all descriptions of His Majesty's subjects."

We regret exceedingly, that our limits will not permit us to enter into an examination of this precious state-paper. It must be deferred till our next.—It will be perceived, by the postscript, that the Swiss people have again beaten the troops of the Usurpers.

POSTSCRIPT.

Lausanne, Oct. 4.—Yesterday evening an action took place upon the whole of the line. The Helvetic army was put to the rout by the insurgents, and fell back in disorder upon Moudon.

Lausanne was this morning under the greatest alarms, it was even thought advisable to remove the seat of Government to Geneva, when Citizen Rapp, an Adjutant-General of the First Consul, was on a sudden observed to arrive.—He went to the Senate, accompanied by Citizen Verninac, the French Minister, and delivered to the Senate a proclamation, addressed to Buonaparté to the eighteen Cantons of the Helvetic Republic, dated St. Cloud, the 8th Vendémiaire.

The proclamation being read, General Rapp acquainted the Senate, that he was going to Berne to make the same communication to the insurgents. He accordingly set out a few minutes after. It is asserted, that should the Bernese refuse to obey the summons of the First Consul, General Rapp has orders to declare to them, that the French government will send 40,000 men into Switzerland.

The Senate issued the following decree, for publishing the proclamation of the First Consul :

The Senate having heard read the declaration of the First Consul of France, dated St. Cloud, the 18th Vendémiaire, brought this day by General Rapp, the tenor of which has already preceded, decree :—That they receive with the most lively gratitude this new testimony of the good wishes of the First Consul, for the Helvetic people, and that the Senate will conform to the contents of the said declaration, as far as it relates to them. A notification shall be given of the present decree to all the authorities, as also to the commanders of the troops who have armed against the government.

The Executive Council yesterday appointed the chief of brigade, Wonderweid, commander in chief of our troops, in the room of Gen. Andermatt.

According to letters from Basle of the 4th of October, the unexpected news of a French army being collecting in the neighbourhood, produced so alarming a sensation, that couriers were immediately dispatched to Berne, Zurich, and Schwytz, to apprise their leaders of this important event.

Oct. 5.—We learn that the confederate Swiss did not enter Moudon till yesterday evening at five o'clock. Bachmann's right wing arrived yesterday night, before Yverdun. As to the upper country, it does not appear that any thing has happened on that side. They say that Pilichoor is in the Bernese army.

It is now eleven o'clock ; still no news : we hope that General Bachmann will not reject the proclamation of Buonaparté ; yet prudence requires that we should be prepared for all events. The générale is beat, and troops sent to the heights that command Lausanne. In the official report of the battle, the government say, that their force was only 14 or 1500 men, and that the patriots had 6,000. The defeat was complete, and the retreat in great disorder.

Basle, Oct. 4.—A report is just now in circulation, that the French general, Ney, who is to have the chief command of the troops collecting upon our frontiers, is arrived at Hunningen. A deputation is to be sent to him, to inquire into the object of his mission.

Strasbourg, Oct. 6.—The passage of troops to the frontiers of Helvetia by the two roads which lead to Basle, continues with great activity. Other troops from the department of Mont Tonnere are in full march for the same destination. The chiefs of the corps are charged to take care that their troops, after their arrival on the frontiers of Helvetia, do not meddle in the internal affairs of the country.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

COMMERCE OF ST. DOMINGO.

The following decree, together with the annexed list of vessels at Cape François, on the 24th of August last, will give the reader a tolerably correct notion of the present state of the commerce of St. Domingo.—The country to which the ships belong, and the nature of the cargoes, being specified, will be found very useful to the political œconomist.

ST. DOMINGO.

Head-quarters at the Cape, Sept. 2.—In the name of the French government, the commander in chief, Captain General, decrees as follows:—Art. I. After the 1st of Vendémiaire, year 11, (Sept. 23, 1802), no other merchandize or articles of provision, except those specified in the annexed list, can be imported into the colony by foreign ships: none can be exported by the same ships, but molasses, syrup, spirits and rum, dye woods, and wood for cabinet-makers, guaiacum, coffee, and provisions or merchandize of every kind, imported by the French merchants.—II. After the same period, the duties on the merchandize and provisions specified in the annexed list, imported into the colony by foreign ships, shall pay at the rate of 10 per cent. duty ad valorem in the colony, according to a tarif, which the colonial prefect shall settle every three months, from the medium prices of the preceding three months, in the open ports of the colony. The duties on colonial productions which, according to the permission granted by the first article, shall be exported in foreign vessels, shall pay, over and above, one half more than those exported in French ships, according to the tarif annexed to the decree of the 3d of Messidor last, (June 22). These productions shall pay, besides, the war tax, established by the decree of Messidor 25, (July 14). Productions and merchandize arising from the French commerce, exported from the colony in foreign ships, shall pay no duties.—III. All merchandize and products not specified in the annexed list, imported by foreign vessels, are prohibited, reckoning from the 1st of Vendémiaire, year 11, (Sept 23, 1802). The captains of foreign vessels, which arrive in the open ports of the colony before that period, shall be allowed to land their merchandize, on lodging a declaration at the custom house. Those which arrive in the open ports of the colony after Vendémiaire 1st (Sept. 23) until 15th Brumaire next (Nov. 6) inclusive, shall be allowed to land the unprohibited goods they have on board. In regard to those prohibited, they shall lodge a declaration of them, and shall be bound to produce them on their departure, under the pain of their vessels being confiscated. After the 15th Brumaire (Nov. 6) vessels, whose cargoes are not entirely composed of non-prohibited merchandize and productions, shall not be admitted into the ports of the colony. Those not coming within the case of being admitted, which shall procure admission by false declarations, or which, after having been obliged to leave the said ports, shall be found effecting or trying to effect a fraudulent landing, shall be confiscated as well as the cargoes.—IV. Nothing in the present decree shall affect that of Messidor 5, which exempts from all duties, till the 30th of Frimaire, year 11, (Dec 21, 1802) oxen and mules imported into the ports of the Cape, Port Républicain, des Cayes, and Jacmel. All the dispositions of decrees relating to commerce and the customs, not contrary to the present decree, are also maintained.—V. The colonial prefect is charged with carrying the present decree into execution.—Signed—Leclerc.

List of the merchandise and productions, the importation of which, by foreign ships, is permitted, on paying a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem, viz. beer, bricks, coals, cables, and cordage, train oil, spermaceti oil, pitch, tar, rosin, &c. essence of turpentine, oats, barley, maize-flour, rice, biscuit, salt beef, salt pork—hams, sausages, &c. are not comprehended under this denomination; salt butter, codfish, bacaga, &c. salted mackarel, dried herrings, pickled herrings, shads, codsounds, pickled mullets, stockfish, live catile, horses, mules, asses, hogs, sheep, ducks, fowls, turkeys, geese, timber for building, &c.

St. Petersburg, Sept. 24.—The great changes that were expected have now taken place. The whole administration of affairs has received as it were a new form; and the beneficial consequences of the new organization are so evident, that the joy of the public is universal. The place of Procurator-General, in which was concentrated the whole internal administration of the empire, is abolished; and every branch has its proper minister, who is responsible for all the acts of his department. By these means all business is much simplified, whereas before it was difficult to know to whom to apply. The senate is also regulated in another manner. The substance of the proclamation, concerning these changes, is as follows:—"All the affairs of the empire are divided into eight departments; which are filled by the following persons:—1. Minister of War—General of foot Waesmitinof, hitherto Vice-president of the Military College.—2. Marine Minister—Admiral Moidwinof, hitherto Vice-president of the Marine College.—3. Minister of Affairs—Count Alexander Woronzof, with the title of Chancellor.—4. Minister of Justice or Procurator, or Attorney-General—the present Privy Counsellor Derzhawin.—5. Minister of the Interior—the present Privy Counsellor Count Kotschubiy, hitherto first Member of the College for Foreign Affairs.—6. Minister of Commerce—the present Privy Counsellor Nicholas Rumantsof, who had the same title before.—7. Minister of Finance—the present Privy Counsellor Count Wasiliof, hitherto Imperial Treasurer.—8. Minister for Public Education, and Popular Instruction—the Privy Counsellor Count Sawadofski, hitherto Chief of the Legislative Committee, and formerly Chief of the Normal Schools.—Many of these ministers have been previously appointed for them.—To Count Woronzof, the Privy Counsellor Prince Adam Czartorinski; to Count Kotschubiy, the Privy Counsellor Count Paul Strogonof; to Count Wasiliof, the Intendant Gurjet; to Count Sawadofski, the Privy Counsellor Muzawsef."

Under the department of the Minister of Public Instruction, are placed the Academy of Sciences, the Russian Academy, all the universities and schools. Besides a Committee is formed to examine into the state of the schools in the whole empire, under the direction of Count Sawadofski, and consisting of the following members:—Prince Czartorinski, Count Severin Potocki, Major General Klinger, Major General Chitroff, and Messrs. Oseretzkoiski and Fuss, Members of the Academy of Sciences.

Lausanne, Oct. 8.—On the evening of the 6th the following convention was concluded, and yesterday morning the ratifications were respectively exchanged at Montpreveyres.

Convention for an Armistice concluded between the General of Brigade Wenderwath, charged with powers to that effect from the Helvetic Government, and Colonel Herrenschiwand, authorised to the same effect by Baron Bachmann, the General in Chief of the Confederate Swiss Troops.

Art. 1. There shall be an armistice between the Helvetic troops and the Confederate Swiss troops; and if hostilities do recommence, it shall not be until twenty-four hours after the return of general Rapp to Lausanne.—II. The line of demarcation for the confederate troops shall proceed from Moudon, on the left by Thierrens, Prayers, Cronay, Neiden, Yvonend; on the right from Moudon, the line shall pass by Chavannes, Brels, Sarsans, Lovotens, Dompierre, Vilard-Bramard, Sedeilles, Chattoney, Vilard-Imboz, Toray, Legrand, Firax, Marnaud, Montogny, Norayaz, Pontaux, Grollay, Corbaz, Pensiers, Barbareche—from this point the line shall ascend the Sarine to Grandfrey, and pass beyond the Uberville, Buglen, and Martelach. It shall then proceed up to the Gerine, by Ergerbach, as far as its source, and shall afterwards follow the summit of the mountains of Planfayon, as far as the frontiers of Schwartzzenburg, whence it shall turn towards Bellegarde, follow the chain of the Halmatt which descends to Rougemont, and thence shall continue in direct line to the frontiers of the Valais.—III. The Helvetic troops shall not advance more than within a league of that line of demarcation.—IV. The suspension of arms must be general, and such, that the two armies shall each detach troops to reduce, if necessary, those who, on either side shall act against their chief.—V. If the town of Fribourg capitulated before the armistice of the 5th October came to the knowledge of general Auf-der-Maur, it shall be occupied by the Confederate troops.—VI. If general Bachmann approve this convention, the reciprocal ratification shall be exchanged at the farthest to-morrow at noon, and sooner if possible.—VII. Until then hostilities shall be suspended on both sides, agreeable to the convention of yesterday, between general Von-der-Weld and Colonel Herrenschiwand.—VIII. If any difficulties arise respecting the present Convention, Commissioners shall be appointed on each side to settle them.—Done at the Head-Quarters at Lausanne, Oct. 8, 1802.

This convention having been ratified by the general in chief of the Confederate troops, the printing and publication have been ordered by the Prefect of the Pays de Vaud.—The town of Fribourg surrendered yesterday to the Confederate troops. The battalion of militia quartered there was disarmed, and sent to the Pays de Vaud. It arrived yesterday at Lausanne. It is supposed there will be some discussion respecting the capitulation of the town, founded on the 5th article of the armistice.

Oct. 9.—Yesterday evening a report was suddenly sent abroad, that a column of the Confederate army was on its march against Ball and Vevy. There were consequently dispatched from hence immediately a few companies, who on that very night contrived to reach Vevy. We were apprised, however, this morning, that the whole was a false alarm, occasioned by the motions of a part of the insurgent army, which now occupy Fribourg, and who finding themselves in too great numbers to be lodged in that town, felt themselves under the necessity of procuring cantonments in the neighbouring communes.

The last letters received from Berne give room to hope that the Canton of Berne, as likewise the Cantons of Basle, Zurich, and Soleure, will accept the mediation of the First Consul. But it is much to be feared that the small Cantons will adopt the mad resolution of making an obstinate resistance; and it is therefore with the most anxious impatience that the answer of the Diet of Schwitz is hourly expected. The arrival of general Rapp at Berne produced the deepest sensation in that city:—the popular leaders seemed to be struck with consternation when they were made acquainted with the object of his mission. But what more particularly embarrasses them at the present moment is, how to devise means to keep themselves masters of their troops, and how to disband them without running the risk of involving the same disorder that attended the disbanding of the Bernese army in 1798.—The following address was transmitted to the French minister:—In the name of the greater part of the Communes of the Pays de Vaud.—

The horrors of a civil war had reached their highest pitch: the blood of the Swiss was shed by the hands of the Swiss. The Pacificator of Europe was desirous that these calamities should cease; he cast an eye of benevolence upon the unfortunate Helveria, and more particularly upon this canton: it is his wish that we should be happy; that we should be free. We shall be so! Be pleased, Citizen Minister, to accept the acknowledgments of the sincere gratitude of the municipalities of and likewise those of the inhabitants of these communes.—The name of Buonaparte can only be pronounced with admiration and gratitude by our posterity, as it is now by ourselves.

According to a letter from Zurich, a body of from five to six thousand peasants have made themselves masters of that town, and abolished the provisional government therein established. This news requires confirmation. The town of Fribourg has also re-established itself upon the footing of its former constitution. The day before yesterday a council of 100 assembled together, and appointed, after the example of Berne, a committee of 10, wholly composed of the most zealous partisans of the ancient aristocracy.

Oct. 10.—Citizen Rapp, the Adjutant of the First Consul, is returned hither from Berne. He has concluded a new armistice of four days with the Bernese, during which they are to disband their troops. The Diet of Schwitz has dispatched a courier to Paris. It is expected that the Helvetic government will also disband without delay the militia of the canton of Vaud, in order to conform themselves to the proclamation of the First Consul.

Basle, Oct. 9.—The members of the Helvetic Diet assembled at Schwitz, have agreed on a plan of a constitution which they have addressed to all the cantons, and of which the following are the articles:—Art. I. Switzerland forms one Federal Republic, under the denomination of the Helvetic confederation.—II. It is divided into cantons.—III. Each canton to govern itself according to its own will, and to exercise in its own territory all the rights of sovereignty which it exercised under the ancient regime.—IV. The towns shall not enjoy any prerogative over the country, both one and the other to participate in the administration of justice, of the police, and in the internal government of the canton.—V. The government of one canton cannot publish ordinances prejudicial to another canton: those who break through this regulation to be denounced to the Diet.—VI. The government of each canton to name a deputy to the Helvetic Diet. The deputies remain in office until their constituents think proper to recall them. They are indemnified by the canton.—VII. The Diet is permanent, it deliberates on war and peace, and on the conclusion of such treaties of alliance and commerce as the general interest of the confederation may call for. It is authorised to repeal and annul the ordinances of the cantonal governments, which are prejudicial to the Helvetic confederation, or to any of its cantons.—VIII. Every deputy, member of the Diet, is obliged to conduct himself, upon the discussion of an important object, particularly of treaties of peace, commerce, and alliance, according to the instructions of his constituents.—IX. The Diet chooses, from among its members, a president and a secretary, who continue in their functions for three months and are always re-eligible.—X. The president of the Diet receives the envoys of foreign powers, and signs the deliberations of the Diet, which are counter-signed by the secretary. The protocol shall be signed by every member.—XI. The Diet appoints the Helvetic envoys to foreign powers, and recalls them.—XII. In case of a war, or threat of attack, the Diet settles the contingent of troops, and the amount of the sums which each canton is obliged to furnish. The arsenals of the cantons are at the disposal of the Diet. It appoints the generals, and removes them, as also the inspectors of the militia in time of peace. Each canton is obliged to exercise in arms and military evolutions, a contingent of the militia, which, however, is not to perform any effective service, in time of peace, and receives no pay.—XIII. All the Swiss are soldiers. None can exercise the rights of citizenship, nor be received into the corporations of artists and tradesmen, nor exercise a profession, nor marry, unless he has a musket, a sword, and a pouch. The government supplies the poor with arms. In extraordinary cases the cantonal government may order the disarming of the citizens. The expenses of war are charged upon all the cantons in proportion to their respective means.

A private letter states, that signals have been established from Lausanne, as far as Versoix, for the purpose of giving immediate notice to the French corps of 4000 men, stationed at Versoix, to enter Switzerland in case the Diet of Schwitz should refuse to obey the summons of the First Consul.—The 27th September was a day of great rejoicing at Schwitz, on account of the opening of the Diet. It was composed of Deputies from all the cantons, except Fribourg and Lucerne. Aloys Reding made a speech upon the occasion, and was appointed president.

Oct. 9.—Extract of a Letter from Basle.—The First Consul's aid de camp, Citizen Rapp, has passed through this city on his way to Paris, after having notified to the eighteen cantons the proclamation of the First Consul. It is reported that they were at first inclined, at Berne, to submit to the intervention of the First Consul, but that they afterwards changed their opinion, and that Citizen Rapp has received not a very satisfactory answer. We also learn, that those who distributed the proclamation of the Chief Consul in the Canton of Berne, have been looked upon in a very unfavourable manner by the new authorities, and that several individuals have been arrested upon this ground, and sent to the prisons of Arbours. The Diet of Schwitz has addressed a proclamation to all the inhabitants of Switzerland, dated 30th September, of which the following are extracts.—“The moment is at length arrived when the Swiss nation can freely and openly express its will, with regard to the political constitution which it may think proper to give itself.” After speaking in terms of just reprobation of the government which has just been destroyed, it proceeds thus:—“The period is come, in which order and peace is to be restored. Those who dare to disturb either, shall receive severe punishment. A few examples will undoubtedly be sufficient to open the eyes of those who still suffer themselves to be misled, and to deliver them for ever from the snares of their perfidious leaders. Even these last may be gained when they see, that far from wishing completely to re-establish the ancient order of things, however happy it might formerly have been, it is now destroyed—irrevocably destroyed. The most careful attention will be employed, as well in the establishment of the general constitution, as in the formation of particular institutions: and care will be taken neither to lose sight of the changes which have occurred in the nature of things, nor of the wishes which these changes may have given birth to. Every thing will be done that is consistent with reason to give general satisfaction. It is by such conduct that Switzerland can shew itself worthy of the benevolent intentions which were evinced towards her by two great neighbouring powers, who by the 11th article of the treaty of Luneville, stipulated that she should have the right of regulating her own constitution. That Divine Providence which has conducted us through so many storms to such a miraculous state of happiness, will also grant us its assistance in the accomplishment of this great work, and will lead us through those painful trials, to that happy and peaceful state, the influence of which was felt even beyond our ancient boundaries."

DOMESTIC.

On Wednesday, the 20th inst. his Majesty held a Levee at St. James's.—The presentations were:—Earl Dartmouth, (sworn in Lord Steward of his Majesty's household), at the Levee for the first time, since his appointment; Lords Duncannon, Sen. and Jun. were severally introduced by their father, Earl Besborough; the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Legge, Canon and Prebend of Windsor, from the Prebendary of Canterbury; his Excellency Charles Cameron, late Governor of the Island of Malta; Mr. Franco, accompanied the Earl of Winchelsea; Count Schach, Captain of the Royal Danish Life Guards (Horse), had the honour to be presented, by Mr. De Glyden Palm, the Danish Chargé d'Affaires; and Captain Sotheron of his Majesty's Royal Navy.

After the Levee his Majesty held a Council of the Ministers, and then left town for Kew.

Society of Ship-Owners of Great-Britain.—On Thursday, the 30th of September last, a Special General Meeting of Ship-Owners was held, pursuant to public Advertisement, at the London Tavern, to take into consideration the draft of a Petition to Parliament, for the repeal of the Tonnage Duty, agreeably to the resolution of the general Meeting of the 22d of June last, and on other business of importance.—John Hill, Esq. was in the chair.

The Secretary, Nath. Atchison, Esq. reported, that he had, since the last general meeting, received several letters from the Ship-Owners at the out-ports, expressive of their determination to co-operate in the general design of the Society.—The Chairman said, that the Petition presented to the House of Commons last Sessions was to shew that the Ship-Owners did not accede to the principle of the tax. It had been intimated to obviate the arguments made use of when the tonnage duty was first proposed, that because the Ship-Owners had not resisted the Convoy Duty, which the minister alleged was the same in principle, it therefore followed that the Ship-Owners ought not to object to the Tonnage Duty. The Chairman said, that he would not then trouble them with many observations on the subject which they had so amply discussed at the last general Meeting. It was undoubtedly stated by the Ship-Owners, that at the time the Tonnage Duty was brought forward, the shipping interest was in a depressed state. The Committee, to prove the truth of their allegations, had adopted one criterion, namely, the number of ships on sale at the particular period alluded to, when it was found, upon investigation, that there were about 160 for sale in the River Thames only; that a far greater number was unemployed, and in want of freights; and that those which were freighted were obliged to act on such terms as could not leave any profit to the owners. It was the business, he said, of the meeting, to consider whether the alteration favourable to the shipping of the country, which, they had been taught to expect, had taken place; or whether the shipping still continued in the same depressed state in which it appeared when they applied to the minister. He thought the Duty on Tonnage might be considered in two points of view—its justice and its policy. To make it just, it was necessary that the object of taxation was in such a state, as to bear the proportion assigned to it. With respect to its policy, it was worthy consideration, whether the shipping of this country, which had been uniformly the object of bounty and encouragement, should now be deemed an object of taxation—for it had been formerly the policy of the Legislature to give encouragement to British shipping; and the whole civilized world was sensible of its effect; he trusted no man felt it more strongly than the minister. He was equally sensible, that if the Ship-Owners could convince the minister of the injustice or impolicy of the tax, he would not hesitate one moment to promote its repeal. This meeting was therefore to consider how that desirable object was likely to be best effected. He was, however, confident, that they would receive from the minister that attention which the importance of the subject merited. He therefore thought it unnecessary for him to expatiate further on the subject.—The Secretary then read the draft of a petition to Parliament for the repeal of the duties on tonnage, and oil, and skins, the produce of the British fishery, which had been previously agreed to by the Committee, by which it appeared that those duties were extremely oppressive. That British shipping, from many causes independent of those duties, still laboured under very great depression, so that the most injurious consequences to the empire might be feared, if the duties on tonnage were continued to be imposed on British shipping. That the principle of these duties militated directly against the spirit of the acts which had been enacted by the Legislature of the country for the increase and encouragement of its shipping and navigation; and it was apprehended the inevitable consequences of the operation of the continuance of those duties would be the still farther depression of British shipping; and also tend to weaken the means of the maritime defence of the country, and accelerate the departure of multitudes of British seamen from their native land, and that at a time when the other maritime powers were most sedulously employed in adopting measures for the increase of their shipping and navies, and also when the shipping of Great Britain had fallen in their value from 30 to 40l. per cent.—Mr. Harry observed, that he conceived the arguments which had been made use of by the Committee at their interview with the minister were unanswerable; that the shipping interest was as much depressed at the present time as it was at that period; and as the tonnage duty was adopted as a tax of experiment, he trusted under those circumstances it would be abandoned. He therefore conceived it would be advisable to urge an interview with the minister.—Mr. Akenhead said, it was his intention to have noticed the subject; and he was of opinion it was proper to obtain an interview with Government, as a fair opportunity had been afforded of trying the expediency of the tax, which unfortunately proved to be very injurious to the Ship-Owners, of which he had proofs which were indubitable.—Mr. Robinson remarked, that from the assurances made when this subject was under discussion, he flattered himself the measure would be abandoned, as the shipping interest continued to be as much depressed as at that period.—The Chairman said, that the polite attention which the minister had shewn to the Committee on their former application, entitled him to every mark of respect. He therefore intimated the propriety of applying for another interview with him, previous to their making an application to parliament; and from the candour with which he received their observations, and from his great regard to the interest of the country, he had no doubt but he would give the subject every possible consideration.—The following resolutions were then entered into: Resolved unanimously, That the petition now produced and read be signed by the ship-owners present, and afterwards left at the bar of Lloyd's Coffee-house, for signatures, and that the same be presented to parliament early in the next session.—Resolved, That it be recommended to the committee to adopt such measures as may appear to them most likely to give effect to the intended application to parliament for the repeal of the tonnage duty, and that the resolutions of this meeting be transmitted to the ship-owners at the out-ports.—Afterwards a serious discussion took place, and several resolutions were entered into, expressive of the sentiments of the ship-owners, of the conduct which had been observed by the ship-builders in the termination of the recent differences between them and their men, and strongly disapproving of the principles which seem to have led to the conclusion of those disputes.

At a meeting of the committee of ship-owners, held at Will's Coffee-house on the 7th inst. the following resolutions, on this latter subject, were ordered to be published:—Resolved, That the ship-owners present at this meeting do highly disapprove of the manner in which the ship-builders have, for some time past, submitted to their workmen, who have lately committed acts of violence dangerous to the community, and destructive of those principles of subordination which ought always to be maintained between employers and their workmen; and they likewise observe, with very great regret, the manner in which the recent disputes between the ship-builders and their men have terminated by the masters treating with delegates from large bodies of their workmen, who, it appears, were combined together for illegal purposes.—Resolved, That the ship-owners present at this meeting do likewise disapprove the sentiments expressed in a letter signed T. Noakes, who is secretary to the committee of ship-builders, and was published in the Public Ledger, wherein it is stated "that the ship-builders, in justice to the ship-owners, had placed themselves in the "situation of mediators between the two interested "parties," that is, their workmen and the ship-owners, who think it necessary to declare, that they conceive it to be the indispensable duty of the ship-builders to keep their men in due subordination; to prevent illegal combinations amongst them, and to exercise the right of employing and discharging such men as they may think proper, and that the ship-builders ought to prosecute, with the utmost rigour of the law, such of their men who may endeavour by threats, or acts of violence, to deter others from working and performing their duty who are so disposed; and in case the existing laws are inadequate to check in their origin such outrages, or to suppress them in their progress, the ship-builders owe it to the public, and it is a duty incumbent upon them to apply to the Legislature to remedy such serious and growing evils.

TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD HAWKESBURY,
His Majesty's Sec. of State for Foreign Affairs.

MY LORD,—It was on the 14th of October, 1801, a year ago this very day, that I commenced, with your lordship, that correspondence, which, with some trifling intermissions, has continued to the present hour. At that time, my lord, you, as “the happy instrument in obtaining the blessings of peace,” were the object of the praises of that same base and stupid rabble, and of those dastardly myrmidons from the General Post-office, who insulted me and my family, and who demolished my dwelling, because I refused to join in their hired and infamous exultations. Relying on the baseness of the nation for support, certain that the acclamations of ignorance, selfishness, and disaffection, would drown the voice of sense, honour, and loyalty, you, your colleagues, and your advisers, then cast a supercilious sneer on the efforts of all those, who had the honesty and resolution to oppose the measure on which you confidently depended for the preservation of your power and of the emoluments connected therewith. Under such circumstances, in the hey-day of your diplomatic career, in the midst of your golden dreams, it would have been absurd for me to hope to obtain a hearing from your lordship, and much more so to make any, even the slightest, impression upon your mind; now, however, for reasons too obvious to mention, I think; I may entertain such a hope; and, in this persuasion, I, with more than common alacrity, resume the pen for the purpose of communicating to your lordship my sentiments on the present awful situation of our public affairs.

Ever since the signature of that treaty, to prepare the public mind for the dangerous consequences of which has been my constant endeavour, the political writers and the public prints under the immediate influence of your lordship and your colleagues have insisted, that peace had, contrary to the expectations and to the predictions of its opposers, proved to be a wise and fortunate measure, that its benignant effects were visible in every department of the state, that its blessings would continue to increase as the goddess expanded her golden pinions, and that the nation had “good reason to expect a long succession of years, undisturbed and unoppressed by the clangour and the expenses of war;” but now, these writers have, all at once, abandoned their pacific system, and are become the advocates of energy; they talk of resistance, and even venture to pronounce the tremendous monosyllable war. I may well say all at once, for the opposite side of the page of the True Briton, which communicated to us your first acknowledgement of the hostile and dangerous designs of the Chief Consul, the opposite side of that very identical piece of paper, contained (under the title of View of Public Affairs) a strong reprobation, mixed up with quantum sufficit of malignity and abuse, on all the noblemen and gentlemen who had imputed to him such designs, and who had insisted, that, from the restless ambition of his co-operators as well as himself, the duration of peace must be very short, or must be lengthened out by such further sacrifices as would inevitably produce the entire, and almost immediate, subjugation of this country. The cause of this sudden and astonishing change, is, it is pretended, the recent declaration of Buonaparté to the Swiss, and his evident intentions with respect to that people and their country. This pretext may, probably, be sufficient to satisfy the supple followers of any and of every administration, the blind approvers of every measure, the paltry time-serving politicians of the day: me, my lord, it does not satisfy. It is a deception, a low trick to disguise the real grounds of dispute, and to shelter the makers of the peace from the censure which must fall on them when those grounds are known. My object is to strip off this disguise; to show, 1. That, if the interference of Buonaparté in the affairs of Switzerland be, in any case, an adequate cause of war, yet, seeing what has passed, it is grossly inconsistent and absurd for this country to make war on him on that account; 2. That the independence of Switzerland is a mere pretext, and that other dangers, greater and more pressing, are the real cause of the present hostile language and attitude; 3. That these dangers have arisen out of the peace, that they were foreseen and foretold by those who opposed the peace, who were contradicted by the ministers, and who were censured, ridiculed, and abused by their ignorant and servile partizans; 4. That any remonstrance to France, in behalf of the Swiss, on the part of this country, will be totally disregarded, or will produce nothing more than a suspension of the evil, or will re-kindle the flames of war, and that, in either case, the fatal consequences of the peace will be equally conspicuous.

1. The alleged grounds of the present misunderstanding with Buonaparté have been thus stated, in the ministerial papers. "The cause of Switzerland is a common one with every power that is not a voluntary slave to the influence of France; and a resistance to the system at present pursued by Buonaparté becomes a duty with the rulers of every free country." The jealousy and apprehension of this nation are, we are told, justly excited by "the unwarrantable conduct of Buonaparté towards the people of Switzerland—a people interesting to every British heart, from the simplicity of their manners, the independence of their principles, the rectitude of their conduct during the war—the injuries they have sustained—and, above all, from the new tyranny with which they are threatened."—If, "says the writer," "we feel thus interested for them as men—as Englishmen—as friends to our country, are there not still higher considerations which call upon us to interfere for the preservation of their independence?"—"The Swiss being "a people interesting to every British heart," the "simplicity of their manners," the "independence of their principles," the "rectitude of their conduct during the war," and the "injuries they have sustained," are points which I shall, probably, touch upon hereafter, but which, important as they are, are certainly less so than that "new tyranny, with which the Swiss are threatened." To prevent this new tyranny from taking place, and to preserve the independence of Switzerland, by resisting the interference of the First Consul in the internal affairs of that country, are, then, the alleged grounds of our present misunderstanding with him, and of the rupture, which may possibly take place between us. But, my lord, let us examine the practice of his Majesty's government, since its affairs have been conducted by your lordship and your colleagues, and see whether it does not forbid the world to repose too implicit a confidence in your present professions.

You concluded, my lord, the preliminary treaty with France, leaving Holland, which you affected to regard as independent, under the rule of a government created by France and under the bayonets of a French army, part of which still remains in that country; the Ligurian and Cisalpine republics, and also the farcical kingdom of Etruria, you left in the same state of vassalage, which vassalage you ratified and confirmed by the silence observed, with respect to the government of these countries, in the treaty of Amiens. With respect to the Cisalpine republic, indeed, the interference of France was still more glaring, and was attended with circumstances peculiarly aggravating. Buonaparté sent for certain persons of that country to Lyons, where he new-named the republic and formed for it an entire new government, of which he put himself at the head, having under him a vice-president, who is to do no act of government without his orders, thus rendering the country neither more nor less than a colony of France; and this was done, too, during the negotiations of the definitive treaty, to the conclusion of which it proved to be no obstacle. But, to come still closer to the point, was not Switzerland, the country for the independence of which we are now to risk a war, was not this very Switzerland herself, left, by the treaty of Amiens, not only under a government imposed upon her by France, but under the very same government, which, the people having cashiered it, Buonaparté is about to re-instate? For me, my lord, or for any of the opposers of the peace, to condemn the proceedings of the Consul with respect to Switzerland, would be both just and consistent; we might with propriety ask him what right he has to interfere in the internal concerns of an independent country, with a view "to prescribe to the people "the form of government which he chooses "they should live under." But, I should be glad to know, with what face your lordship and your colleagues can remonstrate with him, and, if he despises your interposition, with what face you can call upon the people of England to forego the, as yet, but half-tasted "blessings of peace and plenty," and to encounter the "hardships and horrors of "war," merely for the purpose of preventing the restoration of a government, which you not only left in existence, supported by French troops, but the lawfulness of which you tacitly acknowledged by a treaty, the ink of which is hardly yet dry!

Would to God, that, for the honour of England, you had only tacitly sanctioned that principle of interference, which you, at last, find it necessary to oppose! But, my lord, 'till the preliminary and definitive treaties between England and the republic of France are annulled, 'till we have restored Ceylon to the Dutch and Trinidad to Spain, and have repealed our "statutes" for the government of Malta, we may profess to abhor, we may cry out against, this abominable principle, but we must excuse the world if they compare our railing to that of sister Jeanne à la grille, and tell us, that when they, too, are satiated with sin, they will join us in the work of repentance.

The nations of Europe remember, and will long remember, the ministerial boastings with respect to the islands, which we received from France, belonging to Holland and Spain. That act, that clever trick, which was so much applauded by the parliamentary wise-acres, by that numerous crowd of "well-meaning men," who so ably and so boldly cried aye for the peace, and who are so passionately fond of "safe" "politicians" like your lordship; that act, like a guilty conscience, will stare us in the face at every step we take, will unstring our nerves in every enterprize, for asserting the independence of any country, not excepting our own. "Though" said the Editor of the Anti-Jacobin Review, (Vol. X. p. 221,) "Though, in the very face of "the preliminary treaty, we find, that it is "exclusively a treaty between Great-Britain "and France; yet, by one of its articles, "does France take upon herself to give "away, and does Great Britain condescend "to accept from her hands, two possessions belonging to free and independent "powers, who were not parties to the "agreement: Ceylon, the property of the "Dutch, Trinidad the property of Spain. "But, could it possibly have escaped the "attention of Lord Hawkesbury, that, by "this very act, he gave a complete sanction "to that jacobinical principle, on which "the gigantic usurpations of the regicide "republic of France have been founded; "that he admitted her right not only to "prescribe laws to her allies, but to dispose of their territories, at her pleasure? "—A right, which, possibly, this nation may, ere long, be called upon to dispute; but, "with what confidence or with what effect, after such an admission, our readers "will easily conceive! In short, there required no other proof, than this one act, of the perfect incapacity of his lordship "to fulfil the important duties of his high "station." The concluding inference, my lord, however unwilling I may be to insist on its justice, certainly derives considerable support from the sound reasoning and political sagacity displayed by this writer, who, in the month of October, 1801, while his brother reviewers, some from ignorance and others from servility, were joining in the exultations of the peace-loving rabble, had the wisdom to foresee, and the honesty and courage to foretell, that the article of the treaty, of which I am here speaking, would be productive of precisely that evil which it has already produced.*

There are two ways, in which France interferes with other states, one by seizing on part, or the whole, of their territory, the other, by dictating to them a form and mode of government, in both of which we have participated; in the former, though we did not absolutely lay violent hands on Ceylon and Trinidad, yet, upon the old maxim, that the receiver is as bad as the thief, we have our full share of the guilt belonging to the transaction; and, in the latter, we are equally culpable with France with respect to Malta, unless the world, justly regarding us, in this instance, as the involuntary tools of France, should pardon our crime in compassion of our ignorance and cowardice. A hopeful alternative, my lord! But, be your lordship assured, that the world will not show even this compassion towards us, and that, on the contrary, we alone shall be charged with the destruction of the ancient government and order of Malta. By lending the name of England to this shameful act of interference, to this flagrant violation of the first great principle of public law; by making her give so unequivocal a sanction to the insolent, the unbearable assumption of a right to alter the governments of independent states, you fully and formally confirmed that doctrine, which the republicans of France invented for the purpose of invading the liberties of mankind, and for the still more nefarious purpose of destroying the principles of morality and religion. In justifying the late war, how many hundred times did your lordship and your present colleagues refer to the famous revolutionary decree of the 19th of November, 1792! But that decree, insolent as it was, was not so insolent as that part of the definitive treaty, which relates to the forming of "statutes" for Malta. That decree very kindly informed the people of every state, that, if they wished to change their form of government, France was ready to assist them. But, with respect to Malta, no questions were asked; a new government was imposed, without the least reference to the wishes of either the governing or the governed. And thus did Great-Britain end a war, which she began for the purpose of resisting this audacious and disorganizing doctrine, not only by acceding to that doctrine, but by acting on it to an extent far beyond that, in which it was attempted to be enforced against herself!*

Is it for us, then, my lord, to rail against Buonaparté for interfering in the affairs of independent nations? Is it for your lordship and your colleagues to call on us to resume our arms for the purpose of checking such interference?

2. The truth is, my lord, that the preservation of the independence of Switzerland is, on the part of you and your colleagues, a mere pretext. For, allowing that you have repented of your great political sin, that you have "asked pardon of God and "man" for your own acts of interference in the internal concerns of other independent nations, that you now, by way of atonement, interpose against your former associate, that you not only turn king's evidence, but thief-takers in the bargain; allowing all this, and adding thereto the consideration, that you interpose to check not only this single instance of encroachment in Buonaparté, by the whole system, which, if not checked, must finally embrace this country too; yet, I should be glad to know what has occurred in the affairs of Europe to render the independence of Switzerland of so much more importance to us than the independence of any other of the countries, in whose internal concerns Buonaparté has interfered since the conclusion of the preliminary treaty. The independence of Switzerland is certainly of importance to England; but it is not of importance to her merely on account of the "simplicity of the manners and the independence of the principles of the Swiss, much "less on account of the rectitude of their "conduct during the war" (of which the less is said, at this time, the better): these are considerations, which, admitting the facts to be true, might have weight in deciding the opinion of the philosopher or the moralist; but we must look for other and far different considerations, on which to justify a war; and, will your lordship pretend to say, that either the interest, the honour, or the safety of this country, is essentially connected with the independence of Switzerland? Will you pretend to say, that the interference of Buonaparté in the domestic affairs of that country is more dangerous to us than his creating and governing the king and kingdom of Etruria, than his presidency of the Italian Republic, than his incorporation of Piedmont, than his new distribution of the titles, the dignities, the power, and the dominions, of the kings, the electors, and princes of Germany? Will you, my lord, with the map of Europe and the Custom-house returns open before you, attempt to persuade the people, that Switzerland, of all the whole Continent, is the only spot, on which France may not seize without endangering the interest and the safety of England?

This is an attempt, however, in which I will not say, that you would not obtain a momentary success; but, like the "experiment" of peace, it would soon fail you, and would compel you to have recourse to other shifts more analogous to "existing "circumstances." The "simplicity of "manners, the independence of principle, "and the rectitude of conduct," which are so "interesting to the heart of every Englishman," would all be forgotten before the end of the first campaign; "peace and "a large loaf," would be rung in your ears by the very same mob, on whose clamours you depended for stifling the voice of those, who had honesty and honour enough to oppose the measure, which has produced your present embarrassment. Besides, my lord, are you not aware, that Buonaparté can, at any moment, deprive you of all the support, which may, in any case, be expected from this popular affection for the Swiss? His proclamation, though insufferably domineering and insolent, though tyrannical as to its means, is very loose and equivocal as to its end. He does not say, that he will incorporate Switzerland with France; he does not say he will make it obey a government of his framing; he does not even say, that he will insist upon the re-installment of his creatures, whom the people have just turned out. He can, therefore, without any relaxation of authority, without any derogation from his dignity, without any risk of losing the smallest portion of the terror in which he holds the intimidated world, make such an arrangement with Switzerland, as will, at once, leave him, in fact, the master of that country, deprive you of your pretext for hostility, and disarm all the popular resentment, which you may, during the existence of that pretext, be able to excite.

The real grounds of your present hostile language and attitude will, my lord, if I am not much mistaken, prove to be very different indeed from the interference of Buonaparté in the affairs of Switzerland. The "experiment" of peace has completely failed; your lordship and your colleagues have been baffled in all your expectations; a diminution has already been felt, and a greater is anticipated, in the commercial products of the country; France has persevered in her ambitious views, and her projects have, from day to day, become more and more alarming; she has made more conquests in six months of peace than in ten years of war; Germany and the Mediterranean now tremble at her nod; Buonaparté, like the destroying angel, has placed one foot upon the land and the other foot upon the sea, and on this country he has resolved to pour the first vial of his wrath. No offerings, no sacrifices, no intreaties, no acts of humility, of submission, or of prostration, nothing but successful resistance to his dreadful power (which has been doubled by the peace) can save us from political perdition. Not content with shutting us out from the ports of Europe, with enveloping us by his conquests and usurpations, with sapping the foundations of our government by all sorts of intrigue; not content to wait for the comparatively slow, though certain, operation of these means, he has, if I am not much mistaken, already interfered in our ~~own~~ internal affairs, and signified his resolution to dictate laws to us, in more than one instance, and particularly relative to the liberty of the press!

These, my lord, are the real grounds of your present hostile array, and grounds they are quite sufficient to have roused you long enough ago; but, the same motives, which led you and your colleagues to conclude the preliminary treaty, together with the reluctance which weak men always have to confess their errors, have restrained you from making the slightest resistance to the will of Buonaparté; and, it is well known, that your present fit of vigour has arisen from the personal determination of his Majesty to admit of no further sacrifices of the honour and interests of his people. This truly royal and paternal determination led you to catch the first occasion that presented itself to make a pretence of discovering a new hostile and ambitious mind in the First Consul; as if such a mind were more visible in him now than at any time subsequent to the signature of the preliminaries; as if it were more visible now, than when he proclaimed himself sovereign of Italy, or when he issued his mandate to the German empire!

3. I shall now, my lord, endeavour to show, that the difficulties and dangers, which you and your colleagues have at last discovered, were foreseen and foretold by those who opposed the peace, who were contradicted by the ministers, and who were censured, ridiculed, and abused, by the ignorant and servile partizans of those ministers.

My lord, were I to take all the passages, in the debates on the treaty of peace, which express, either directly or indirectly, the opinion of the ministers, that little or no danger was in future to be apprehended from the ambitious hostility of the First Consul, I should fill a small volume: a few extracts will suffice. During the debate of May 8, on Mr. Nichols's motion for a vote of censure on Mr. Pitt, Lord Belgrave made a speech, from which I cannot refrain from making one short extract, not inapplicable to the present subject:—"The great struggle for our security, the main shock of the French revolution had been successfully resisted, when the late ministry retired from office. Comparing then the present period, with that of the end of the year 1792, let me ask the House, whether they do not feel themselves a little more secure now, than they did at that time? Whether they do not feel themselves very much in the situation of mariners who have just escaped the dangers of the most tremendous storm they had ever encountered, and who look back upon the

"scarce subsiding waves with emotions of calm "delight, and unspeakable satisfaction? Every "man, not lost to all virtuous and honour"able feeling, or whose intellects are not
 "unusually benumbed, must have felt at "the end of the year 1792, and at other
 "periods of the war, no common anxiety
 "for the fate of his king and country,
 "his family, his friends, and his own "safety. Now turn your eyes on your "present situation, on the vessel of the state
 "having now weathered the storm, and
 "riding in triumph and security in her na"tive port."—I am afraid, my lord, that
 "the emotions of calm delight and unspeak-"able satisfaction, which his lordship here so
 "elegantly describes, have been, for some "time at least, strangers to the breasts of you "and your colleagues, who, if you have a "proper notion of your situation, must regard "yourselves as being in a crazy vessel, and "upon the eve of a furious tempest.—Lord
Castlereagh is next upon my list of authori"ties:—"We have," (said his lordship, in the "last debate on the Definitive Treaty), "We "have in some points failed, but upon the "whole we have attained the security for "which we have contended; for whether "we contended for the abolition of French "principles, which menaced our safety, as "well as that of Europe, or whether to de"ter the enemy from venturing to attack us
 "at home or abroad, we have so far suc"ceeded as to maintain our safety, and to "combat with success that malignant spirit "of the French nation, which professed to "content itself with nothing less than the "utter destruction of this country. Does
 "the government of France now hold such "language? Does it now, or of late, talk "of planting its banners on the tower of "London, or triumphantly waving its vic"torious flag on the river Thames? No, for "it now speaks of this country as a land of "liberty, and looks up to it as a model
 "worthy of imitation, and respects it as the "French people were wont to do under the "old government.—What danger, I ask,
 "does there now exist of the prevalence of "French principles in this country, which "obtained for a time so many dupes and "proselytes? So long as France maintain"ed its inveterate malignity to this country,
 "no security was to be relied on; the first
 "step, therefore, to our security was a "change of sentiment and principle in the "government of France, and therefore by "resisting the French principle which has
 "perverted the progress of the revolution,
 "our security has grown out of the circumstances "of the war, and, in my conviction, so far

 "are we at this day from being in any danger
 "from the designs of France, never did we en"joy, at any period of our history, a more per"fect state of security. With respect to the "territorial acquisitions of France on the "continent of Europe and in America, I "am free to acknowledge, they are not "circumstances of satisfactory reflection.
 "But, with respect to the aggrandizement
 "of France, from this circumstance, at any
 "early period I have no apprehensions what"ever. For if France shall chuse to aban"don her internal interests, for purposes of "colonial aggrandizement; if she chuses to "divert from the revival of her ruined
 "trade, manufactures, and agriculture at "home, the only means in her possession,
 "she may prosecute schemes of spreading "conquest and barbarism in Europe for "some time, but must cease to be a rival
 "from which this country has any thing to fear,
 "in any point of view commercial or politi"cal; but cannot fail to weaken and speedily
 "ruin herself. But, admitting the possibility "that a future period may arrive, too distant
 "for me to calculate, or for this House now
 "to reason upon or calculate, when France
 "may be induced to attempt such projects,
 "I trust, at this moment, no such apprehen"sions are to be feared, as, were such a "suspicion in my mind justifiable, I should "think twice before I would agree to a con"clusion of peace."

Now, my lord, I beg leave to remind you of what your lordship said on this subject of security from the tranquil disposition of France.
 The extract is taken from your speech of the 8th of May, in reply to Mr. Grey, who had, in my opinion, undeniably proved, that the government of Buonaparté was not less jacobin-ical, either in principle or in practice, than that of Robespierre.—"I am asked,"
 (said your lordship), "whether the ground
 "of argument, on Jacobin principles, does "not now exist in the same force and de"gree against the government of France,
 "as it did when this country first opposed
 "it on that account? To which I will "answer, that Jacobin principles not only "do not exist in the same force and de"gree; but, they do not exist at all. The "hon. gentleman has asked, if Jacobin "principles did not give birth to the present "government of France? That is not the "mode of considering the question; it is "not material to consider what gave birth "to the present government—the question "is to us, what are its principles now? And in "that respect, there has been a complete

" change in the government of France. The present government of France has published to the world a recantation of every principle of Jacobinism, and of every other principle from which danger was apprehended, in a manner as satisfactory as the most sanguine friend of the war, or the most decided enemy of Jacobin principles, can desire. However I may regret the fate of the House of Bourbon, without considering whether that House was likely to be restored or not in the course of the war, yet if it had been for nothing more than a restoration of that House, the contest would not have been carried on; but the contest here was owing to the entire change of principles upon which the government had been carried on; all principles of established governments had been overturned, and it would have been at any time sufficient ground for other countries to adopt measures for the resistance of such principles, as being utterly hostile to all government whatever, they being in their nature calculated to overturn all constituted authorities. I may be asked, however, what I think of the recantation which has been made of those principles, and whether I think they give evidence of a recurrence to ancient principles? To which I answer, I am aware that whatever may be the desire of persons in France, after such a conclusion, it will be impossible for them to set up an establishment upon the best of models, for they must take their materials as they find them. In the mean time full credit is due to their profession, as far as it regards foreign powers, for they have publicly asked pardon of God and Man, and done every thing they can to revert to the ancient established principles of government, and their measures, in every point I have been able to view them, have that tendency. It is an important consideration with reference to this peace, how far it would be prudent in this country, by a continuation of the war, to drive them again to revolutionary measures, where they must abandon the system of justice, moderation, and peace, which they have now."

This was your lordship's curious set of opinions respecting the character and views of the government, with which you had been treating, and in whose capital you had had diplomatic agents for upwards of twelve months! Let us now hear your right worthy colleague Mr. ADDINGTON,—"I know no thing" (said that shrewd and disinterested statesman) "in the circumstances of the present time—I know of nothing in the disposition of the government of France, nor in the disposition of the person at the head of the government of France, that warrants any apprehension, the peace now concluded may not last as long as any peace, which this country ever made at any period of her history."

Such, my lord, were the opinions of the solid, steady, cautious, "safe politicians," in opposition to which I could now quote those of every nobleman and gentleman, who spoke against the peace, but, for want of time as well as room, I must content myself with an extract from the speech of Mr. Windham, delivered on the 4th of November, before the conclusion of the definitive treaty, and even before we had heard of the affair of Elba or of the Italian republic.—"Notwithstanding (said he) some lofty talk which we heard of dignity and firmness, and which I shall be glad to see realized, and a happy quotation, expressive of the same sentiments, from my honourable friend not now present (Mr. Pitt,) the real amount of what was said, seems to be little more than this:—that France has, to be sure, the power of destroying us, but that we hope she will not have the inclination;—that we are under the paw of the lion, but that he may happen not to be hungry, and, instead of making a meal of us, may turn round in his den, and go to sleep. (p. 2.)

* * * * *

Here it is then, that I must advert again to that topick of consolation, (miserable indeed must our state be, when such are our topicks of consolation,) to which, in order to make out a case not perfectly hopeless, we are willing to have recourse and which, more I believe than any reliance upon our wealth, does really support us, in the situation to which we are reduced. This is the idea, that from some cause or other, from some combination of passions and events,—such as no philosophy can explain, and no history probably furnish an example of,—the progress of the revolution will stop where it is: and that Buonaparté, like another Pyrrhus,—or rather like that adviser of Pyrrhus, whose advice was not taken,—instead of proceeding to the conquest of new worlds, will be willing to sit down contented in the enjoyment of those which he has already.—Sir, the great objection to this hope, to say nothing of its baseness, is its utter extravagance. On what possible ground do we believe this?

“ Is it in the general nature of ambition ?
 “ Is it in the nature of French revolution“ ary ambition ? Does it happen commonly “ to those, whether nations or individuals, “ who are seized with the spirit of aggran“ dizement and acquisition, that they are “ inclined rather to count what they pos“ sess, than to look forward to what yet “ remains to be acquired ? If we examine “ the French revolution, and trace it cor“ rectly to its causes, we shall find that the “ scheme of universal empire was, from the “ beginning, that which was looked to as “ the real consummation of its labours ;
 “ the object first in view, though last to “ be accomplished ; the primum mobile that “ originally set it in motion, and has since “ guided and governed all its movements.
 “ —The authors of the revolution wished to “ destroy morality and religion. They “ wished those things as ends : but they “ wished them also, as means, to a higher
 “ and more extensive design. They wished “ for a double empire ; an empire of opinion “ and an empire of political power : and “ they used the one of these, as a means of “ effecting the other. What reason have “ we to suppose, that they have renounced “ those designs, just when they seem to “ touch the moment of their highest and “ fullest accomplishment ? When there is “ but one country, that remains between “ France and the empire of the world, “ then is the moment, when we choose to “ suppose that all opposition may be with“ drawn, and that the ambition of France
 “ will stop of its own accord.—It is im“ possible not to see in these feeble and “ sickly imaginations, that fatal temper of “ mind, which leads men to look for help “ and comfort from any source rather than
 “ from their own exertions.”

This, my lord, was the language of a real statesman, who had the sagacity to perceive the dangers, into which you had plunged his country, and whose mind, far above all the paltry considerations of popularity and place, revolted at the idea of disguising his sentiments, though the peace-loving rabble stood ready to pour on him a torrent of abuse. This speech which the meek Wilberforce called “ madly opposing “ the wishes of the nation for peace,” which the respectable Gillray caricatured as “ a “ dream,” and which the sprightly Chalmers (safely sheltered from chastisement by a tentfold shield of contempt) styled “ the “ ravings of despair and of foolishness ;” this speech, my lord, will remain “ as a testimony against you unto the people ” and unto the world, as long, at least, as Buonaparté, or his successor, shall be pleased to suffer a pamphlet in the English language to be read, which may not, perhaps, be many months longer.

And, on this subject too, my lord, where will you and your colleagues look for a justification ? Buonaparté has, if we are to believe the True Briton, “ insisted upon the al- “ teration of our laws respecting the liberty of the “ press.” And, to say nothing of the tone and “ terms of the treaty of peace ; has he not had the most direct encouragement to make this demand, not only from the servile language the public prints known to be under the controul of government, but from the declarations of those who supported the peace, particularly of the late Attorney General (now Lord Ellenborough), of Lord Castlereagh, Mr. Addington, Mr. Pitt, and your lordship ? I have not room, my lord, to insert extracts from the speeches, to which I now allude, but let any one refer to them, and deny, if he can, that the sentiments they contain relative to the manner in which Englishmen should speak of Buonaparté and his government, furnish the strongest possible presumption, that the demand, which has now been made, would be readily complied with. Nor was this demand unfore- “ seen or unfortold by those who opposed the peace. Lords Spencer, Grenville, Carlisle, Mr. Grenville, Lord Temple, Mr. Elliot,

 Mr. Windham, and Dr. Laurence, in particular, most strongly and justly reprobated the abject tone, which it was attempted to impose upon the Parliament as well as the press. Every member of Parliament must recollect the language in which the late Attorney General censured Mr. Elliot for dar“ ing to doubt of the sincerity and the pacific in- “ tentions of Buonaparté ; nor can any one have forgotten the silence of ministers on the affairs of Lundberg and Lauriston. On this topic, my lord, I must beg leave to be indulged with making a short quotation or two from my own publications. By looking over the pages of my Letters on the Peace and of the Political Register, your lordship will find that I and my correspondents have given you, “ precept upon pre“ cept, precept upon precept ; line upon “ line, line upon line ; here a little and “ there a little ; that you might not go and “ fall backward, and be broken, and snar“ ed, and taken.” The danger to the real and useful freedom of speech and of the press was early foreseen, and was thus anticipitated :—“ The press of Great-Britain and “ that of America are the last refuge of the

"liberties of the world; and we may be well assured, that no exertion of stratagem or force will be spared to stifle their inquiries. In America, the accomplishment of this object will be very difficult; but, however humiliating the acknowledgment, we sincerely believe the difficulty will be less in this kingdom, a belief in which we are persuaded our readers will participate, when they observe the language of those English prints, which are under the influence of the ministry, and when they are informed that silence, with respect to Buonaparté, has already been, by authority, imposed on the Journal de Peltier. To suppose, that the liberty of the British press is at last to be destroyed by the person, whom Lord Hawkesbury so lately styled "a Corsican Adventurer;" to suppose, that we are no longer to find protection in those courts, which have ever been the safe guard of ourselves and the admiration of the world; to suppose these things possible is, in some sort, to renounce one's nature; but, so humble, so base, are we become, and such is our propensity to sink, that it is beyond the powers of the mind to conceive the depth of degradation to which we shall finally descend."

—(Political Register, Vol. I. p. 221, March 6.)

Again: "If we examine into the means, which France has made use of, in the subjugation of those countries, which are now smarting under her lash, we shall find, that, in every instance, her progress has commenced by the enslaving of the press. The press is a powerful instrument; she, of all nations, best knows its force, and she, therefore, wisely takes care, that that force shall not be employed against herself. The British press, of all others, she dreads most. Buonaparté is much more afraid of this press than he is of the Pope, or the Goddess of Reason, or even of Mahomet, zealous as he is in the Mussulman faith. He has emitted his venom on all those, in this country, who have ventured to question the moderation of his views and the sincerity of his professions, and has given us no very unintelligible hint, that such disbelief may, ere long, be followed with chastisement. It is in the nature of upstarts to be presuming; and it cannot be denied, that the experience which Buonaparté has already had of our baseness, is well calculated to encourage his presumption. The gross violation, the open and daring defiance of our laws, committed with impunity by the bearers of the "preliminary treaty, was, we fear, the beginning of a series of acts, under which the constitution of England is destined to perish."—(Political Register, Vol. I. p. 317, 318.)—God, in his mercy, forbid, that these apprehensions should be realized! but, that they did not spring from that "madness," that "despair and foolishness," which Messrs. Wilberforce and Chalmers ascribed to the opposers of the peace, will now, I think, my lord, be acknowledged by yourself. They were the off-spring of a watchful attention to the tone and terms of the treaty, and of an anxious solicitude for the salvation of my country: to that humble and trembling tone, to those disadvantageous and disgraceful terms, to our subsequent acts of servility, to these, and to these alone, my lord, is to be imputed the audacious demand, of which I have here been speaking, and which your lordship will affect to attribute to a new hostile and ambitious mind in the Consul.

Having now, my lord, shown, that the affair of Switzerland is a mere pretext for your change of language and conduct, that other causes have produced this change, and that these causes were foreseen and foretold by those who opposed the peace with Buonaparté, I should now proceed to shew, that, though the Consul, aided by the advice of the English faction now at Paris, may find the means of avoiding hostilities for the present, without any relaxation of his authority over us, and though you and your colleagues may, from some compromise with him, take credit for vigour which you do not possess, and upon the strength of that credit make concessions ten times more essentially important, yet that, in a short time, we must have war with France, or must quietly submit to her yoke; and this would lead me to consider how, in case of a new war, the peace will have changed our position for the worse; and also how that war is, according to the present appearances, likely to be conducted and likely to terminate.—But this, my lord, is "high matter," and shall therefore be addressed to a high character.—I have the honour to be, &c. &c.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

Under this head we have many things, which we would wish to notice, but which we must postpone for want of room. Switzerland, which, from the use that our ministers are making of it, is become the principal object of public attention, has, it would appear, from advices received yesterday, yielded to the mandates of Buonaparté. "The Diet of Schwitz has adopted all the articles of the proclamation of the First Consul of France, the official account of which has just been received by his Aide du Camp, Rapp, and the Helvetic government will return to Berne the day after to-morrow, under the escort of the first Helvetic demi-brigade."—This news is dated at Lausanne on the 13th, and is taken from a Paris paper of the 18th instant. It may be false, or, at least, premature; but, we think there is little doubt, that it expresses what will prove to be the result, and, if so, what becomes of the interposition of our courageous ministers? What becomes of the pretext, under which they hoped to disguise the real ground of that state of hostilities, on which, from far different causes, they are, or will soon be, compelled to enter? Buonaparté will, we think, settle matters in Switzerland in a manner that will leave the English government no just ground of complaint; as to Germany, he will, most likely, make such a concession as will satisfy the Emperor, or, at least, the philosophical counsellors by whom that monarch is surrounded; and, with respect to Malta, we cannot imagine, that the Emperor of Russia, notwithstanding the change which has taken place in his ministry, will attempt to interfere, and thereby forego all the advantages which he at present derives from the friendship of France, merely for us, for us who turned our back on his overtures for obtaining an indemnity for our own faithful ally.—The grand secret of state, in this country, seems, of late years, to have been the finding out false pretexts for every important measure of government, particularly the measures relating to war; and it is really a subject of curious speculation to guess at the ground which ministers will next take, if that which Switzerland offered has already slipped from beneath them.—Nous verrons!

According to advices from Ratisbon of the 8th inst. a "supplement" to the plan of indemnities had then been drawn up by the French minister, and had been approved of by the Russian and Prussian ministers. It is stated, that the first plan has, in this new instance of Buonaparté's paternal care, undergone considerable changes, some of which are said to be known, but they are not stated. The official communication of this supplement, will, it is supposed, by the French papers, "put an end to the numerous claims and complaints, with which the deputation has been tormented for some weeks past." That is to say, it will for ever shut up the mouths of those who have been robbed and insulted by this execrable act of tyranny.

The election of Prince Ruspoli, to be Grand Master of the Order of Malta, is now, by those very London prints which abused the opposers of the peace, discovered to be contrary to the treaty; and these same prints have also discovered, that it was impossible to fulfil the stipulations of the treaty respecting Malta.—So said Lord Grenville, and his lordship founded his assertion upon the facts which are now acknowledged to have existed at the time. He said the order, by the new regulations, was "impoverished in finance, degraded in reputation, and that it must soon sink into a gang of low, needy, and unprincipled adventurers;" and so now says word for word, the public prints which abused his lordship for his observations.—Whether we have a right to hold the island is another question.

We hear nothing further of the embarkation of troops for New Orleans; and, it is not unimportant to observe, that the suspension of this enterprize is rather a corroborating proof of Buonaparté's apprehending hostilities with this country. In that case, to take possession of Louisiana would be highly imprudent, as it would assuredly throw the Americans into our scale; whereas, by abandoning the project of colonizing Louisiana, or by delaying it for some time, France is certain of securing the neutrality, and, perhaps, of purchasing the co-operation, of America, whose present rulers are by no means friendly to England, and whose people of all descriptions, are boiling with indignation at what they term "the malignant and vindictive policy of the British ministers," in putting the French on their back, in order to render them more attached to Great-Britain, but which, in reality, was no policy at all in the British ministers, but merely an argument invented by that solid young man, that "safe politician," Lord Hawkesbury, purely for the purpose of defending his own conduct. The solid young lord never dreamt that his speech would be read across the Atlantic! So much for the "safe politicians."

DUKE OF KENT.

In the Register of the 14th of August last, I took occasion to repel certain calumnies, which Mr. HERIOT, the Editor of the ministerial paper called the True Briton, had published against his Royal Highness the Duke of Kent, relative to his Royal Highness's government of Gibraltar. Having myself lived, for several years, near the seat of the Duke's command in America, having had an opportunity of seeing the garrison of Halifax just before his return to England, and having, from my own observation as well as from the accounts which I was daily in the habit of hearing from some of the most respectable persons at Halifax, contracted the highest degree of admiration of his conduct in every department committed to his charge, I felt not a little indignation as well as surprize at seeing his Royal Highness assailed with so much malignity, in an English print, and in a print, too, well known to be supported with the public money. I endeavoured briefly to state the grounds of Mr. Heriot's misrepresentations, and promised to take some future opportunity of speaking more in detail on the subject; a promise, which I am now about to fulfil.

On the arrival of his Royal Highness at Gibraltar, the garrison exhibited a scene of licentiousness, irregularity, and drunkenness, that shocked every stranger to behold. The streets daily swarmed with crowds of drunken soldiers; the inhabitants were often most wantonly and grossly insulted, and hardly a week elapsed without violence being offered to some of the women, generally attended with the most aggravating circumstances. In a few weeks after the Duke's arrival, some soldiers of the 54th regiment were convicted on the clearest evidence of having violated two Spanish women at noon-day, in the sight of several of the inhabitants, who were prevented from rescuing them, by the bayonet of the very centinel near whose post the deed was committed; to such a pitch was licentiousness carried. Every officer and soldier, when not on duty, dressed as he chose; the soldiers were in the constant habit of working and carrying water for the inhabitants, and the money thus acquired, was immediately spent in drunkenness and debauchery, to the great injury of their health and morals. Nothing like system or regularity prevailed in any one point, either in dressing, exercising, or manœuvring together. An account of these abuses had for some time reached England, and, from his conduct in America, his Royal Highness was chosen as one of the persons, who was most likely to restore order and subordination in the garrison. He was sent out to reform, and he certainly has justified the choice that was made, as in less than five months time, he has effected one of the most complete, and salutary reforms that ever was accomplished. Order and tranquillity are restored, drunkenness is most completely abolished, the health of the troops is so much improved, that except the remains of the Egyptian ophthalmia, there are not twenty sick men in the garrison. The different regiments are now neatly and uniformly dressed, according to the King's regulations, and in point of marching, exercising, and manœuvring, the garrison is now certainly equal, if not superior, to most regiments in the service. To complete such a reform without some necessary examples, would have been impossible, but no officer could have brought it about with less punishments. None but crimes of magnitude have been punished with flogging, lesser offences have been invariably commuted into a certain number of days solitary confinement or labour on the public works. With respect to the inhabitants, they certainly now enjoy a degree of protection and security, both in person and property, that they never before experienced. No person can insult or injure them with impunity; and the laws of England are administered with as much impartiality and justice as they are in Westminster Hall. On His Royal Highness's arrival, no police of any kind existed, and the trade of the place was burthened with a number of impolitic and oppressive fees, the whole of which he has completely abolished. Salutary regulations have also been adopted by

His Royal Highness, respecting the public markets, the butchers, bakers, carmen, wine houses, &c. and all those points, on which so much of the comfort and prosperity of every town depends. Regular canteens for the troops have been established near every barrack in proper hands, where they are supplied with unadulterated wine, and all the lower class of wine-houses, which were a sink of profligacy and debauchery, have been shut up, though in so doing his Royal Highness has very considerably diminished the emoluments of the government, which chiefly arose from duties upon the wine sold in the wine-houses. The beneficial effects of his Royal Highness's measures, have already begun to be most sensibly felt; population has exceedingly increased since his arrival, property has risen considerably in value, and the trade of the place is in a most flourishing state.

Mr. Heriot's conduct, in attacking a personage, who, on so many accounts, ought to be, and is, so dear to the heart of every loyal subject of his Majesty, cannot fail to excite the indignation of the public; but, odious as it is in itself, it is infinitely more so, when the motive, the low, selfish, vindictive motive of it is known.

At the time when his Royal Highness went out the last time to America, as Commander in Chief, Mr. Heriot's brother, who is settled at Quebec, was Clerk of the Cheque to the Ordnance, and, at the same time, Deputy Storekeeper-General to the Army. As the two employments, for very obvious and very forcible reasons, appeared to be incompatible, his Royal Highness found it to be his duty to insist upon Mr. Heriot's brother resigning one of them, which was, however, left to his own choice, and he, in consequence, gave up the latter appointment. Previous to this, the True Briton had, on all occasions, been the loudest and foremost in praise of the Duke's character and conduct; but, since, it has never mentioned his name with approbation. Mr. Heriot's brother discovered great anger, not unaccompanied with some grains of insubordination and insolence, at losing one of his employments, and Mr. Heriot himself, from his late malignant insinuations respecting his Royal Highness, may be fairly supposed to have entered into all his brother's feelings.

To superficial observers it may appear wrong, that a hungry expectant should be sent out to Canada to occupy two places, either of which would have yielded a very comfortable maintenance and a very suitable reward, for an invalid military officer, or, would, if bestowed on some worthy native of the province, have secured to his Majesty's government the attachment of a family, probably numerous in itself and extensive in its connexions; but, to those who examine the thing more closely, it will appear, that two places, nor even twenty places, would be too many for any one, recommended by Mr. Heriot, whose virtues, I am sorry to say it, seem, by persons in general, to be but very imperfectly known. The envious world think only of the revenue which this man receives, they do not, or will not, consider how dearly he earns it: they do not consider, that what he does, no other man with a soul in his body would condescend to do. In this light it is that the Postmaster-General seems to have viewed his merits; for, since his brother was required by the Duke of Kent to give up one of the army places, he has been appointed Postmaster-General in Canada, and that too, in direct opposition to his Royal Highness, who had recommended another person to that station.—But, what is the recommendation of the Duke of Kent compared to that of a Secretary of the General Post Office, who is also, it is said, partner with Mr. Heriot in the newspaper called The Sun!

WASHINGTON AND LA FAYETTE.

Every thing tending to ascertain the real characters of these men, who, however trifling their intrinsic greatness, have, by reason of the transactions in which they have been concerned, attained to a considerable importance in the world, merits the attention of the politician. Under this persuasion it is, that I am now induced to notice a letter, respecting these two persons, which appeared in the London Morning Chronicle of the 22d instant, signed ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

This letter, which, it would seem, the Editor of the Morning Chronicle copied from a New-York paper, but which, I am pretty certain, was published in London by desire of some one, at least, of the parties concerned, is intended to destroy the authenticity of a statement, contained in the Anti-Jacobin Review, relative to Washington and La Fayette. The Reviewer, by way of introduction to his criticism on a pamphlet of Gen. ALEXANDER HAMILTON, took occasion, as is very common, to give some little account of the author, who, in his progress to that eminent station, which he has arrived at in the United States, was found, at one time, in the American army, at the siege of York Town, in Virginia, where Lord Cornwallis put an end to the American war by a transaction bearing no very weak resemblance to that by which he put an end to the war with France.—Washington granted him terms of capitulation, and Joseph Buonaparté did no more.

But, to return to my revolutionary heroes: the Anti-Jacobin Review stated, in substance, that, at the storming of the two British redoubts, at York Town, La Fayette, with the approbation or connivance of Washington, ordered Gen. HAMILTON (then a Colonel), as the officer who was to command the attack of one of the redoubts, to put to death all those who might happen to be taken in the redoubt; and that Colonel Hamilton and his American soldiers, through motives of humanity, forbore to execute the order.—Such was the statement of the Anti-Jacobin Review. Let us now see Gen. Hamilton's contradiction.

"New-York, August 10, 1802.—Finding "that a story, since propagated under circumstances which it was expected would "have soon consigned it to oblivion (and "by which I have been complimented at "the expense of Generals Washington and "La Fayette), has of late been revived, and "has acquired a degree of importance by "being repeated in different publications, "as well in Europe as America, it becomes "a duty to counteract its currency and influence by an explicit disavowal.—The "story imports in substance, that General "La Fayette, with the approbation or connivance of General Washington, ordered me, as the officer who was to command "the attack on a British redoubt in the "course of the siege of York Town, to put "to death all those of the enemy who "should happen to be taken in the redoubt; and that through motives of humanity I forbore to execute the order.— "Positively and unequivocally I declare, that "no such or similar order, nor any intimation "or hint resembling it, was ever by me received, or understood to have been given.—It is "needless to enter into an explanation of "some occurrences on the occasion alluded "to, which may be conjectured to have "given rise to the calumny.—It is enough "to say, they were entirely unconnected "with any or either of the two Generals "who have been accused.—A. Hamilton."

Now, as it was I who communicated, to the Editor of the Anti-Jacobin Review, the information, on which the statement, here so flatly contradicted, was made, it is a duty which I owe to that editor and to the world, to produce the authority, on which my information was founded. I could here appeal to every candid American, at all conversant in the history of the war, whether he has not always understood the facts now in question to be true; and, I could declare, upon my word and honour, that two persons (whose names I shall not, for their sakes, now mention), who were officers in the American army at York Town, have, more than once, given, in my hearing, a statement perfectly similar to that which Gen. Hamilton now contradicts: in fact, the circumstance is as generally known and believed in America as any one circumstance of the whole war. But, in a case where the character of any man is at stake, neither private conversation nor public report and general belief, is sufficient. My authority is a History of the American Revolution, written and published under circumstances, of which I shall speak, after extracting the passage alluded to.

"The redoubts, which were advanced "about 200 yards on the left of the British, "greatly impeded the progress of the combined armies. An attack on these was "therefore proposed.—To excite a spirit of emulation, the reduction of the one was "committed to the French; of the other to "the Americans. The light infantry of the "latter were commanded by the Marquis "de la Fayette; and the service was allotted to a select corps. The Marquis said "to General Washington, 'The troops "should retaliate on the British, for the cruelties they have practised.' The general "answered, 'You have full command, "and may order as you please.' The Marquis ordered the party to remember New "London,* and to retaliate, by putting the "men in the redoubt to the sword after having "carried it. The men marched to the assault with unloaded arms, at dark, on the "night of the 14th, passed the abatis, and "palisades, and attacking on all sides, carried the redoubt in a few minutes, with

* This remembering of New London was a paltry excuse of the vindictive Fayette, for his bloody purpose. There was no killing of PRISONERS at New London. The battle, indeed, continued after the British troops were in the fort, but it only continued, because the Americans kept firing upon our troops from the windows of the barracks; and a negro was shot in the very act of conveying fire to the magazine, over which there were a great number of British officers and soldiers. No man was killed at the storming of this fort, after resistance had ceased.

" the loss of 8 killed, and 28 wounded. Lieut. Col. Laurens personally took the commanding officer. The colonel's humanity and that of the Americans, so effectually overcame their resentment, that they spared the British. When bringing them off as prisoners, they said among themselves, 'Why! how is this? We were ordered to put them to death.' Being asked by others, why they had not done it, they answered, 'We could not, when they begged and cried so upon their knees for their lives.' About five of the British were killed, and one major, one captain, one ensign and 20 privates captured. Col. Hamilton, who conducted the enterprise with much address and intrepidity, in his report to the marquis, mentioned, to the honour of the detachment,—that incapable of imitating examples of barbarity, and forgetting recent provocations, they spared every man that ceased to resist."

Now, upon the origin and character of the work, from which this extract is taken, the justification of the statement in the Anti-Jacobin Review will wholly depend. The extract is made, then, from the History of the American Revolution, contained in the American edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica: for the reader to be fully convinced, that the authority is purely of American growth, he need only be informed of the following circumstances, which, were they even not at all connected with the present subject, are very well worth knowing.

The Encyclopædia Britannica was republished, in the city of Philadelphia, by Mr. Dobson, who commenced it with a very extensive and respectable subscription. It was delivered in half volumes, the first of which appeared in 1793, or early, perhaps, in 1794, and, under the letter A, it, of course, contained a history of the American revolution; but not the same history of that event, which is to be found in the English edition, and which, not being favourable enough to the Americans, was laid aside, and another, written by a vile English renegade, substituted in its place. This man, as is customary with persons of his description, entertained, still entertains, and has, on all occasions, discovered, an implacable hatred against his lawful Sovereign and native country; yet, when the overflowing of his gall came to appear in print, it was not found to be half bitter enough for some of Mr. Dobson's subscribers; a great number of whom consulted together, and deputed certain persons, amongst whom was the provost of the university, to inform him, that the account of the American revolution, published by him, "would not do;" and that, if he did not cancel it, and admit in its place another account written by them, or some one or more of them, they would withdraw their names from his subscription, and do his work all the injury in their power. Dobson is a very good and a very sensible man; but his all, and more than his all, was involved in the success of his Encyclopædia. He had no alternative, but submission or ruin. He chose the former; and as the half volume was already published and issued, he was obliged to take this third version of the story, print it, sew it up, and send it out to all his subscribers, with a direction to them to cancel the account already in the half volume, and to put this new one in its place. From this history it is that the above extract is taken.

The British public, to whom General Hamilton has, through the Morning Chronicle, appealed, must now decide between the general's present declaration and the statement of the Encyclopædia, which statement the general has suffered to pass ten whole years uncontradicted. The general will not, I am sure, pretend, that he never saw the statement in the Encyclopædia. That work was subscribed to by the President, by every member of the Congress, by all the state governments officially, and to my own knowledge, by General Hamilton himself. The particular article here cited, of the work, has, moreover, been reprinted, in a small volume for the use of schools in America, and, in this form, it has gone through several editions. If, then, it does contain a "calumny" on Generals Washington and La Fayette, if General Hamilton be "falsely praised at their expense," the calumny and falsehood rest upon American shoulders.

As to the fact, I am, for my part, fully persuaded, that the statement of the Encyclopædia is, in this respect, strictly true; and I ascribe the contradiction of General Hamilton to nothing more than a desire of removing from himself the imputation, which the Jacobins of the United States are now preferring against him, of building his fame upon the ruin of that of General Washington. How far public reasons may, in the present critical situation of affairs in that country, tend to tolerate such a motive of action, I shall not pretend to say; but, I know, that, as a public writer here, and particularly as the person who communicated the statement to the Anti-Jacobin Review, it is my duty to prevent, as far as in me lies, the propagation of any thing tending to destroy the validity of that statement, and to vanish over the characters of Washington and La Fayette.

WM. COBBETT.

The following letter we copy from the Morning Post. For the honour of the country, we hope, that the suggestion of the writer is true. We shall, however, be obliged to any correspondent, who can ascertain the fact.

“ Sir,—I cannot refrain from expressing the surprise which I, in common with many serious persons, your constant readers and well-wishers, feel, at your having been so far imposed upon as to admit into your paper, that burlesque account of a Ball at Reading, in which Mr. Addington is made to have addressed to the company, after supper, a speech in praise of the peace *, and of the neighbourhood of Reading, which really one should think too absurd to have been for a moment mistaken for genuine.—Political hostility fairly justifies some degree of liberty with facts, and some good-humoured laugh at personal foibles or vanities. But surely, Sir, the friends of Mr. Addington have a right to complain that you push this license rather too far, when you suffer your paper to be made the vehicle of a misrepresentation so gravely and circumstantially stated, as not to betray itself even to the discerning, for (what it must be) a joke; and at the same time so very disparaging to the good sense and good taste of the gentleman who is the object of it, as necessarily to cover him with ridicule in the eyes of all plain men, who take what they read as literally true.—Mr. Addington may not possess first-rate talents: he may have made a peace not the very best that ever was made, nor apparently likely to be the most lasting. But he is not a man to commit so gross a blunder as in a public harangue, certain to be printed in all the newspapers, and circulated throughout the whole Empire, to pay “ the people ” the compliment of being the authors of the peace, just at the moment when the people are beginning, however unreasonably, to feel themselves heartily ashamed of it: or to call public attention to the “ vigour of government,” at a moment when, I am sorry to say, the most timid and pacific are heard asking each other in the streets, whether France could venture to trample upon us and upon Europe, as she is now doing, if Great-Britain had a government with “ the vigour of a “ Flea ? ”—It is utterly incredible that Mr. Addington’s good sense should have been betrayed into so ridiculous a contretemps; even if it were possible (which assuredly it is not) that his good taste could suffer him to enter into a defence of his Administration at a Ball Supper; or, by way of contributing his share to the amusement of the evening, to repeat an old House of Commons’ Address in his solemn way, before an audience of dancing Misses, and Negus-swiggig Fiddlers.—I trust, therefore, to see a formal contradiction of the paragraph in your next paper.—I am, Sir, yours,

A Lover of Truth and Decorum.

PUBLIC PAPERS.

Note given in to the Deputation of the Empire by the French Legation, relative to the new general Plan of Indemnities.

The undersigned Minister Extraordinary from the French Republic to the German Diet, has received of the Austrian Plenipotentiary the Concluzum which the Extraordinary Deputation of the Empire voted in their sitting of the 8th of September, with the reserve of further modifications which might be adopted in the plan of Indemnities contained in the declaration of the mediating powers of the 30th of Thermidor (18th of August). He has likewise received the reclamations, remarks, and petitions, which, by subsequent Conclusa, have been transmitted by the deputation to the ministers of the mediating powers for their consideration. The undersigned, in concert with the Imperial Russian minister, has carefully examined these, and having now received the final instructions of the mediating powers in consequence of the reclamations, remarks, and petitions, that have been transmitted to them either immediately or by their ministers, he has the honour to present to the Extraordinary Deputation of the Empire, for its immediate and definitive acceptance, the additions made to the declaration of the 18th of August, as now modified, completed, and amended; additions conformable to the fulfilment of the treaty of Luneville, and the principles by which the two powers have been guided in their interference and mediation. He flatters himself that the deputation will acknowledge with gratitude this new proof of the attention of the mediating powers to the welfare of the German Empire. It will likewise see how useful have been the representations which its members have made with equal zeal and patriotism. The undersigned, however, cannot with sufficient force remind the deputation, how great is the pressure of circumstances, and of how much importance it is, that, by a speedy and final decision, the German Empire may enjoy the effects of the friendly sentiments of the mediating powers. The deputation will certainly not forget that the term (of two months) prescribed by the said powers for the fulfilment of the public hopes, is nearly expired.—Ratisbon, 16th of Vendemiaire, (5th of October).—La Voix.

Besides describing himself as “ the instrument ” in the hands of Divine Providence for procuring “ to the nation the blessings of peace,” he is said to have told his auditors, that the most disagreeable circumstance of his elevated situation, was, the obliging him to reside at a distance from them, amongst whom he spent so many happy days.

(A Note exactly similar was delivered in at the same time by Baron Buhler for the Russian Legation).

"The Emperor of all the Russias, my august Master, informed of the troubles which have disorganized the Republic, and being deeply affected by learning the evils to which you have been abandoned by anarchy, has formed the generous resolution of re-establishing among you order and tranquillity. My august Sovereign, faithful to the treaties by which he has engaged to guarantee your political existence, has sent me to co-operate with you in his name, and to restore peace among you. I therefore invite all the inhabitants in general, and individually, to second me, with all their power, in this enterprise. The land and naval forces which you see assembled, will unite their means to yours. They are destined to promote the reign of public tranquillity, to enforce obedience to the laws, and to the government, and to protect the inviolability of its members, and that of all property, both public and private. I am furnished with sufficient instructions and full powers. Manifest dispositions favourable to the establishment of public order, by abjuring all hatred; range yourselves under the protectingegis of his Imperial Majesty, and you will obtain an assurance, by means of his powerful intervention, of maintaining your independence, your safety, and general felicity. This is the only price that my august Sovereign requires for all his beneficent intentions; and for myself I seek for no other reward for the care which I shall constantly employ, than that of having contributed to this end with all the fervour of my zeal.

(Signed) "Count George Moenigo, Plenipotentiary."

Answer of the Diet of Schwitz to the Proclamation of Buonaparté,

"Citizen First Consul—The Proclamation which you did us the honour to send to us on the 20th of Sept. by Citizen Rapp, your Adjutant-General, arrived at Schwitz on the 6th of October.—We could have wished that the letter we took the liberty of sending you, General First Consul, on the 30th of September, could have reached you sooner; it contains a faithful exposition of the present state of Switzerland. Permit us to send you inclosed a duplicate of it, and to entreat you to receive it favourably. It will prove to you that the movements which have taken place in Switzerland are not the result of a spirit of party, and that the Swiss nation has no other object in view than to make use of the right which she claims of giving herself a central and cantonal constitution, founded on her position and her wants—a sacred and precious right, which you designed yourself, to ensure her by the treaty of Lunéville.—Switzerland would long since have been tranquil, if the members of the Helvetic government, those obscure metaphysicians, had consulted the real state of affairs, instead of obstinately attaching themselves to theoretic attempts, as erroneous as they are expensive.—The violence with which they have tried to impose their system upon the democratic cantons, the civil war they have organized to attain their end, directed at first against those cantons, then against all Switzerland; the unexampled severity with which they have done it, have produced a discontent equally general and just, and a determined and avowed will to shake off this unsupportable yoke.—It is not then, General First Consul, an affair of party—it is the sacred cause of humanity, it is the general wish of a whole nation, which has given us our power and our instructions, of a nation which you yourself wished to free, and which has been ill-treated and irritated, contrary to your intentions.—Yet that nation, we render ourselves guarantees, will never abuse the liberty it claims. The Swiss have nothing more at heart than to attain a state of repose, in which, under the shield of a mild and just government, each inhabitant may enjoy his property and existence. We are convinced that we shall arrive at that essential object of all social order, from the moment our will and our efforts shall be no longer fettered.—General First Consul, all Europe admires in you the supreme head of an immense power and empire, which, without doubt, according to your own views, will be directed to the good of humanity; your magnanimity assures us, that you will not make use of it against a people who only desire what you have made them hope, and who only wish what they believe themselves authorized to do by yourself.—Penetrated with eternal gratitude, the Swiss nation will do its endeavour to deserve the good will of the French government; and will fulfil all the duties which are imposed upon it by the desire of cultivating good neighbourhood.—It is with the most distinguished respect that we remain, General First Consul,

"The Deputies of the Helvetic Diet,

"Schwitz, Oct. 8, 1802."

Proclamation of the Council of War of the Swiss League to their Brothers in arms.—

Dated Basle, Oct. 12, 1802.

Friends and brothers, when you separated yourselves from your wives, your children, your fathers, and your friends, to conquer for your children, liberty, independence, and prosperity, you abandoned with alacrity and courage your cottages, and your flocks. This idea, "the God "of our fathers is with us, and protects us," gave you force to brave all the dangers, and to despise the fatigues of war. You quitted with songs your mountains and your valleys, to enter into the field and defend the cause of liberty and your country. The Almighty blessed your arms, and heard the just wishes of a nation known only by its rectitude, and which had armed for its liberty and independence. Our enemies, our oppressors, the sai-diant Helvetic government, with its feeble party, have been chased almost to the frontiers of the confederate Cantons.—But brothers and friends, we have received a notification, that if we did not by our conduct give proofs of an entire confidence in the First Consul of the powerful nation of France, who has caused a declaration to be made by his Envoy, General Rapp, to our fathers assembled at Schwitz, that he wishes to interpose as mediator in the war which we are carrying on against the odious Helvetic government, we should be compelled to it by the victorious arms of the French warriors.—Brothers, friends, confederates, who among us could conceive the thought of menacing ourselves with the numerous and experienced armies of France? No, friends, no; we wish to await peaceably the determination of the First Consul, and with that order, that moderation, and that discipline, which have hitherto guided your steps, you will receive, we are convinced, the orders of your superiors, of your general; and even, if it should be necessary, you will return to your residences, in order that our country may not be exhausted by the entrance of foreign troops; that we may not be deprived of the scanty harvest of this year, which we hoped to consume with our children; and that we may not be plunged into indigence and misery. It is only the Helvetic government, directed by its passions and its private interest, that could call in the aid of foreign troops; we, who took up arms only for our country and tranquillity, have no need of troops to attain our object. But, relying on our conduct, we dare to hope, that the First Consul of France, who has guaranteed our independence, and who has been deceived by false reports, will, as soon as he shall have been informed of the true state of things, take measures, which will secure our honour, and the prosperity and independence of our country. May the Almighty deign to grant this, who has caused us to make an important step towards our future happiness, and crowned our arms with his benediction.

Copy of a letter from the French Minister of Foreign Affairs to MR. DE CETTO, the Bavarian Minister at Paris, relative to the affairs of Switzerland.

Paris, Oct. 15, 1802.—Sir, The relations of neighbourhood which exist between Bavaria and Switzerland, and which ought to render yet more secure the new acquisitions which his Electoral Highness has made in Germany, call for his particular attention to the late events of which Helvetia has been the theatre. That country has long been divided. The influence of intrigue and money, has hitherto prevented the government which had been established by the suffrages of the majority of the people, from becoming firmly established, and acquiring the power necessary to its preservation.—Whilst the opposition was confined to insidious and obscure menaces, the First Consul did not think it his duty to interfere in discussions to which circumstances, and the influence of the general peace of Europe, promised to put an end. But at length the enemies of the Helvetic people attempted a more open opposition. Blood was shed, and Helvetia was menaced with ruin.—In this frightful conjuncture of affairs, the wishes of all demanded the mediation of the First Consul. The party even who had taken up arms against the government, led away by the opinion of men who had deceived them, now saw the necessity of solemnly claiming the mediation of France.—The continental powers, neighbours of Helvetia, could not view without fear, the remote consequences of a disorder, the focus of which was established in that country; and in this state of affairs, the humanity, and the interest of France, and of Europe, demanded of the First Consul that he should desist from acting upon the determination which he had taken, not to intermeddle in the affairs of Switzerland. He has spoken as a mediator and a friend, and Helvetia has been pacified. The people have returned to their homes. Those simple and just men, seeing that they had been abused, have menaced with violence the chiefs who sought to slander France, and who in their public acts were permitted to outrage her. General contempt now does justice to their clamours.—Such, Sir, are the facts which I have thought it my duty to communicate to you. The First Consul did not wish to abandon a country which stands in need of the friendship of France, and which, without the benefit of her influence, would have passed in a short time through all the horrors of anarchy under their ancient yoke, which they had so happily broken.—But at the time that he recognized the necessity of assisting the Helvetic nation to fix at length for itself, and in an irrevocable manner, its constitutional destiny, he did not cease for a moment to recollect, that the more perfect independence ought to be the basis of its constitution. The right of organizing a government which Helvetia has acquired, is one of the glorious results of the war which France supported against the most powerful armies of Europe, and of the treaties by which that war was terminated.—It is because Helvetia holds this right by the victories and the benevolent policy of France, that the First Consul wishes now to protect the exercise of it, and to prevent a handful of turbulent emigrants, deserters from foreign armies, who wished to carry fire and sword into their country, from succeeding in their attempt to deprive of their rights the greater part of their fellow-citizens.—It is not by such men that the treaty of Luneville can be invoked as to what respects Helvetia; but by the larger portion of the people whom they wished to oppress, and whose independence is guaranteed by that treaty. Are these men so estimable, or so important a part of Helvetia, as Argovia, the Pays de Vaud, and the Bailiwicks formerly subject, whose political rights were guaranteed by France, not only in the treaty of Luneville, but in all those which, since the war, have strengthened the ancient ties between France and Helvetia?—There are those who seek to spread a report that the Helvetic Republic may be led by a spirit of imitation to establish with the First Consul those relations which unite him to the Italian Republic. But this idea is very far from the intention of the First Consul, who is inimical to all such determination, and whose formal intention is to assist in the organization of Switzerland, only for the purpose of ensuring to that country an absolute independence.—I am persuaded, Sir, that you will be extremely desirous to transmit to his Electoral Highness the communications which I have the honour to make to you, and of which there is no necessity for me to appreciate the importance.—Receive the assurance of my high consideration.—

Letter of the French and Russian Ministers to the Directorial Minister at Ratisbon.—Dated Ratisbon, Oct. 15, 1802.

As the principles inseparably connected with the distribution of the indemnities in the declarations made in the name of the mediating powers, on the 18th of August last, and reproduced with modifications, which they consented to in the general plan of the 8th of October, ought to be entirely comprehended in the Conclusion, which the extraordinary deputation is about to form immediately: in regard to the whole, the undersigned (minister extraordinary of the French Republic, and the minister plenipotentiary of His Majesty the Emperor of Russia) take the earliest opportunity of proposing, after the enlightened reflections made to them by several of the sub-delegates, that the eleventh of these principles be announced in the following manner:—Eleventhly, the preceding dispositions render of no avail the pretensions which existed, both to the territories become French, and to those which existing to property given in the room of others on the Left Bank of the Rhine, shall not be produced, examined, and settled in an amicable manner within the course of a year.—This mode of expression, which at first seemed sufficiently explicit, according to the term fixed in the twelfth principle, for every transaction whatever, expresses better indeed the provident intention of the mediating powers, and corresponds better to the solicitude of the deputation for the general good.

(Signed) Laforet. Baron de Buhler.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Corfu, Aug. 30.—The Secretary of the Russian Legation, M. Nemerofski, yesterday killed himself in his own apartments. He discharged two pistols into his body. His manners had conciliated the esteem of every body, and particularly of his Excellency Count Mocenigo, the Russian Plenipotentiary.

Leghorn, Sept. 29.—Their Majesties the King and Queen of Etruria arrived here on the 26th, and the next morning embarked with the young Prince on board the Princess Louisa, of 120 guns, and at eleven o'clock the whole Spanish squadron sailed with a fair wind for Barcelona. They were saluted at their departure with 101 discharges of artillery from this fortress.

Ratisbon, Oct. 8.—The Supplementary Declaration has not yet made its appearance officially; but yesterday, a courier from Paris having arrived the day before, it was fully approved of in a conference between the envoys of Brandenburg, Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Hesse, and Mentz. It contains many additions and changes: the Maltese Order now loses all its indemnities, and the Tunic Order receives several; Mentz receives a million of revenue, partly from immediate territory, which will now include Ratisbon and Wetzlar, and partly from the revenues of mediate foundations. Solms Braunfels receives a voice in the Council of Princes. The six remaining Imperial cities will continue a college, but without having a vote on peace and war. Hesse Cassel receives no further indemnifications, but a considerable addition is made to those of Wurtemberg, as for example, the Abbey of Sconthal, assigned in the former declaration to the Count of Liningen Westerburgh; the territory of Comburgh, near Schwabish, Hall, &c. Brunswick, in consequence of the possession it receives in the bishopric of Osnabruck, will either cede a tract of land to Mecklenburgh, or pay yearly a sum of money.—In the 12th sitting of the Deputation of the Empire, on the 5th October, the various claims and remonstrances were again taken into consideration. The Elector of Treves gave in a similar memoir to that delivered by the Archbishopric of Cologne. It was stated, on the part of the Archduke Ferdinand, that the revenue of the Duchy of Modena was 1,500,000 Imperial florins, while that of the Brisgau was only 104,119 florins.

Oct. 10.—Yesterday in the 13th sitting of the Deputation, the new plan of indemnities was presented. The Deputation will immediately take it into consideration. Brandenburg, Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Hesse Cassel, and Mentz, have already approved the general plan.—It was said and expected that this would be merely a supplementary plan to that given in on the 18th of August, but the supplementary matter is inserted in the former plan, so as to form an enlarged general plan of indemnities. It contains thirty-four sections, and is printed in four sheets. It will be seen from the following extracts that the Grand Duke of Tuscany receives by it no further indemnification.—Sect. 1. contains the indemnifications of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, which are the same as in the former plan, only that it is determined that the county of Neuburg, on the left side of the Inn, with all its territorial and seigniorial rights, shall be united to Bavaria.—Sect. 2. Bavaria shall receive the town and suburbs of Passau, together with all that appertains to it beyond the Inn and the Ilz, and a circle of 500 klafters from the extreme end of the said suburbs; as also the Abbeys of Waldassen and Eberach, with exception of all rights, properties, and ecclesiastical revenues, which lie in the city and territory of Augsburg.—Sect. 3. Prussia receives all the rights and property of Mentz, in Thuringia, as also the Abbey of Kappenberg. The rest of the Bishopric of Munster, which is not given to Prussia, is allotted to several princes.—Sect. 4. To the King of England and Elector of Brunswick Lunenburg, for his claims to the county of Sayn Altenkirchen, Hildersheim, Corvey, and Hoster, and his rights and property in the cities of Hamburg and Bremen, and in the territory of the latter, as shall be hereafter particularly stipulated, and for the cession of the district of Wildshausen—the Bishopric of Osnabruck. To the Duke of Brunswick Wolfenbuttle, the Abbeys of Gandersheim and Helmstadt, under condition of paying a constant rent of 2000 florins to the Princess Amelia of Dessau.—Sect. 5. The Margrave of Baden receives likewise the Nassian districts Lichtenau and Wildstadt; the Abbeys of Reichenau, Oehningen, the provostship and Chapter of Odenheim, and the immediate and mediate rights and possessions which depend on the public establishments and corporations on the Left Bank of the Rhine, and to the south of the Neckar.—Sect. 6. The Duke of Wurtemberg receives likewise Sconthal, Camburg, with their sovereignties, as also Rothminster, Heiligenthal, Obirstenfeld, Holzhausen, Margareth-hausen, and all the abbeys, convents, and chapters in the same, on paying certain constant rents to different princes.—Sect. 7. The Landgrave of Hesse Cassel receives for his claims to Corvey, the Mentz districts of Naumburg and Neustadt, and the town of Geirhausen, under condition of paying a constant rent of 22,500 florins to the Landgrave of Hesse-Rothenburg. The Landgrave of Hesse-Darmstadt, for surrendering certain rights on the cities of Wetzlar and Frankfurt, and some Hessian districts, receives the Duchy of Westphalia and different districts of Mentz, subject to a constant rent, &c.—Sect. 12. Nassau Dillenburg, the late Hereditary Stadtholder, receives the abbeys and provostships of Hoften, St. Gerold, Banderen, and all the chapters, provostships, and convents situate in the territory assigned him.—Sect. 25. The Seat of Mentz shall be transferred to the cathedral of Ratisbon, and the dignity of elector, arch-chancellor and primate of Germany, shall be perpetually united to it. His metropolitan jurisdiction shall extend over the old ecclesiastical provinces of Mentz, Cologne, and Treves, as far as they extend on the right bank of the Rhine, and excepting the territory of the King of Prussia. The Elector of Mentz receives the principality and city of Ratisbon, and Wetzlar, with the title of a county.—Sect. 27. The College of Imperial Cities shall for the future consist of the free and independent cities of Augsburg, Lubec, Nuremberg, Frankfurt, Bremen, and Hamburg. They shall possess their respective territories in full sovereignty and jurisdiction. They shall also enjoy a perfect neutrality in all wars of the Empire, and shall be always exempt from any military contribution, ordinary or extraordinary; and in all questions of war or peace, shall be entirely and necessarily dispensed from acceding to the resolutions of the Empire; they shall also separately receive the following indemnities, &c.

Augsburg, Oct. 14.—The Chancellor of the Bishop of Passau, M. de Rademacher, has repaired to Ratisbon, to solicit the Deputation of the Empire, not to separate the city and fortress of Passau from the rest of the bishopric. It appears, moreover, that representations have been made by the mediating powers, to engage the Court of Vienna to withdraw its troops from the city and bishopric; already the Prince Bishop has notified to the Magistracy of Passau, that the presence of the Austrian troops will not be of longer duration, and that it had no other object by the military occupation of the country, than to prevent it from being dismembered.

Paris, Oct. 15.—It is said that the Minister of the Interior is to accompany the First Consul in the journey which he is about to make to Havre, Rouen, and Cherbourg, which is expected to take place very soon.

Ratisbon, Oct. 15.—The Deputation of the Empire held yesterday its fifteenth sitting—Mentz and Hesse-Cassel voted for the new plan of Indemnities; the majority is consequently in favour of that plan. Bohemia, Saxony, and the Grand Master of the Teutonic Order, have not yet voted.—The Deputation have not yet agreed to a conclusion; they wait till the Minister of Bohemia has received instructions from Vienna.—The Russian Legation here has received instructions to accede to the alterations in the second plan of Indemnities, as sent from Paris.—The Russian and French Ministers gave in another note to the Deputation of the Empire on the 13th, containing some emendations of the 11th article of the new plan of Indemnities; at the conclusion they again earnestly recommend to the Deputation to vote a conclusion on the plan.—Many reclamations have already been given in against the new plan of Indemnities. The most remarkable of these, is that of the Deputy for the Electorate of Hanover, relative to considerable advantages granted to the City of Bremen, and especially the grant of the district and territory of Vegesack, which is claimed as territorial property of the Electorate of Hanover.

Lausanne, Oct. 16.—We learn from Berne that the army of the Confederates has just been disbanded. There is now consequently no obstacle to the return of the government to that city. The first Helvetic demi-brigade marched from hence yesterday morning, and will arrive to-morrow evening at Berne. The Senate decreed in its last sitting, that all its members should assemble together at Berne on the 18th. The Executive Council will not set out till to-morrow.

Berne.—Colonel Rapp has traversed Switzerland: he has found the towns and villages a prey to misfortunes—the dismal attendants of civil war. His presence calmed every alarm. The bodies assembled have been dispersed.—The 1st and 2d Helvetic demi-brigades are on their march to form the garrison of our city. The arrival of the Senate is announced for the day after to-morrow. Deputies from all parts of Switzerland are about to proceed to Paris.—We begin to hope that our revolution, which has been continued and renewed annually for eight years, is approaching its end. Let us at length enjoy every thing good and useful it promised; and let the government under which we are destined to live, not signalize the triumph of any party, and be consecrated by the union of all its citizens.—Weak as we are in comparison of the surrounding powers, can we pretend to an honourable independence, a peaceful neutrality, if we continue divided!—The sentiments of the whole Helvetic people are united in these three wishes:—1st. A Constitution in which the oligarchy may never re-appear, and which at the same time may ensure the equality of the citizens—the equality of our eighteen cantons—the equality of the five religions which the different parties of Helvetia profess! 2d. A Constitution suited to the diversity and inequalities of our territory, by which Unterwald, Berne, Lausanne, and Basle, may be governed according to the local circumstances, languages, and manners peculiar to them.—In the last place our third wish, no less national than the other two, is, to see maintained, in their whole integrity, our ancient relations with the French people, and the men who are in the pay of foreign powers, deprived of all their influence. In the bosom even of a general conflagration, its real interest is to remain neuter: this will never be that of a Bachman and a Vatteville, who since their infancy have served those powers, which are enemies to France. If war should again be kindled up in Europe, and if, as was the case with the King of Sardinia and the Republic of Venice, neutrality should to us become impossible; the alliance of France would be our only wish, our justest and dearest interest.—There is not one of us who does not think the Swiss united to the French, will always defend with glory our mountains, and render impenetrable to the enemy our plains and our large towns, such as Zurich, Berne, Soleure, Fribourg, Basle, and Lausanne.—In a word, there is not one of us who is not sensible that our political system ought to be that of our fathers, who, through a love for liberty and for their country, were always intimately connected with France.—If any man, born in our territories, does not participate with us in this opinion, he does not think like a real Swiss. He abandons himself blindly to affections foreign to the interests of his country.—The cry of rallying around the nation is equality among the cantons, the independence of Helvetia, and concert with the French Republic.—Moniteur.

Rome, Oct. 17.—The Deputies which our Provisional Government sent in order to consult with the Diet of Schwitz, respecting the steps that ought to be taken in the present situation of affairs, have returned: they have brought an order to General Bachmann, to disband the Confederate Army. Yesterday and the day before, the contingent troops belonging to the smaller Cantons returned home. Those belonging to Schwitz carried with them an Helvetic standard, which they took in the battle of the 3d inst. The levies of troops which were ordered in several of the Cantons, have been suspended. General Aufdermaur passed through this city a few days ago, on his way to Schwitz. General Bachmann is here with his staff. Citizen Guadolphe, Secretary of Legation to Citizen Verninae, has invited the Commission of Ten to re-assemble, and has made some important propositions to them. Yesterday General Rapp gave a grand dinner, at which General Bachmann and his staff were present. The Helvetic government are not yet arrived here.

Basle, Oct. 18.—The troops belonging to Basle, which were ready to march on the first signal to join the Army of General Bachmann, are to remain here until farther orders. It is said that the Diet of Schwitz will govern the Republic until the government is definitively organized, and the Members of the Central Government, who are to return to Berne, have given in their resignations.—The 1st and 2d Helvetic half-brigades ought to have arrived by this time in this city. The troops on both sides are to be disbanded.

TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD HAWKESBURY,
His Majesty's Sec. of State for Foreign Affairs.

MY LORD,—Previous to the discussion of the “high matter,” of which I spoke to your lordship, at the close of my last letter (p. 510), previous to any remarks respecting the necessity of a total change in the war-politics of the country, it is incumbent on me to show, that the evils and dangers, which I attribute to the policy hitherto pursued, do really exist, which, I trust, I shall do, to the entire satisfaction of your lordship, in discussing the 4th, and remaining proposition of my former letter; to wit: That, though for various reasons, the present dispute with France may not terminate in open hostility; yet that, in whatever way that dispute is accommodated for the present, this nation must, ere long, be at war with France, and that the peace will then be found to have produced an irretrievable injury to our position, naval and military, domestic and foreign.

Those who have paid attention to the progress of French encroachment, will not need to be reminded, that the subjugation of every country which she has enslaved, has been preceded by several previous quarrels and accommodations; by the alternate use of which she has very seldom failed to accomplish her ends. This is the course she will endeavour to pursue with us. It is, indeed, the course she has actually entered on, and which, till within these few weeks, has been attended with uninterrupted success.

The check she has met with has arisen from the personal determination of His Majesty, rather than from any remains of resistance in your lordship and your colleagues, who will be overjoyed to find a plausible pretext for avoiding hostilities, a pretext with which you will most probably be furnished. The affairs of Switzerland will, as I observed in my last letter, (Register, p. 501) be settled without your aid, and in such a way as to leave, to the present ministers at least, not the smallest ground of complaint against the First Consul. The attempts, which Buonaparté has made to interfere in the internal concerns of this country, as well as his insolent endeavours to degrade our Sovereign, may be given up, or, at least, so far receded from, as to furnish the ministers with an excuse for a reconciliation; and, as "the falling out of lovers produces a renewal of love," which is generally attended with some fresh token of affection and constancy, I think it very probable, that the token, on this occasion, may, on our part, be the island of Malta. Indeed, I have not, as yet, heard any argument on which ministers can defend their conduct in retaining Malta. Russia and Prussia have, it is asserted, refused to guarantee the new arrangement respecting this important island, and Spain has, perhaps, acted contrary to our meaning, though not against the letter of the treaty, in confiscating the property of the Spanish Languages. What then? The two former were only to be invited prospectively to accede to the stipulations. If they did not choose to do so, the obligation between the parties, who did definitively contract, remains. Cards of invitation were to be sent to the powers of Europe, but, as some one observed at the time, what if they should not think the picnic entertainment of the order of St. John to their taste? The theatrical amusements of Malta must proceed, though we, as subscribers, may bear the greatest proportion of the loss. We have, at Amiens, agreed, that Malta shall be what we choose to call independent, and restored to the Order of St. John on certain conditions. France and Great-Britain are to be only two of the guaranteeing powers, if they please. What, then, has the Order of St. John to do with Buonaparté's interference with Switzerland and Holland, or with any other instance or instances of his ambition? If the grand master (supposing him to be legally chosen) should demand the island at our hands, and if the troops of the King of Naples should arrive to garrison it, we are positively bound to evacuate the place, not to France, but to the Knights. How, then, can we keep it consistently with good faith? *

Strange as it may appear, my lord, there are not wanting persons to contend, that the arguments, made use of by the opposers of the peace, will justify ministers in retaining Malta. To those who make no distinction between right and might, this way of reasoning may appear perfectly satisfactory; but to those who do make such distinction, it will, I imagine, appear exactly the contrary. The reasons urged by the opposers of the peace applied well to the situation of things previous to the peace, previous to the signing of a solemn treaty by which Malta was to be surrendered; but, how can those reasons be construed to justify the retaining of Malta now, merely by way of counter-balancing the power which France may acquire by means of Holland, of Switzerland, or of new ports on the coast of Africa, if such she has obtained? But, if there be any other just cause of quarrel, the whole treaty of Amiens, under which alone any authority can make a valid title against our possession of Malta, will be null and void; and Germany alone presents directly such a cause of quarrel. There England has, and has always had, an immediate interest. England has been, for more than a century,

* The sprightly Mr. Chalmers, with whose avowed defence of the peace, the mail bags were crammed for several weeks, has the following most delightful passage respecting Malta:—"Our moderation has concurred with our policy, in restoring Malta to its true owners. By placing it prudently in their hands, under a most powerful guarantee, we have counteracted the state, who was ambitious to possess it, under whatever title. In our hands, Malta had been an enormous expense, without any perceptible profit."—Yet, this island, which is an "enormous expense, without any perceptible profit," is now, we are told, to be retained by way of balancing the continental and other encroachments of France! The inconsistencies, the flat contradictions, the downright absurdities, into which the makers and defenders of this peace have fallen, are without end.

a guarantee of the constitution which, to this moment, exists there. She is party to various treaties, (not yet cancelled) with the House of Austria, confirming that constitution; and the Electorate of Hanover has a connexion, of the most intimate kind, with the united kingdom. The ministers have (in the True Briton of the 25th instant) insisted, that the ambitious strides of France, particularly when "they tend to weaken" and distress those nations, who either are "at the present moment, or are most likely" to become in future, the allies of the "British Empire, must be considered as a breach of the treaty we have entered into, which, it must be evident, virtually implies, that, whilst the peace continues, "no material change shall be effected by France, in the relative state of Europe." This, to be sure, is supremely inconsistent and ridiculous, as coming from the lips of those men, who, even during the negotiations at Amiens, suffered Buonaparté to make himself the head of the Italian Republic, and to name Piedmont the "twenty-seventh" military division of France;" who concluded that treaty, leaving French troops in Holland and Switzerland, and without making any stipulation for their removal: nor am I sure, that any of the continental aggressions of France can be fairly construed into a breach of the treaty of Amiens; but there may be good cause of war without a breach of any positive compact, and that Buonaparté's mandate to the Emperor and Empire of Germany is such a cause no one can entertain a doubt. Yet, my lord, even here, where the best possible ground for a war presents itself, there is an obstacle in the way, which the ministers will be very glad to find an excuse for declining to encounter. The conduct of Buonaparté, with respect to Germany, may merit all the epithets which has been bestowed on it; his views may be even more wicked than those ascribed to him; but, it will, in any and in every case, as relating to this transaction, be very difficult to separate the Consul of France from the Emperor of Russia; every remonstrance addressed to the one will apply equally well to the other; and, unless some alteration of system, which the change of ministry in Russia may, possibly produce, should take place, it is very clear, that all attempt at resistance, on our part, would be vain, unless both the Emperor of Germany and the Swiss could be brought to co-operate with us, and of this there is not now the most distant hope.

These reasons, my lord, together with the dread of the mortification, the shame, the utter confusion, which an open rupture with France would, so soon after the peace, and with our position so materially changed for the worse, bring upon you and your colleagues, will lead you most eagerly to catch at every opportunity for patching up an accommodation; and Buonaparté, unless his plans against us are perfectly ripe, which I think they are not, will not be inclined to hasten a state of things, in which he must foresee that the present ministers cannot preserve their places. Any change of men, without a change of measures and of principles, would not, indeed, be greatly injurious to his projects; but, he must be well persuaded, that no set of men are less likely to oppose his will, than those from whose trembling hands he extorted the release of Napper Tandy; a persuasion which will, probably, induce him to enable them to meet the parliament with something like a promise of a continuation of "the blessings of peace."

But, my lord, whatever be the manner, in which the present dispute may terminate, peace with France, under her present rulers, it is impossible for us long to have, unless we purchase it by an absolute submission to her. I do not mean a figurative, but a literal submission, a real bona fide surrender, not of those undefinable abstract possessions called liberty and independence, but of our tangible property, our gold and our silver, our household stuff, our persons, and the land that we walk upon.

From the first dawn of the French revolution to the present hour, the great, the leading object, of all the successive rulers of that country has been the destruction of England: not her humiliation, not her impoverishment, but her political destruction, as the means of facilitating their scheme of universal empire, a scheme towards the accomplishment of which they have, with our good aid, made more progress during the last six months than during the whole of the ten preceding years.

"Universal empire" (says an excellent writer on the conquests and ambition of France) "is, in itself, an extravagant expression, and was so even in the proudest days of ancient Rome; but, let it be taken in this confined sense, that there exists a nation, who expect to unite the greatest part of Europe in an empire almost as extensive as the Roman, or, at least, as the empire of Charlemagne; in such a sense it is not an impossible

"object." So far from its being an impossible object, it is an object already nearly, if not quite, accomplished. The population of Europe, according to the best authorities, does not amount to 140 millions of souls: the dominions which the French now include under the name of France, contain, according to a census recently taken, upwards of 35 millions, that is to say, more than one-fourth part of the whole population of Europe. Add to this the population of the states, which they hold as vassals, and which are, to all the intents and purposes of power, a part of the empire of France, and you will find, that the aggregate population of this empire amounts to upwards of seventy-five millions of souls, more, in number, than one-half, and, in point of influence, moral and physical, particularly as directed against England, more than two-thirds, of all Europe.

Nor do the republican rulers, my lord, by any means, disguise their intentions. The "safe politicians," such as Lords Castle-reagh and your lordship, had, indeed, at the time of concluding the treaty of Amiens, discovered in the government of France, a return to principles of moderation and justice, and the still "safer politician," Sir Edward Law, seemed to think that Mr. Elliot should incur the censure of the House for making that moderation and justice a matter of doubt; but, whatever might be the professions, or the circumstances, which you might have heard or perceived at that time, your opinion has been furiously shaken by subsequent events, and by the present professions of Buonaparté and his co-operators. The act which announces the union of Piedmont with France, informs us, that the Piedmontese were the first to open their gates to "the conquerors of the world." Paris is, in the title of a work just received from thence, called "the metropolis of the world." Another work, published at Paris, and entitled The greatest act of Buonaparté, has the following passage:—"All the powers of Europe are weakened, disconcerted, and no longer able to defend themselves: around him the universe is silent Under the reign of Augustus, universal peace was the fore-runner of a more sublime empire: under the Consulship of the august young man, it prepares the way for its restoration. I could push the comparison still further; I could shew you the mistress of the world, embracing all nations in one common tie, uniting all interests in one common center; all diversities of manners and of languages assimilated; all nations subordinate to the great nation: a young hero, absorbing all factions, combining all by the energy and address of his own character, accomplishes the great work Such was the moment fixed on, by the Saviour of the world, for the introduction of an unknown light. That light, after eighteen centuries, suddenly and totally extinguished, again breaks forth: . . . the comparison between the two epochs is too striking, the features too strongly marked, the affinity too evident to our senses, not to be discovered by the most inattentive observer. To new model the almost dissolved elements of civil society; to unite in one common bond, the various ties dissolved by the dreadful convulsion; and on the basis of the great republic to raise one universal republic—this is the great work of the present day!" Buonaparté himself, has, in terms by no means equivocal, expressed the same notion: "The English, the French, the Germans, the Italians, &c. living under the same civil code, &c. are all members of one family, and those men who wish to kindle war amongst them, are advocates for civil war."

To dissipate the alarms excited by intimations of this sort, weak and pusillanimous persons believe, or affect to believe, that if the French really entertained such a project as I am now speaking of, they would keep it a secret from the world. Such a belief, however, is clearly contradicted by a long train of operations and events, at which we need not at all wonder, when we consider the natural tendency of such a system, when regularly and indefatigably pursued. A project of conquest if attempted to be put in execution the moment its conception is first announced to the party to be conquered, has to encounter not only the physical difficulties of the enterprise, but also the whole weight of the alarm and indignation, which the first mention of it naturally excites; but, after telling a people, that they must and shall be your slaves, give them time to cool, to think and talk about your intention; let the idea become familiar to their minds; let them once regard the thing as possible, and put them if you can under the guidance of a ministry, who shall teach them to weigh subjugation and the "blessings of peace" against independence and the "horrors of war." This is the course which the French have pursued, and which has hitherto, in no one instance, that I know of, failed of success. And yet we affect not to hear, or, hearing, not to understand, or, understanding, not to believe, the audible, the plain and positive declarations addressed by this nation to ourselves! To professions of peace and amity, on the part of the republicans of France, we listen with all that eagerness and ecstasy, with which the silly girl of sixteen imbibes the protestations of her seducer; but, as to their menaces, their denunciations of vengeance, of chastisement and of destruction, we are, or affect to be, perfectly incredulous. In this respect, reason upon reason, warning upon warning, have been bestowed on us in vain: experience, which is said to make fools wise, has, on this score, left us as foolish as it found us: we are absolutely incorrigible, and our incorrigibility, I am sorry to say it, arises from precisely that passion, which is at once the most disgraceful to ourselves and the most favourable to the projects of our enemy: a base passion, made up of selfishness and cowardice, leads us to affect an ignorance of what we dare not encounter: like chickens at the approach of the kite, we hide our heads and our eyes from the danger which we have not the courage to resist; and, like those timid animals too, we shall feel the blow, though we are determined not to see it.

This hostility against us, not of Buonaparté or any other individual, or of any particular faction or sect, but of the whole mass of French republicans; this settled hostile purpose against us, this resolution to destroy us, cost what it will, whether of time, or of money, or of lives; this end, to which all other projects are subservient, to which the encroachments in the Mediterranean, in Italy, in Switzerland, and in Germany, must be considered merely as means; this it is which we must resist with success, or implicitly yield to. There is no medium: those who, with a due mixture of folly and of malice, exclaimed against "eternal war," will soon perceive, probably, that they are destined to something still worse. They must now beat France, or become the subjects, that is to say, the slaves of France. Nor is there much time for deliberation. A twelvemonth will see us completely bound hand and foot: already are we partly surrounded, cooped up and cramped by our pursuer: his net is drawing over us, and unless we instantly cut it with the sword, our future struggles will be in vain.

However, my lord, to leave the defenders of the peace no room for cavil, I am content, in considering a new war in connection with the effects of the peace, to take the question upon the ground of the existing dispute between the governments of England and France. This dispute has prevented the interchange of ambassadors, it has put a stop to the execution of that part of the treaty of peace, which, on our side, remained unexecuted; it has occasioned a new armament, even before all the alacrity of ministers to reduce us to a state of helplessness, was able completely to disarm us; it has had, on the feelings of the nation, on the speculations in commerce and in the funds, on the "capital, credit, and confidence" of the country, all the effects of a war, determined on by both parties, but not actually declared. The political blindness and imbecility of those, by whom the peace was made and defended, is, therefore, as fully proved by the present state of things, as if the fleets were at this moment engaged in the Bay of Biscay, or, as if Buonaparté's marauders were sacking the city of London.

Thus situated, then, it behoves us, my lord, to enquire into the change which these six months of peace have made in our position, naval and military, domestic and foreign. But, this part of the subject I am reluctantly obliged to postpone to my next. In the mean time, I have the honour to remain, &c. &c.

WM. CORBETT.

London, 25th Oct. 1802.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

Events of importance follow each other so quick, that it is absolutely impossible for our reflections to keep pace with them.—The Swiss have, as it was natural to expect, submitted to France. There are persons, who are still credulous enough to think, that the submission is only of a temporary nature, and that a new resistance will soon break out. Alas! "we are become great hoppers," hoppers in every thing but in our own exertions! Let any one look at the answer (p. 523) of the Diet of Schwitz (which was, by the lovers of peace, thought, at first, to be a fabrication of the French); let him look at the proclamation of the Council of War of the Swiss League (p. 524); let him look at Talleyrand, the honest Talleyrand's letter (p. 525) to Mr. de Cetto, and then let him believe, if he can, that the submission of the Swiss is of a temporary nature. The letter of Talleyrand, which, impudent and insolent as it is, the makers and defenders of the Peace of Amiens cannot, with any reason or justice complain of, is addressed to the "neighbouring powers." And can the wiseacres complain of this? Did they not want to be rid of continental connections? Did they not say that we were "too honest" to have connections with any of the continental powers? Buonaparté appears to have believed them, and seems to have determined to guard their morals from all danger of continental corruption.—No, no; it is not a temporary submission, but a submission which is never to cease, till the republic of France is once more engaged and overcome.

"Holland, Switzerland, and the whole of Italy, are provinces subservient and tributary to the empire of France; they recruit, pay, and clothe her armies, they enrich her generals and her commissaries; her ambassadors are the legislators, the ministers, the real sovereigns, the absolute despots, of those states, which your lordship and your colleagues wish to regard as independent. These states are all cut off from every relationship with one another; except the yoke which is their common portion. What resistance, my lord, can they now make against her will? Their murmurs would be instantly drowned in their blood, and the hour of their revolt would be that of their destruction." (Cobbett's letters on the peace, p. 75.) These times and circumstances were, then, foretold? Indeed, he must be an idiot, who could not have foretold them.—The manner in which Buonaparté has settled with the Swiss precisely corresponds with our expectations, as expressed in the preceding sheet, (p. 501.) That pretext for quarrel is, however, it seems, abandoned, on the part of our ministers, who have now taken a new ground, whereon to make their stand. This is, the union of Piedmont with France, together with the recent proceedings in regard to the island and order of Malta. With respect to Malta we shall say nothing, till the grounds of complaint are specified; but, as to Piedmont, can Lord Hawkesbury and his colleagues, can the defenders of the peace, can the approvers of that ruinous and disgraceful measure, can those whom that measure plunged "into a tumult of exultation and a delirium of joy"; can these, or any of these, have the assurance to complain of Buonaparté for uniting Piedmont with France? "Your friend, the consul, my lord, has been, on the subject of Piedmont, more communicative than you. He has lately told the French, and has left this cowardly country to hear it at second hand, that "Le Piedmont forme notre 27^e division militaire!" without another word! without any apology for the seizure, or any apprehension of the displeasure of the monarchies of Europe in consequence thereof!"—(Cobbett's letters on the peace, p. 53. published in October last.) And, shall we now affect to be surprised at what has lately taken place? Shall the "ministers of peace and plenty," the "safe politicians," be allowed to avail themselves of the union of Piedmont with France as "a ground of quarrel which could not be foreseen!" As a proof of "A NEW hostile mind in the First Consul!" We trust not: we trust, that there will not be wanting men of independence and of spirit, to ring in their ears those re-iterated, those irrefragable proofs of their imbecility.—There is, too, something of a commercial nature appertaining to Piedmont, which has, we believe, greatly assisted in inducing the sages of Downing-street to shift the pretext for their hostile purposes from Switzerland to the former country. The Norwich wiseacres, the constituents of patriot Smith, the lovers of "peace and a large loaf," have discovered, that the peace, which they so yearned after, and which they embraced with such ecstasy, has produced very little increase in the size of their loaf, while it threatens a great diminution of it, at no very distant epoch, by the total destruction of their communication with Italy, and particularly with Piedmont, which furnished the most valuable part of their trade. Could the effects be confined exclusively to them; could they suffer without any danger to our country in general, and to his Majesty's throne in particular, how sincerely should we rejoice at the grasping and unchecked ambition of Buonaparté! "And why?" say the men of candour; "what good does it do to re-mind the world of the language and conduct of those who rejoiced at the peace?"—What good! what good! What good does it do, then, to proclaim, to record, or to punish, any folly or any crime? Why cashier the coward? why crop the perjurer? why hang the thief? "Aye, but the peace is made, and it cannot be unmade." So is the theft committed, and it cannot be uncommitted.—The fact is, all the well-meaning, quiet, mighty good sort of men, who wish the folly and the turpitude of the peace to be forgotten, have themselves to answer for some degree of that folly or that turpitude, and they disapprove of our censure, for reasons precisely similar to those, which induced the mob of Burdett to clamour against the Bastille.

It is now discovered that we must sink without continental connexions; but where is the power who will venture to connect itself with the makers of the peace of Amiens? with those men, who, as far as depended on them, rivetted the chains of the conti-ment? With those very men, whose pharisaical supporters have publicly declared them to be "too honest" to have any connexions with the continental powers? With the men, the "too honest men," who received Ceylon and Trinidad from the hands of Buonaparté, and who sent the Stadholder to seek, (for sacrifices made to us), an indemnity in the plunder of our German allies? Where is the power who will deign to connect itself with a nation governed by ministers like these?—Let it not be imagined, however, that we are ever anxious about a mere change of ministry. We have certainly no private end which would be answered by such a change; and, as to the public, it would derive very little, if any, benefit from a change of men, unaccompanied by a radical change, not only of measures, but of notions and of principles. We must have war with the Republic of France, or we must become a province, a military division (le 28^e division militaire), of France; but, if that war is to be conducted upon the same principles, or rather the same no-principles, that the last war was, we, for our parts, think it a matter of perfect indifference who are the men: the "respectable" sire of the Clerk of the Pells, or even the Clerk of the Pells himself, on whom the simpletons of Reading have just bestowed the honorary title of Captain of Volunteers, would lead us under the yoke as well as any body else.

The affairs at the Diet of Ratisbon have assumed an aspect somewhat new; but, as will be seen by a reference to the official papers (p. 522,) and to abridgement of the supplementary plan of indemnities (p. 528), which, however, we do not give positively as authentic, nothing decisive has yet been done. One article of news from Ratisbon, if it be true, is of great importance; that is, that the Elector of Hanover has objected to the supplementary plan.

We wish for some good from the change of ministry at St. Petersburg; but, we want the evidence of some act to give us any reliance on aid to be expected from that court. M. Markhoff is still at Paris; and the last note given into the Diet at Ratisbon, must have been approved of by the new ministry. These circumstances, particularly the latter, leave little foundation for hope from that quarter. It is possible, that the Emperor of Russia may yet be withdrawn from the politics of France; but we do not think it very likely at present; and, unless it be done soon, it will be very difficult to do it at all.

The Mediterranean is now the interesting scene. Buonaparté certainly has an intention to make some bold push in that quarter; and we should not wonder to hear, by-and-by, that his fleet has sailed from Toulon, while he, by the tour which he is about to make, fixes our attention on the sea-ports of the channel. The Mediterranean is open to him. Minorca and Elba are in his hands; our force in Egypt is reduced to a mere nothing; a few days fortunate sailing will again put his army in possession of Egypt, and that country, once re-possessed, will never again be evacuated, though another Lord Hawkesbury should obtain another stipulation to that effect. The re-occupation of Egypt by the French would be a just judgment upon this country, the people of which illuminated their houses for the treaty, by which their ministers most shamefully affected to obtain the evacuation, at the very moment when they knew that the enemy had capitulated, and who expressed no sign of joy, or of praise, when that capitulation was officially announced! A more striking instance of baseness and ingratitude was, perhaps, never exhibited by any nation in the world. When they regarded the evacuation as a boon granted by France, they were frantic with delight, they hugged the bearer of the tidings, they became his cattle, his beasts of burden, they licked the hem of his jacobin garment; but, when, a few days afterwards, they found that this same good had been obtained by the valour, the perseverance, the almost unheard of hardships, of His Majesty's army, the base wretches seemed to sicken at the sound; not a single shout of approbation, not a candle was lighted, on this account, in the whole kingdom of Great-Britain, except at the office of the Porcupine news-paper! Such a nation cannot stand! The example, the scandalous example, was, in both these instances, set by His Majesty's ministers; who, to celebrate their own disgraceful peace, expended thousands upon thousands of the public money, but, for the glorious campaign, by which Egypt was re-conquered, not a single penny! Of all the acts of an administration which has led us from disgrace to disgrace, this, in our opinion, was the most shameful.—It will take a great deal to wash us from these stains.

READING BALL ON THE PEACE.

Naturally desiring to make our connexions as extensive as possible, for the sake of intelligence, we are happy that the article, which we copied from the Morning Post, relative to Mr. Addington's ball at Reading, has procured us a new correspondent, and we hope for a continuation of his favours. Mr. Tietenser will permit us just to hint, that he seems to have taken up the matter a little too seriously, though his anger is highly honourable to his feelings of friendship. Upon one point we cannot forbear expressing the very great satisfaction which we have received from the following letter. It would have been an unpardonable mockery and profanation, a cant of hypocrisy no less foolish than impious, had Mr. Addington in the most distant manner, represented the treaty of Amiens as a blessing from Divine Providence, at the very moment, when he was on the point of declaring, that, after an experiment of less than six months, he himself finds that treaty to be incompatible with our safety and independence; and instead of a blessing, to be one of those visitations of divine wrath, by which the destruction of a fated people is sometimes prepared, through the instrumentality of the weakest and most contemptible creatures among them.

Reading, Nov. 2, 1802.

Sir,—As an inhabitant of Reading, and a friend of the minister, whose “respectability” has been repeatedly testified even by you, certainly not one of his greatest admirers, I call upon your justice to allow me a corner of your next number, in consequence of a letter in your last, which you professed to have copied from the Morning Post.

The conduct of that newspaper, Sir, with regard to Mr. Addington, has been particularly unjustifiable. It has been marked by that kind of unfair license which the pretended “Lover of Truth and Decorum,” with so much reason, whether he meant it or not, has censured and condemned. Not once or twice only, but almost perpetually, it has been made “the vehicle of grave and “circumstantial misrepresentations.” What a strange liberty was taken, not only with the name of that gentleman, but with that of a whole fraternity of worshipful men, no longer ago than last Michaelmas day. Did not that editor, for two or three days together, fill half his columns with notices and paragraphs about a goose feast at Apothecaries’ Hall, in honour of Mr. Addington and the peace? And when this was formally contradicted, in a paper dated from the hall itself, had he not the impudence, in opposition to this grave authority, to forge a contradiction to that contradiction, and sign it with a long string of fictitious stewards? Of a piece with this, was another silly attempt, which was made about the same time, from the same quarter, to impose on the credulity of the public. When the state of Europe required all the attention and vigilance of our cabinet, and every body knew that they were constantly meeting; when Mr. Addington’s assistance was indispensably necessary to his worthy colleague Lord Hawkesbury, in settling the commercial arrangements that were to secure our navigation and trade from the insidious machinations of our rivals on the other side of the water; when, I will take upon me to say, Sir, that no minister, the most careless of his duty, much less such a minister as Mr. Addington, could have stirred from Downing Street even to Richmond Park, a ridiculous story was malignantly told, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, forsooth, was amusing himself with playing the part of the lowest Custom-house officer, chasing Kentish smugglers, and seizing moonshine, mundungus, and smouch. To be sure there was much affected praise of his generosity in giving up his proportion of the good things which thus fell to him, but this I have not the smallest doubt was meant as a sly allusion to the Clerkship of the Pells, which he so prudently secured for our present young captain. Well then, could you have supposed it? After all this unwarrantable indulgence of fancy, a plain, literal, harmless fact, which was witnessed by hundreds, is to be called into question. How can the reader of that prostituted journal know, in future, what to believe, or disbelieve? For my part I can hardly credit that it has so extensive a sale as it boasts!

Suffer me now, Sir, to consider a little the mock arguments that are produced against the reality of our late ball. It is represented, truly, as a gross blunder to pay the people the compliment of being the authors of the peace "just at the moment" when they are beginning to be heartily "ashamed of it." A pretty sort of blunder indeed! On the contrary, if it be true, that the people really are beginning to be ashamed of the peace, I cannot conceive any finer stroke of policy, than for Mr. Addington, at that very moment, to persuade them, if he can, that it is not his shameful work, but their own. As to the coarse sarcasm levelled at the "vigour of the present government" I shall only say, that I trust no man of common sense will value it three skips of a "flea." Mr. Addington's speech, however, is said to have been a repetition of an old House of Commons address. Perhaps it may, Sir: it sounded, I confess, to my thinking like something I had read. Did the writer imagine then, that we are such country bumpkins at Reading, as to be ignorant that what is called an address of the House of Commons is the language of the minister himself? And pray what language should a man use but his own? Ay! but truly it was bad taste to talk on such a subject to "an audience of dancing" "misses and negus-swiggling fiddlers." As if, truly, the young ladies whom this anonymous assassin (I wish they had him within the reach of their nails) so flippantly calls "dancing misses," had nothing to do with the subject. War, Sir, almost to a proverb, makes husbands scarce; and surely the ladies of Reading, like all others, may be allowed to feel a little interest in a peace. The other part of the audience, to which an objection is captiously made, are necessary persons at a ball, and if they swigg negus only, they are likely to keep themselves sober, which is not the case with the noisy, riotous crew, hiccupping out pricked port and brandied sherry at the Shakespeare Tavern; to whom certain parliamentary seceders are in the habit of addressing those harangues, that for ten years together, have been so ostentatiously detailed in the Morning Post.

You expressed a desire, Sir, to ascertain the fact respecting our ball. It was simply this. The Doctor (I mean the father of my friend Mr. Addington) had a great number of patients, of a certain description, as is well known, in this neighbourhood; and no doctor ever sent out more cured, whatever malicious people may say. Some of these, wishing to show their gratitude, first started the idea of paying a compliment to his son, on the occasion of the preliminaries of peace. The ratification, however, not coming as was expected, the moon, which governs all these meetings with us in the country, was a little too much in the wane for that month. Parliament met, and the definitive treaty hung on hand till the season for balls was past. At the commencement of the present season, the persons who had first set it on foot, thinking it better late than never, resolved to pay the compliment to Mr. Addington, at a time when he was perfectly at leisure to be present. This, Sir, is the plain unadorned tale. The account which has been given, I can seriously assure you, is substantially true: only I must correct one trifling error. Mr. Addington is too good and religious to have so lightly taken the name of God in vain. With his known candour, he said that he was an humble instrument, not in the hands of Divine Providence, but of Mr. Pitt's prudence. The origin of the mistake is a little ludicrous.

I hope I have not been too harsh in my comments upon the pretended Lover of Truth and Decorum. His letter is dated from this place. It is unpleasant to mention names, where there is not positive proof; yet I cannot help hinting that there is, not a hundred miles from this place, a certain unpopular character, commonly distinguished all over this country by the name of Massacre; and we are very well informed here what visitors were at his house at the time. For my own part I shall not conceal myself under a feigned signature. My name and family have been long publicly known in this place. I am, Sir, your obedient humble Servant,

J. Tictenser.

TO THE EDITOR.

Amsterdam, 26th Oct. 1802.

SIR,—About 14 months ago, I was informed by a friend at Paris, that the British Ministry were upon the eve of concluding a peace with the French Consulate. Alarmed at the terms, I wrote, on the 1st day of September 1801, a letter, wherein I sketched out the then visible consequences that were inevitably to ensue—the said letter was inserted in the Times of the 23d September, under the title, "Reflections on a Peace with France." If you will, Sir, take the trouble to read it over, you will, I presume, allow, that I had some knowledge of the characters with whom your ministers were negotiating; and you will then perhaps excuse the liberty I take in addressing to you the few following remarks upon the present state of affairs.*

MR. EDITOR,—For this some time past, particularly since the armed insurrection in Switzerland, we have been amused with the grumbling, shouting, and howling of John Bull; all the late cordial confidence in the Prime Consul, seems to have rusted into distrust and jealousy; that pacific republic, which, but the other day, was held out by the British Ministry in the midst of a deluded Parliament, as on its knees before the altar of Jesus Christ soliciting reconciliation with God and man, is now, in all your public papers, represented in its natural Jacobin attitude. Pray, Sir, by what supernatural power has this wonderful change in the construction of John's eyes been brought about? We dare swear, that, from the innermost recesses of Buonaparté's soul, to the public demeanour of his meanest subject, there is not a hair-breadth of change, neither in the religion, morality, nor in the politics of France, since the 26th Oct. 1792, to this 26th Oct. 1802. In 1792, the creed of every Frenchman in France, was, "que les rois sont dans l'ordre moral, ce que sont les monstres dans l'ordre physique." The Jacobin Club canonized Ankerström for having delivered the world of one; and decreed, that the Divinité was the author of the droit de l'homme, by which code all kings should be extirpated. The first position is, Sir, the creed of nineteen twentieths of the people of France at this moment; and Buonaparté has assumed to himself the honour allowed to the Divinité in the third.

To see in all your London papers long chapters upon the terrors of Buonaparté, upon the opposition of the French to his measures, upon the bravery and patriotism of a deluded rabble in Switzerland, and upon the present military spirit of Austria,

* Before we received this intimation, our attention had been directed to the Letter in the Times, and, from its language and sentiments, we at once concluded, that it was written by our valuable correspondent "SWENSKA," through whose means we were enabled to communicate to the public the projected new division of Germany, ten days before the ministers themselves were acquainted with it. (See p. 129.) The same correspondent obliged us with another letter (See p. 355.), which contained some excellent remarks.—His letter in the Times we shall re-publish in our next sheet.

sickens common sense! It is extremely distressing to see, that that deadly ignorance which pervades every country on the continent of Europe, should have overshadowed Great Britain also! Do, Sir, for the sake of your country, tell your men charged with its preservation—that no man was ever more master of his own household than Buonaparté is master of the French Republic. A parole d'ordre, will, at any moment, raise the nation in a mass; and march them to murder Swiss, Germans, Turks, Russians, or even their friend Mr. Addington, without a grumble; nor will officer, soldier, peasant, or mechanic, ever ask or care where they are going nor with whom they are to fight. Instead of being satiated with revolution and war, both are become necessary aliments to that ferocious community. The Swiss rabble do not merit the sympathy of their neighbours, nor if they did, could any power or powers save them, if the Consul has a mind to subdue their country. Austria is no longer a military power; that country has neither government, money, nor bread: the Austrians and Hungarians must either turn out and new-model their present ministry, or that ministry will deliver them into foreign subjection.

What we have here stated, are real and bona fide facts: and if Lord Hawkesbury has different information, he is imposed upon. His lordship's diplomatic agents abroad are, with few exceptions, poor insignificant gentry; their reports cannot be depended on—they have no means of obtaining information. In friendly countries, while there were countries friendly to Great Britain, your missions, for many years, especially during the revolution, have been generally filled with men who have given to us foreigners very ridiculous ideas of John Bull. We might refer you to many gentlemen on his lordship's diplomatic list, who could give the most unequivocal testimony, that, had there not been a premeditated plan to insult the several sovereigns of Europe, and to hold up John Bull as a most indecent animal to the derision of foreigners, they had never been sent out of their country.* Ignorance,

* These remarks, though severe, are but too well founded. What are, with some very few exceptions, our present, or, indeed, generally, our late diplomatic corps? Are they like the diplomatic corps of any other nation? The powers of Europe send great men as ambassadors; men fit to be ministers at home. America sends the leading members of her Congress; her chief justice, her governors of states; in fact, the greatest men in the country, instead of the least.—It was an even chance whether CHARLES BELOZ, Esq. was employed mean ostentation, immorality, and awkward espionage, are the leading characteristics of British modern diplomacy: they can give you no account of foreign states, for foreign statesmen cannot have any confidential intercourse with men whom common decency obliges them to despise. Your ministers at home, as well as their agents abroad, run after and cringe to men; they know nothing of real circumstances. If the Emperor change a laquais, or Madame Buonaparté take a new chamber-maid, all the roads of Europe are covered with British couriers, and a dozen of frigates are set off without provisions, to announce to the world the prevalence of the British party in all the cabinets of Europe! Poor old England! are you now come to that? Your existence depending upon the change of a Russian secretary! Mr. Editor, if you thought some of your little folks would not be angry, you might perhaps render a service to your countrymen, if you told them, that the political existence of the British Empire depends upon changes nearer home.

Mr. Editor, we foreigners consider the situation of Great-Britain, as she stands in relation to Europe and America, to be as follows:—At the commencement of the revolution Great-Britain stood high in the opinion of the world; all other powers looked up to His Britannic Majesty as universal umpire in all their disputes. Mr. Pitt's armed mediation in the Russian, Swedish, and Turkish quarrel, being thwarted by that Westminster patriot, Mr. Fox, (which produced the final partition of Poland, to the eternal reprobation of that political demagogue), diminished for a moment the reputation of the British Government. Their interference against the French, and their paltry mercantile quarrels with the Neutral States, rendered the British Ministry unpopular on the Continent, until the French Revolution assumed its hideous attitude; then the terrified world turned towards the British standard and looked to Mr. Pitt. America, at one time, only waited his orders to declare against France,* by which St. Domin-in breaking my windows, or in representing His Majesty at some foreign court! The means and motives, which lead to the admission of the far greater part of the members of our diplomatic corps, would form a most curious and diverting collection of anecdotes in low life.—EDITOR.

* For the truth of this fact the Editor can vouch; and the neglect of such an opportunity was amongst the great blunders of the war.—The co-operation of America offered, perhaps, no harvest for Mr. Dundas's labourers.

go would have been for ever secured to England, without Mr. Dundas's twenty millions of money, and without the ten thousand men, who so ingloriously perished under the medicaments of General Maitland's surgeons.—The lesser Northern States of Europe solicited, begged, and prayed to be taken under your protection—the demands of Prussia were rational, fair, and necessary; those of Russia, such as every person who knows any thing of such matters knew that you could not oppose. It was therefore, the duty of a British Minister to have co-operated with those powers, against the common enemy of all legitimate government. You had the trade of the world in your hands, and all the European settlements abroad under your guns; you might have distributed them as best suited your interests; and you could have guaranteed your distribution, by keeping a sufficiency to maintain your navy: you had Malta, it was an effectual barrier between France and Russia; you had the Cape and Surinam which secured to you Hindostan and Brazil. And what could France have done? burst her bowels by the venom her stomach could not otherwise have vented. So you stood, Sir, at the head of the civilized world, every government in it, ready to receive any rational proposition from the Court of England.—How do you stand now, Mr. Editor?—A deserted insulated nation; in the opinion of every reflecting man—doomed to inevitable destruction, and pitied by nobody. The outworks of your country in the hands of your mortal enemies, and your colonies under the guns of those works. Requiring an annual income of more than 30 millions, and depending on the trade of those very colonies for that sum; requiring an annual supply of several millions of foreign corn, and your enemies holding the keys to all the granaries. The necessities of life at a price which must sooner or later prevent entirely the exportation of your manufactures; and your public credit depending upon the uniform in which the sharp sighted Mr. Merry may chance to see one of Buonaparté's household servants. And the British ministry will pretend to interfere in the affairs of Switzerland, or of any other country!! Do, for heaven's sake, Sir, advise them to be quiet and civil. By the genius of Buonaparté, and by the contempt which Europe and America bears for Great-Britain, conjure them to be quiet.—Where, in the name of common sense, has the peace left you a point of attack? Are Buonaparté's settlements to be surprized as those of the King of France and States-General were? And are not every one of your foreign possessions at his discretion, in spite of all the powers you can muster? You say the army of St. Domingo are all dead. They were very obliging to conquer that great country before they got sick. Mr. Merry found in Buonaparté's intercepted letters, that the army of Egypt was eaten entirely up by the monsters of the Nile; and upon that able translator's authority, Mr. Canning proclaimed the glad tidings in the House of Commons. Perhaps the ambassador may have written to Lord Hawkesbury (for he writes plenty) that now is the time to recover St. Domingo*. But, say you, Austria will join us; and Alexander will open his eyes! Sir, Austria being governed by men something like your own, that court is capable of any folly, and of more than mere folly; as to Alexander's eyes, it is better you would take care of the objects on which they are fixed than confide in their being shut.

Mr. Editor, if you will preserve old England, 1st. Put English blood, old English honesty, candour, and courage, at the head of affairs. 2d. Offer to Russia your co-operation in securing to her those possessions and commercial channels which she must have, and which she will take independent of you, and laugh at John if he grumbles. Make a fair and reasonable proposition to America. These two states secured, not by your gold nor contemptible intrigues, but, by national interests, you may still secure the British empire, and confine France within certain given bounds. But by no other means nor combination of powers will you be able to resist the universal coalition which France and Russia are arming against your dominions.

Pray, Mr. Editor, give us Hollanders your opinion candidly on one question, to wit: If the terms of the treaty of Amiens had been laid before the British Parliament and British public, before they were accepted and sanctioned by his Majesty's Ministers, do you think that any one member of that Parliament or public would have advised his Majesty to accept them? When we hear your opinion we shall be better able to judge of your fate.

Swenska.

* Had Gen. Abercromby come home he would have told another story—and so will perhaps the Governor of Jamaica, when Buonaparté thinks proper to send him over.

Remarks on the Article in the Moniteur (see p. 565), extracted from the Morning Chronicle of the 2d instant.

The official Journal of the 29th contains an article the most extraordinary which we ever read under any shape even of warlike manifesto. The formalities of dispatching an ambassador to our court, to maintain a peace so lately concluded appear to have inspired an effusion of malignity against the British nation, in which the whole fury and frenzy of the revolution have been reduced into a quintessence, intended as it were as the final instructions and vade mecum of the representative of his Consular Majesty. The rage and hostility which, according to the rules of diplomacy, should have been laid up in instructions secretissimes are here divulged in the official Journal. If General Androssi has any instructions to do his utmost to maintain the peace, they must have been communicated in the private audience with his sovereign!

This document, we are strongly inclined to think, is from the pen of Citizen Haute-rive, a person high in the office of foreign affairs. It is an abridgement of a pamphlet he published two years ago. It is impossible to imagine more falsehood, more contempt of truth, perversion of history, more national animosity, more absurdity, more contradiction condensed in a column and a half than this paper exhibits. It is written in a stile that seems most happily calculated to rouse the generous indignation of the people of England. If there be a man among us who could have entertained a doubt of the profound hatred which Buonaparté's government bears to the English nation;—if there be a man among us who could for a moment hear with complacency, who could for a moment be deceived by the insidious cant of friendship which has sometimes marked the levee language of Buonaparté, he must now be disabused.

The Moniteur affects to direct his invectives against the English press, but disdaining such little game, he soon advances to the assault, not only of the English ministry, but of the English nation. It is not present or late malversations that are arraigned, but the system of England for a century is attacked as low and vulgar in itself and pernicious to Europe. From King William to Lord Chatham none is spared; and, with reason, the ardour of this writer's resentment is most inflamed against those who were most successful in stemming the torrent of French ambition, and preserving the liberties of Europe. The reproaches against the late ministry, are too just sarcasms on their wretched attempts to oppose the aggrandisement of France.

The main object of this compend of French policy towards England is, that with regard to past events, we never interfered in Europe but for its destruction; that at present we have no right to interfere at all. It states the shameful truth, that we have no allies on the Continent; and as the Elector of Hanover has adhered to the Franco-Russian plan of indemnities, it is asserted that we can have no right whatever to inquire in what manner the different powers on the Continent settle their marches, or, as Citizen Hauterive quaintly terms it, their interets limitrophes. "The relations of France and England are "the treaty of Amiens—the whole treaty "of Amiens—nothing but the treaty of "Amiens." So says Citizen Hauterive, and so says Buonaparté.

Whether it be true, as here asserted, that the English government "does not complain," of what passes in the countries, the French governments of which it has not recognised, we shall not pretend to determine. That we have a right to complain, we assert and will endeavour to shew. If ministers in the plenitude of their submission at Amiens, chose not to insist upon satisfaction as to the state of continental affairs, even they, far less the English nation, are not precluded from insisting that the French government in time of peace shall not continue to add province upon province, kingdom upon kingdom, republic upon republic, to the dominions of the republic. We ever thought these arrangements were of more importance, even to us, than a sugar or a spice island; and if the last war had been begun, or conducted on proper principles, might have been continued for such objects—prudence, upon a fair comparison of circumstances, recommending the policy. To have continued the war in the way it was conducted, would have been madness.

But surely the intervention of a treaty, regulating the immediate, separate, local, and personal interests of France and England, cannot be supposed to exclude us from the right which independently, and contrary to all treaties, we possess, of taking precautions for our own safety, against an enemy that unequivocally points at our ruin. Can it be necessary to shew that principles of self-preservation command us to interest ourselves on the Continent?

If France, aggrandizing herself at the expense of others, is only preparing to attack us with renewed force, are we bound by any separate arrangements to consent to our own destruction by acquiescing in that of our neighbours? There is a right founded in neighbourhood and common defence, which no treaty can take away, and by which all states are entitled to make common cause against common aggression.

"The western nation" (Buonaparté's anti-chamber cant is become diplomatic cant) is pacified! Pacified! as a man stunned by a blow is pacified! How comes it that General Buonaparté conceives himself entitled alone, "personally," as it were, to consult and to act for the interest of the great Western Family? Is England foras-familiated so completely, as to have nothing of common interest or tie of consanguinity? It surely is not because England forms an island (by the way the French, we suppose in compliment to Buonaparté, "personally," now, say nothing in disparagement of islanders) that she is cut off from any communion of interest with the Italians, the Germans, or the Swiss? Mark the consistency of Citizen Hauterive. Stuporem hominis vel dicam pecudis attendite. Russia has a right to interfere—Great-Britain has not; Russia is generous in her interference; but what interets limitrophes; what boundaries has she to settle with the French Republic? Has Russia more interest in assisting or opposing the views of France, in robbing the Emperor of Germany or preventing his being robbed, though placed at so vast a distance, than England, that is separated from France only by a ditch, as the Moniteur formally stiled the channel? Must Russia have more sympathy with the oppressed, more interest in protecting the weak, and overawing the proud, than we who see our own fate prepared in the ruin of our ancient allies? We have not recognized the Italian Republic, but are the inhabitants of so fine a portion of Italy to be quite indifferent to us, because we do not choose to recognize the extravagancies of the Consul President's desperate ambition? They are part of the Great Family, and what right has Buonaparté to rob them of their portion, their name, their character, their independence? What right has he (in defiance of the treaty of Lunéville) to interfere with Helvetia, whose genuine national government he refuses to acknowledge? We do not recognize the King of Tuscany! It would have been infamous to have recognized him. We had relations with the Grand Duke of Tuscany; and when the Emperor agreed for his brother to cede Tuscany, it was for a compensation. But how has the indemnity been made good? Has not the Emperor complained of violated compact; and ought we to enter into relations with the puny, illegitimate sovereign of Buonaparté's creation, while he usurps the inheritance of the lawful sovereign with whom we had relations? Must we recognize, as France, every thing which France seizes by fraud or violence? Are we not, by our ancient relations with the King of Sardinia, entitled to ask, by what right France has robbed him of Piedmont? Did Great-Britain never interfere in the affairs of the Continent but when she had a direct territorial right? In truth, we fear that our interest in Hanover (which by the way is not necessarily an English interest) has, on some occasions, from a timid policy, led us to wave English rights and English interests. It has created a pernicious dependence, instead of inspiring a liberal interest, and we suspect had no very favourable influence on the terms of the treaty of Amiens. What direct interest had we in the war of the succession? Did Europe then think our interference degrading? Did the Emperor of Germany feel our aid destructive, when an English army saved his crown in the glorious battle of Blenheim? Although our relations with France may be narrowed by the abrogation of treaties, treaties which give us common interests with continental powers remain, and what is more, common interest, the only solid basis of treaties and of equal authority, with them remain. Guided by these we are still called upon to resist the continental aggressions of France. Destitute of allies now, the wrongs which France daily commits will be the inducements of new alliances, not giving a right, but declaring a resolution to withstand the destructive ambition of a foe, now so undisguised. If circumstances should be favourable, should powerful, determined allies seek our assistance, it would become a question of prudence whether we should join their cause, but the right could never be disputed.

Buonaparté has declared aloud the principles on which he condescends to hold relations with us. The Treaty of Amiens is the only code. Out of that record we must not travel. We must tamely view all his invasions of independent states—see him mature his schemes of aggrandisement. He has imposed sufficient barriers to our interference in fact, but it is too much to insist upon so universal an abandonment of our common right in the concerns of the Great Western Nation.—How far and where ministers remonstrate against the First Consul's proceedings, we cannot tell; but we are sure that no honest minister of England will ever so far degrade his country as to acknowledge the now-advanced pretensions. Circumstances may lead us to overlook what we cannot prevent—but if we basely look on with indifference on the ruin of independent nations, our own merited ruin cannot be distant.

But it is not the late ministers only that fall under the lash of Citizen Hauteville. The "respectable Mr. Addington," the present "prudent administration," does not escape. The maritime code of this country is again arraigned; our maxims which, right or wrong, are certainly very old, are said to be unheard of, and the battle of Copenhagen, which took place under Mr. Addington's auspices, is called a massacre! We know not by what rule of judgment that battle is tried and pronounced a massacre. It certainly bore no resemblance to the massacre of the Swiss in 1798. That was, indeed, a massacre. It was unprovoked; it was murder perpetrated for the purposes of robbery.—France wanted to seize the treasures of Berne, which were actually employed to pay the expenses of the expedition to Egypt. Buonaparté, indeed, should know the difference between a battle and massacre!

It is asserted that France and Russia will maintain the peace of the Continent. We hope, however, that Russia will endeavour to maintain peace, not by yielding every thing to France, but by keeping her within bounds. The policy of the present ministry of that country is not sufficiently developed, but surely this is the true policy of their country. France, and Russia too, it is said, will be able to counteract the efforts of the restless spirits to whom the policy of the newspapers is ascribed, should the influence of their libels produce the removal of our present prudent ministry!—Here is a pretty open threat against any attempt to change the ministry. We congratulate the respectable Mr. Addington on his powerful protector! We see very well Buonaparté's ideas of the men who would confine our policy to our own island, and would never interfere with his grand continental schemes—men who would look to the Treaty of Amiens, nothing but the Treaty of Amiens!

PUBLIC PAPERS.

Treaty between the French Republic, Prussia, and Bavaria.

The First Consul of the French Republic and His Majesty the Emperor of Russia, having offered their mediation for the arrangement of the affairs of Germany, and having made known to the Imperial Diet, by their declaration of the 18th August, 1802, the indemnities which they thought should be adjudged to each Prince in consequence of the 7th article of the Treaty of Luneville; His Majesty the King of Prussia hastened to conform to the plan presented, and in taking possession of the states adjudged to him, confined himself scrupulously within the limits assigned in the declaration. His Majesty the Emperor of Germany having on his side announced the intention of causing its different possessions to be occupied, His Majesty the King of Prussia, the First Consul, and the Emperor of Russia, have spontaneously hastened to make known to him, that it was not at all becoming that his troops should pass the limits assigned by the declaration, or that they should occupy any territory but that appointed for the indemnification of the Archduke Ferdinand.

Yet, without regard either to this declaration made collectively at Paris to the Imperial Ambassador by the minister of the three powers, nor to that which has been made at Berlin by the Count de Haugwitz to M. de Stadion, the Austrian troops have taken possession of Passau, and His Imperial Majesty has informed the Diet by his Plenipotentiary, that he would not withdraw his troops, unless the countries occupied by the other Princes were in like manner evacuated, which is an indication that His Imperial Majesty sets no value on the declaration of the mediating powers, and that he regards it as void.

In consequence, His Majesty the King of Prussia, and the First Consul of the French Republic, engage themselves to reiterate in concert at Ratisbon and Vienna, their efforts, to cause the plan presented to be adopted by the Germanic Body, and to be ratified in its whole extent, but particularly so far as it guarantees to the Elector of Bavaria the preservation of his possessions on the right bank of the Inn, as far as it secures to him the town of Passau.

And if, contrary to their hopes, and their united interposition, His Majesty the Emperor, taking advantage of the possession of Passau, should refuse to evacuate it within the period of sixty days appointed for the deliberation of the Imperial Diet, the governments of Prussia and France pledge themselves to combine their efforts with those of Bavaria, to secure to the latter the preservation of her ancient domains on the right of the Inn, as well as the possession of Passau, and the entire indemnity which has been adjudged to her.—Done at Paris, 18 Fructidor, year 10, Sept. 5, 1802.—(Signed) Talleyrand.—Marquis de Lucchesini.—Cetto.

Note addressed by the Imperial Plenipotentiary to the Deputation, informing them of his accession to the Conclusums of the 16th.

The Minister Plenipotentiary of his Imperial Majesty discovers, in the two conclusums that have been communicated to him on the part of the Deputation of the Empire, propositions well calculated to prepare the speedy and definitive arrangement of the objects reserved by the Treaty of Luneville for a particular convention. Always ready to contribute, on his part, with a sincere zeal to that speedy arrangement, he has in pursuance of these propositions, under a restriction, however, conformable, no doubt, to the intentions of the Deputation, respecting the administration of the objects assigned as indemnities to the Counts of the Empire, addressed without delay a letter, a copy of which is annexed, to the Duke of Wirtemberg and the Margrave of Baden; as likewise the two notes, copies of which are annexed, to the ministers of the Mediating Powers.

Ratisbon, 18th Oct. 1802. (Signed) Baron de Hugel.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Constantinople, Sept. 18.—The numerous troops disbanded by Paswan Oglou, have occasioned new disturbances by their depredations in Bulgaria. Paswan Oglou has been applied to by the Porte to extirpate them.—The Grand Signior has forbidden any speculations in money, under pain of corporal punishment, and has fixed the Dutch ducats of 7½ piasters again at six, and the Austrian of 6, at 5, as before the war.—The plague has now ceased throughout the Turkish Empire.—The French chargé d'affaires, Citizen Ruffin, in a particular audience, has notified to the Grand Signior the appointment of Buonaparte to be Consul for life; and has received magnificent presents for himself, his lady, and his interpreter, Franchini.—Lord Elgin has arrived here from the Grecian islands, to which he lately made a voyage.

Vienna, Oct. 16.—The Emperor has prohibited M. De Cobentzel, Vice-Chancellor, from receiving letters addressed to him by the chiefs of the armed assemblies of Berne. His Imperial Majesty has manifested a desire that tranquillity should be promptly re-established in Switzerland, and shews a full confidence in the part taken by the First Consul, to restore repose to that unfortunate nation, to place it in a way of enjoying its independence, and resuming, at length, its rank, amongst the powers of Europe.—[We doubt this.]

Strasburgh, Oct. 18.—An attempt was made in the night between the 16th and 17th inst. to introduce into the French territory near Argolsheim, more than 100 bales of muslin, reputed English. The officers of the customs were on their guard, and a violent combat ensued, in which a lieutenant of the customs was killed, and two persons employed under him dangerously wounded: the smugglers lost, on their side, a chasseur. The conductors, however, having lost their way, the goods were afterwards seized and the persons who were with them arrested.

Copenhagen, Oct. 19.—The re-establishment of a good understanding between Denmark and the Regency of Tripoli has been purchased, it is said, for a much less price than was formerly paid in similar circumstances. The negotiations, even after the arrival of the Danish squadron before Tripoli, lasted eight days, and were only brought to a happy conclusion by the commandant, Kocsod, making serious dispositions to attack the town.—The peace has been signed for six years.

Berne, Oct. 20.—Berne has deputed to the Consulta of Paris, M. M. de Muliær, De Watteville, Delanshut, Tchaning, of Ramlinguen, and Col.

Hanerwadel, of Leitzbourg. They will not repair to their destination but in company with the deputies from the other Cantons. General Bachmann, and the superior officers of the Confederate Army, are all gone from Berne, but it is proper to state that, that army entirely emptied the arsenal of Berne; there remain only some pieces of large calibre which could not be carried away.—The confederates, though they seemed to disband themselves, are still under arms—the Diet of Schwitz also continues its sittings.—It is said there is to be a congress at Neuchâtel at the end of this month, on the subject of the affairs of Switzerland, and that it is to be attended by the French, Imperial, and Prussian Envoys.

Milan, Oct. 20.—We have received from Lugano the news, that on the arrival in that city, of the officer sent by General Charpentier, chief of the état-major of the troops of the Italian Republic, to inform the Provisional Government of that Canton, of the dispositions of the First Consul, and the vice-president of the Italian Republic which were in conformity with them, the Government immediately acceded to them, and re-established the former authorities. All the armed force was dissolved.

Havre, Oct. 21.—The approaching arrival of the First Consul, announced here, spreads confidence and hope; it is not doubted that he will be struck with the utility of the works commenced, and of the necessity of completing them speedily. We are assured that the First Consul will make a tour of the whole coast.

Hague, Oct. 22.—Private letters from Petersburg, of the 2d inst. state, that the ministers of France and England, residing in that capital, had presented notes in the names of their respective governments to His Imperial Majesty, in order to engage him to charge himself with the guarantee of Malta, under the Treaty of Amiens.

Ratisbon, Oct. 22.—The extraordinary Deputation of the Empire held yesterday its 18th sitting, and definitively adopted, by a conclusion, the general plan of indemnities.—Baron d'Ompèda, the Electoral Minister of Brunswick, received at the same time the official news that the Court of London had made arrangements with the French Government, relative to the stipulations of the plan in favour of the Imperial towns of Eremen and Ham-burgh.

Ligurian Republic.—Genoa.—Extracts from the Registers of the Senate. Sitting of Aug. 23, 1802.

The Senate of the Ligurian Republic, considering that it is conformable to the ancient institutions of the republic, to consecrate the images of great men who have rendered it illustrious:—Considering that Christopher Columbus discovered the new world, and that Napoleone Buonaparté has pacified the old, and by the labours of his Consulta, extended the limits of Liguria, secured its most important interests, and re-organized its laws, has decreed unanimously that there shall be erected in the vestibule of the national palace, two marble statues, the first representing Buonaparté, the second, Columbus.—(Signed)—Durazzo.—Lawzola, Sec. Gen.

Berne, Oct. 25.—Sixteen hundred men, of the 16th demi-brigade, have occupied the city of Basle. The arrival of the French troops has strangely disconcerted the agitators, who a short time before had positively asserted that they would not enter Switzerland. The government has certain information that in the Cantons of Argovie and Se-leure the people are yet labouring in a counter-revolutionary scheme, and however burdensome the presence of the French troops may be to our country, we cannot dissemble, that without them, we should be still a prey to insurrection and anarchy.—General Ney attended this morning the sitting of the Senate: he manifested the most favourable sentiments to the Helvetic Government, and assured them that he would give them every support in his power to re-establish public tranquillity. The Senate have agreed to the decree which follows. The nomination of the deputies also took place this morning. The choice fell upon the Citizens Ruttiman, Pidou, and Muller-Fried-burg, a choice which must be applauded by every wise man.—In the Canton of Zurich, the system of persecution against the patriots, is carried on with the greatest rigour. Citizen Rapp set out yesterday for Basle, whence he will go to Zurich, where he will probably be preceded by some French battalions.—We are assured, that two battalions stationed in the Frickthal, have entered the Canton of Argovie, and that they are directing their march towards Zurich, of which place they are to form the garrison. We may then expect the cessation of those arrests which now daily take place. Citizen Xavier Bronner, the author of some esteemed works, has been lately arrested, and exposed to the insults of the triumphant party. Having proved, that for more than a year, he had taken no part in political discussions, he was liberated, but he has been exiled for ever from the Canton of Zurich.

Decree of the Senate.—Having heard the message of the Executive Council, and also the report of the Interior Committee, considering that by virtue of the proclamation of the First Consul of the French Republic, each Canton may send deputies to Paris to explain their sentiments, upon the means most likely to restore order and tranquillity, and to re-unite all parties; and considering also, that this measure should be regularly executed, in order that the regularity of forms may coincide with their power of delivering their opinions freely, orders,—1st. That the national prefects of the Eighteen Cantons shall convoke, during the first week of November ensuing, on a given day, a meeting of all the members of the Diets of the Cantons of the first of August 1801; and of those who were members of the Cantons on the 2d of April 1802,—2d. These citizens, so united, shall determine whether their respective Cantons ought to send deputies to Paris, in their name, at their expense, and under these circumstances.—They will determine the number that are to be sent, and will make the nominations.—3d. The Senate does not by this measure deprive the Communes of the right of sending deputies, at their own expense, to express their sentiments.—4th. Every person named shall receive from the assembly the act of his nomination, which shall be legalized by the national prefect, and by the secretary of state for foreign affairs.—5th. The deputies shall assemble at Paris, on the 15th of November next. The further regulations which may be necessary for carrying into effect the present decree, are left to the Executive Council.—25th Oct. 1802.—(Signed)—The Landammann President of the Senate.—Dolder Laucher, and Muller-Friedburg, secretaries, Rouen, Oct. 25.—The prefect of the department of the Lower Seine, has published to-day the fol-bing proclamation, which overwhelms with joy the inhabitants of Rouen, who are no longer in doubt of the First Consul's arrival:—Citizens, the First Consul is to arrive in two days among you. It is to him that you are indebted for victory, for peace, for the return of morality, order, and law; it is he, whose activity, equally indefatigable in peace as in war, aspires only to follow one labour with another; who devotes every moment of his life to your prosperity. He has done more than found the empire; he has drawn it from its ruins to raise it with a firm hand to the first rank among powers; and at his voice we have seen burst from those very ruins the sources of a prosperity hitherto unknown.—The name of the hero fills the world. Foreigners hasten to contemplate him from the ends of the earth. Every where, within, without, his words have been received as the oracles of wisdom, he is become the common arbiter of people and kings.—How happy and proud ought you to be to possess him. He comes to enquire your wants and your resources; to revive agriculture, commerce, and those useful arts for which you were formerly renowned.—His journey is a benefit, his presence a treasure; he will cast over this department that eagle eye which embraces the whole of objects, and penetrates at once all the features of them. He will discover for your posterity what would have escaped the rest of mankind.—Enjoy, then this blessing, which so many other departments will envy you. Old men will one day repeat to their children that they saw Buonaparté. All his words will be remembered. Hence you are about to collect grand and touching recollections for futurity.—I have had too many occasions to know your enthusiasm to endeavour to awaken it. I do not prescribe to you any mode for the reception of the First Consul—and, in order that he may meet every where a reception worthy of him, I abandon you to the impulse of your own hearts.—At Rouen, in our Hotel, 24th October.—(Signed)—Beugnot.

Berne, Oct. 26.—The Diet of Schwitz has written a letter, dated the 11th instant, to General Rapp, to express to him their thanks for having listened to the representations of their deputies, Pfyffer and Freuler, who gave him a letter to the First Consul. The following is an extract of the note which Colonel Pfyffer wrote, on the demand of General Rapp, to whom he had given verbal assurances expressive of the sentiments of the Diet with respect to General Rapp.—“The Swiss Diet at Schwitz has charged me to make known to General Rapp, that they are assured the First Consul will abandon, after he receives the letter addressed to him, the fatal impression which has been attempted to be made upon his mind, with respect to the state of anarchy and faction in which he might believe that Switzerland is at present.—If the First Consul persists in fulfilling the verbal menaces which General Rapp has made in his name, of sending 40,000 men into Switzerland, I have the honour to acquaint the General, that we shall yield to force, and that no one thinks of contending with the power of the First Consul; but their remain in our possession, arms which he himself esteems— they are, the justice of our cause, the voice of the people and posterity.—Berne, Oct. 9, 1802, (Signed) Colonel Pfyffer, Member of the Council of state.”—In all places through which the Helvetic Government passed to return to Berne, military honours were paid them. Those which were paid them at Berne, were by order of General Rapp. The commandant of the place having refused to give orders for them, he was dismissed, and the command of the place given to Citizen Perrier.—The Diet of Schwitz sits in the open air, in the midst of a square battalion armed with lances, and the Morgenstermen. It has come to a great number of resolutions, which says a Berne journal, we cannot communicate to our readers, on account of the language used against the Helvetic Government.

Basle, Oct. 26.—The French troops which have entered Switzerland have not met with any resistance. All is tranquil in our city, where are at the present moment two French battalions, and the first Helvetic battalion of the line. There prevails, however, a great animosity between the latter, and the free corps of Basle, returned from the army of Bachman.—It appears that the numbers of French troops which have entered Switzerland on different points are not so considerable as was believed.—We are assured even that the different corps have received orders to return to their former garrisons. We know at least positively, that the 50th demi-brigade, which had arrived in the ci-devant Alsace, has received counter-orders, and that it will return, in consequence, to the environs of Mayence.

Paris, Oct. 27.—The Minister of the interior set off yesterday morning for Rouen and Havre.—(Moniteur).—The First Consul was to set off last night for Rouen, with Mademoiselle Buonaparté.—He will visit Havre, Dieppe, and Cherbourg. It is said that his journey will not last above ten days. The Minister of the interior, who set off yesterday, will wait for the First Consul at Rouen, and accompany him on the journey.—An English journal is about to be published in Paris, entitled The Argus; or London reviewed in Paris. The proprietors and editors of this journal, who have arrived from London, announce in their prospectus, that the “nature of their intelligence will enable them to give information respecting England, and anecdotes which the English writers have not hitherto touched upon in any of their journals.”—But the reason they give for their emigration is very remarkable:—“The progressive high price of paper, the enormous taxes imposed in England on all the objects relating to printing, and above all, the constraint placed upon the press at London, have determined them,” adds the prospectus, “to transport their establishment to France, and to publish their journal at Paris instead of London.”

Oct. 29.—The First Consul set out yesterday morning for Rouen, accompanied by Madame Buonaparté. The object of his journey, which will take up ten days, is to inspect the important manufactures of the department of the Lower Seine.

General Andreossi, Ambassador from the republic to his Britannic Majesty, had his audience of leave on the 27th instant.—Moniteur.

An Organic Senatus Consultum passed on the 3d instant, contains the following disposition:—Art. I. During five years, computing from the publication of the present Organic Senatus Consultum, such foreigners as shall render, or who may have rendered important services to the republic, who shall bring into the midst of it talents, inventions, or useful branches of industry, or who shall form large establishments may, after a year's residence, be admitted to enjoy the right of a French citizen. II. This right shall be confirmed by an Arrêté of the government, founded on the report of the minister of the interior, and adopted with the advice of the Council of State.—III. There shall be delivered to the applicant a certificate of the said arrêté, signed by the Grand Minister of Justice, and stamped with the seal of the republic.—IV. The applicant provided with this certificate shall appear before the municipality of his place of residence, to take his oath of fidelity to the government established by the constitution; his name shall be registered, and a minute drawn up of the administration of the oath.

By another arrêté of the 18th instant, the functions of jurymen are suspended during the present and succeeding year, in all the departments of Piedmont, with those of the Cotes-du-Nord, Morbihan, Vaucluse, the Mouths of the Rhone, the Var, and the Maritime Alps.

Extract from the Moniteur of the 29th Oct.—A part of the English journalists remain still a prey to discord; every line which they print is marked with blood. They endeavour, with loud cries, to excite civil war in the bosom of the Western Nation, happily restored to peace. All their reasoning, all their hypotheses turn on the two following points:—

1st. To invent grievances against France.

2d. To create to themselves allies with equal liberality, and thus to give their passions auxiliaries among the great nations of the Continent.

Their grievances at present chiefly are the affairs of Switzerland, the happy issue of which excites their jealous fury. It appears that it would have suited their passions much better, if that unhappy nation had been torn by civil war, and if the neighbouring powers, suffering themselves to be hurried away by the empire of circumstances, had again disturbed the harmony of the Continent.—The proclamation of Vendémiaire to*, (October 2), dissolved the knot of all these intrigues.

They appeal to the treaty of Luneville, which secures the existence of the Helvetic Republic, but it is to secure this existence, that the interference of France is indispensably necessary. Besides, of all the powers of Europe, the only one which has no right to appeal to the treaty of Luneville, is England, since it alone refused to acknowledge the Helvetic Republic. It also would not acknowledge the Italian Republic, the Ligurian Republic, and the King of Tuscany. We know that for a year past, notwithstanding the strongest remonstrances of the French government, it has persisted in the same refusal in regard to these states, and the continental arrangements stipulated by the treaty of Luneville. England has no diplomatic agents, either at Berne, Milan, Genoa, or Florence.

The English government does not complain, and indeed cannot complain of what takes place in countries, the political existence of which it does not acknowledge, and with which it maintains no public relations.

The affairs of Germany excite in a still livelier manner the jealousy of that faction of periodical writers—and the bold and generous conduct which has gained to Russia and France the thanks of all the countries, all the towns, and all the princes of Germany, is a subject of grievance to these instigators of trouble.

The King of England has acknowledged all the arrangements of Germany, he has adhered to them.—It is sufficient, on this subject, to read the vote of his minister at the Diet of Ratisbon. The British cabinet, therefore, satisfied with having seen all its interests taken into consideration, and consulted, makes no kind of complaint on this subject.

The English libellists state, that the feeling expressed by the King of England, as Elector of Hanover, is not that of the English nation. But what other title could an insular power have to interfere in the affairs of Germany; and to what abject state would Russia, Austria, Prussia, Sweden, Denmark, Bavaria, and the Houses of Wurtemberg, Baden, Hesse Cassel, and the French Republic, be reduced, if they could not negotiate, conclude, and arrange their interests as neighbours, (interets limitrophes) without the consent of a power which has as little to do with these interests as with our diplomatic law! A power which alone disowns the rights of independent nations on the seas.—The relations between France and England are the treaty of Amiens—the whole treaty of Amiens—nothing but the treaty of Amiens.—[La Relations de la France et de l'Angleterre, sont le traité d'Amiens—tout le traité d'Amiens—rien que le traité d'Amiens.]†

The allies which the party writers of London create to themselves, on the Continent, as well as their grievances, happily do not exist, but in their disordered imaginations, and in the passions of hatred and jealousy, by which they are tormented. They invoke, with all their wishes, the troops of Austria; they form and collect armies in the Tyrol, but Thugus is no more, and his Majesty the Emperor well knows, that if the power of Austria has been twice led to the brink of the precipice, it was because it twice abandoned itself to these perfidious instigations.

Far from sacrificing the blood of its subjects, which are so dear to it, the court of Vienna, immersed in debt by the payment which, with extreme good faith, it has made to England of the subsidies it received during the first three campaigns, is employed solely in lessening its expenses. Instead of repaying the money it expended for the cause of the English government, it might, with perfect justice, demand from that power 5 or 600 millions as an indemnity for the expenses of the war. Kaunitz said, in the middle of the last century, to a minister of the King of Prussia, who came to have an audience of leave, "The King your master will one day know what a burden the alliance of England is." And if Prussia saw its frontiers invaded, its capital plundered, without sinking in utter ruin, it was indebted for it to that prince of glorious memory, and to that army which will long be quoted as a model.

Do we not hear also these furious journalists in-

† There perhaps might be another meaning given to the clause "the whole of the treaty of Amiens." It might perhaps bear the sense that the relations of England and France are completely comprised in the treaty. Indeed we think that sense agrees best with the context.

voking the aid of the Russian armies? But have these Russian armies forgotten, that exposed and abandoned in the marshes of Holland, they were disowned in England; and in contempt of the rights of nations, they were not included in the exchange of prisoners. But will not the Russians, the Swedes, and Danes, long preserve the remembrance of those unheard-of pretensions which occasioned the massacres of Copenhagen?

It is beyond a doubt, and the Continent is fully convinced of it, that the first of benefits, the dearest of interests, is peace. It knows too well that a continental war would have no other effect than that of concentrating all the riches of commerce and all the colonies of the world in the hand of one nation.

Russia and France united by reciprocal esteem, by common interests, by a firm desire to maintain the peace of the Continent, will restrain, notwithstanding all their efforts, these restless spirits, whose turbulent policy inspires the English Gazettes, if the influence of their libels should be able to produce a change in the prudent ministry by which Great-Britain is governed.

Can any continental power be mentioned for a hundred years back, which having deviated from the principles of sound policy, did not justify the profound reflection of Kaunitz?

If the King of the Two Sicilies twice saw his territories invaded, and his capital in the power of the French; if the Elector of Bavaria twice saw the same scene renewed in his states; if the King of Sardinia has ceased to reign in Savoy and Piedmont; if the house of Orange has lost the Stadtholdership; if the Oligarchy of Berne and of Genoa has seen its influence vanish; and if Portugal has beheld its provinces covered with troops ready to conquer them, were they not all indebted for these misfortunes to the alliance of England?

The peace of Europe is firmly established, and certainly no cabinet wishes to disturb it; but if it should happen that individuals, enemies to mankind and to the tranquillity of the world, should be able to obtain any credit in the British cabinet, they would not succeed in preventing all the good that the two nations have a right to expect from their state of peace, and from their new relations.

In a word, the French people are not ignorant that a great mass of jealousy is excited, and that dissensions, either intestine or foreign, will for a long time be fomented against her. She therefore constantly remains in that attitude which the Athenians gave to Minerva—a helmet on her head, and her lance couched.—Nothing will ever be obtained from her by threats: fear has no power over the hearts of the brave!

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

By a reference to our Public Papers (see p. 559), it will be seen, that a treaty has been entered into by France, Prussia, and Bavaria, the object of which is, to compel the Emperor to accept of the terms of partition, dictated by the declaration of Russia and France, and by their "supplementary plan of indemnities." We think, the Emperor will submit, an opinion which is much strengthened by that of our correspondent Svenska (p. 550), who, though, perhaps, rather too peremptory, on certain points, has discovered great sagacity as to the political views and measures of the powers on the Continent. The cabinet of Vienna is badly constituted; it is made up of that sort of mind, which is influenced by little, paltry, selfish considerations; it is made up of Hawkesburys and Addingtons. A certain pompous theatrical tone marks all the negotiations of M. de Cobenzel; but, it is a hollow sound, which soon dies away, and leaves not the smallest effect upon the hearer. The Emperor, after making a shew of resistance; after preserving, for a while, the attitude of an Emperor of Germany, will yield to the insolent commands of his oppressors; a just punishment, perhaps, for having abandoned himself to the councils of weak and selfish men.

The people of this country, with that sort of wilful blindness which has marked all the nations that have, one after another, submitted to the yoke of France, affect to perceive something like "a compromise" between Buonaparté and the Swiss patriots. A compromise!!! Shame, shame on the inventors of the paltry subterfuge! The Helvetic government, that is to say, Buonaparté's government, is re-established at Berne; the Diet of Schwitz (which "sits in open air") has signified to Citizen Rapp, that if the French troops enter Switzerland, the patriots must yield; and the French troops have entered Switzerland. Buonaparté's proclamation has been obeyed in every respect whatsoever. There is not one of his commands, which has not been fulfilled with scrupulous exactness. Deputies are nominated to go to Paris to learn his further pleasure. And, this is called a compromise! Yes, much about such a compromise as the Hawkesburies will, if we are not much mistaken, make with General Andreossi, whose approach has already thrown them into a dreadful trepidation. No; there has been no compromise in Switzerland. The Swiss have again yielded implicit submission to the government set over them by the French, the government which we left in Switzerland at the conclusion of the treaty of Amiens. Buonaparté does not mean to incorporate that country with France: such a measure would not be for the interest of the latter: her views are much better assisted by giving to the surrounding states a nominal independence, in virtue of which they may be either neutrals or belligerents, as it best suits her purpose: in the former capacity they may serve her as a rampart, in the latter as a forlorn hope. As independent states, they will be to her, as Dr. Laurence observed in the debate on the treaty, both feelers and claws, which they could not be, were they formally united to her. Piedmont and Belgium are, indeed, so united; but they are covered by other nominally independent states, the Ligurian, the Italian, and the Batavian republics, other feelers and other claws.

There has been an insurrection in the city and canton of Lugano. The people, taking advantage of the absence of French troops, ejected the tyrants whom their conquerors had set over them, and formed a provisional government. But, on the 20th ultimo, news had been received at Milan, the moment the "dispositions" of Buonaparté were signified to the "insurgents", they were acceded to, the provisional government was put down, the former one re-established, and all who had taken up arms were disarmed.

In France, four provinces have been put under martial law; that is to say, under martial law of a more rigorous description than that which prevails over the country in general. The juries, as they are called, have, in these provinces, been suspended, and special tribunals, alias, courts-martial, established in their stead. These courts, by which, men are accused, tried, and executed, in the space of two hours, have been erected for the sole purpose of extirpating the last remains of the brave royalists, twelve hundred of whom have, in one way or another, been cut off since the signature of the preliminary treaty! These gallant men have fallen a sacrifice to their loyalty, and to their confidence in the British government. Their blood is upon the head of this nation: and it never yet has happened, that such a crime went unpunished. Not content with deserting the royalists, with leaving those who are in France to perish by the knife, and those who are in England to perish with hunger, the ministerial prints have lately begun to revile them, to accuse them of perfidy, and to endeavour to expose them to public hatred and resentment. Such baseness, such unheard of cruelty and ingratitude, must be punished: it must recoil upon the nation that is guilty of it. Desperate as is the situation of the Vandeian royalists, surrounded as they are with dangers, steeped as they are in poverty, we, for our parts, would ten thousand times sooner partake in their fortune and their fate, than in those of the men by whom they have been deserted.

By a reference to page 563, it will be seen, that, while the gibbet and the knife are busy on one side of the Seine, the Consul, Lord Hawkesbury's friend, the First Consul, is making his progress on the other, over paths strewn with flowers, and accompanied with every outward mark of love and admiration. Our wise-acres have consoled themselves with the hope, that he was afraid to stir from Paris, just as they, some time ago, hoped he was like to die.—"Is Phillip dead?" —No, but he's very sick.—What is it to "you, whether Phillip be dead or not? "Were Phillip to die to-morrow, your "cowardice would raise up another to supply his place."—We look for hope in any thing but our own exertions. Insurrections in Switzerland, plots in Holland, changes of ministry in Russia, discontents of the generals at Paris, any thing but what depends on ourselves. If we are driven from all these sources of hope, and are obliged to look at home, we fly to our manufactures, and commerce, and constitution, to our "capital, credit, and confidence;" and, if these should fail us, our last resource is, our "salt water girdle," and "the wooden walls of old England." We never think, we will not think, we are afraid to think, about fighting the French upon the coast of Suffolk or Sussex; but we must think about this, and we must do it too, and with success, or we must become slaves to Buonaparté. "The treaty of Amiens, the whole treaty of Amiens, and nothing but the treaty of Amiens," has severed us completely from the Continent, and has left the French empire, consisting of seventy-five millions of souls, to fall upon us with its undivided weight. Great and terrible as it is we must meet it: it may crush us, but we cannot get out of its way.

The article (see p. 565.) extracted from the Moniteur, may certainly be regarded as a manifesto of the French government. The excellent answer to it, which we have (see p. 554.) taken from the Morning Chronicle, will preclude the necessity of any comments of our own on the subject. But we cannot help remarking, that the manifesto expresses no more than what every one anticipated as the doctrine naturally growing out of the Treaty of Amiens. In that treaty we voluntarily consented to be banished from the continent. The ministry were applauded by a vote of the late parliament, by a mob-like majority, they were applauded for making that treaty; and what right have we now to complain, that Buonaparté tells us that we shall adhere to it? For us who disapproved of the treaty, there is, indeed, some room for reply, as individuals, but not as members of the British public, who, having sanctioned the Treaty of Amiens, by every possible demonstration of joy, have no right to complain that its principles are inculcated and enforced.

The great and general topic of conversation and inquiry is, whether we shall have peace or war. We gave our opinion, in our last sheet (p. 535, 536), to which we beg leave to refer the reader. We supposed, that Buonaparté would give up the shadow, while he would hold fast the substance. In enumerating the reasons why the present state of things was likely to continue for some time, we observed, that Russia having so heartily joined with France would operate as a great check to resistance on the part of England; and, we thought, that Buonaparté, unless he was quite prepared for an open attack on us, would not be disposed to hasten a state of things, which must infallibly displace the present pliable ministry.—"Any change of men, "without a change of measures and of "principles, would not, indeed, be greatly "injurious to his [Buonaparté's] projects; "but, he must be well persuaded, that no "set of men are less likely to oppose his "will, than those from whose trembling "hands he extorted the release of Napper "Tandy; a persuasion, which will probably "induce him to enable them to meet the parliament with something like a promise of the "continuation of the "BLESSINGS of peace"—This was our opinion given on the 25th ultimo; how far it is confirmed by the following curious paragraph in the French manifesto, which arrived on the 2d instant, let the reader determine: "Russia and "France, united by reciprocal esteem, by "interests which are common to both, by "a firm resolution to preserve peace on the "Continent, will restrain, in spite of themselves, those restless spirits, whose turbulent politics inspire the English newspapers, if, by the influence of their libels, "they should ever succeed in displacing the "PRUDENT MINISTRY who now govern "Great-Britain." We have observed, too, that since this manifesto arrived, the ministerial prints have softened their tone. That which fires with indignation in the hearts of other men, tends to cool the passions of the Addingtons and Hawkesburies. "The "PRUDENT MINISTRY who now govern "Great-Britain!" and that from the lips of Buonaparté too! From the Chief of the "Western Nation!" From him who alone can preserve to us the "blessings of "peace," and who, if he will, can raise Omnium to par!—We repeat it, because it is a fact well worth attention, that since the arrival of this eulogium on the ministry, the language of their official print has totally changed. A few days ago, it breathed nothing but war: it would listen to nothing short of a retention of our conquest, till Buonaparté had relinquished his encroachments; but now, behold, it trusts, that "the King's ministers will be moderate —that, if any compromise can be made with respect to the conquests we still retain, serving to us even less than our just demands, it trusts they will be disposed to evince their moderation by accepting such a compromise, rather than have recourse to the DREADFUL alternative of war.”—This is now the language of the “prudent ministry who govern Great-Britain;” the “safe politicians;” the men “with an hereditary disposition to office.” They have long been aware of a design to supplant them: they know, that there is another set of statesmen who are working day and night to prevail on Mr. Pitt to cut off the thread of their existence; but with Buonaparté at their back, they might bid defiance to the fatal sisters themselves.

But, still it seems difficult to recede. Orders are dispatched to retain the conquests not already restored. The ministers must adhere to the resolution which dictated this measure, or Buonaparté must relinquish his encroachments, or else we are plunged deeper and deeper into disgrace. In fact, if we give up the point, after this shew of resistance, we at once take our rank along with Holland and Spain.

That we have the power of retaining our conquests, no one can doubt; and, as to right, we think nothing need be added to what we said in our last sheet (p. 535), nor have WE any scruples as to the expedience; but it is to be feared (or rather, for their own sakes, to be hoped) that the makers and defenders of the peace have great, if not insurmountable, scruples, on this head. We remember, that, when, in the debate of the 29th October, 1801, Mr. WINDHAM insisted, that we should have retained our conquests “as some sort of balance against the aggrandisement of France on the Continent,” the sapient Mr. Addington answered, with just such a simpering sneer as you perceive in the face of Malvolio, when he comes forth in his yellow stockings and cross-garters, “that the right hon. gentleman was very much mistaken in supposing, that the retaining of our conquests was the most effectual way to counterbalance the aggrandisement of France. He thought, on the contrary, that the relinquishing what we had conquered, was the ONLY PLEDGE FOR OUR SECURITY.” And this, this is the minister who is now actually retaining those very conquests, on no other ground than that they are necessary “to balance against the aggrandisement of France!” But, it would be base and cowardly in the last degree, were we, on this occasion, to quote Mr. Addington, without adverting to what was said by Mr. PITT *. “My right hon. friend [Mr. Windham] says, that we ought to have retained something to counterbalance the aggrandisement of France, and that if she chose to treat upon the basis of uti possidetis, we ought to have insisted upon doing the same. He says that this treaty transfers to France all that she wanted to secure to herself—universal empire; and that ministers, in signing it in a rash and evil hour, signed the death-warrant of their country. Sir, had we retained all that we agree to restore, I deny, that from the danger dreaded by the right hon. gentleman, we should have been, thereby, at all secured. The ceded islands were not unimportant to our commerce, were not unimportant to our finance; but would they have maintained the integrity of Naples, of Portugal, or of Sardinia? would they have taken from the French one yard of the immense line of coast which causes such dismay? I shall never be found, upon this occasion, to urge the plea of necessity. We are far, indeed, from the end of our resources, and were our independence threatened, the means we have in store ought not to be spared. But they would truly be miserably employed if they were lavished on any foolish plan of colonial aggrandisement, instead of being reserved to wind up the expenses of a necessary war, and to enable us to make the same exertions again when our honour and true interests are at stake. Because France has gained large tracts of territory from third powers, does it follow that after she has made peace with these powers, she ought to give us an equivalent? It would, indeed, sound strange, if, from the gigantic power of the enemy, you should insist upon her relinquishing her conquests. Would any enlightened statesman say to a foreign power, you are so formidable, that you exceedingly alarm us, and you must, therefore, let us keep a share of your possessions to make us equal. The views of my right hon. friend might regulate a wish, but not a measure. He may pray, but cannot expect to be heard.” Unfortunately for the country, Mr. Windham and his friends were not heard. Their views, however, which, at that time, were only fit to regulate a wish, have now, when adopted by the “safe politicians,” by “the arudent ministers," regulated a measure, and such a measure, too, as is, whether justifiable or not, a direct contravention, an obstruction to the fulfilment, of the treaty, even the Treaty of Amiens!

The true balance against the territorial and political aggrandizement of France was, by Mr. Addington, stated to consist in "the preservation of our constitution, in our capital and industry, and in the husbanding of our resources." Lord Hawkesbury expressed the same meaning in three alliterative words: "capital, credit, and confidence," on which he rang the changes till the nation was tired of the sound. Lord Castlereagh thought our security to consist in giving up colonies to Buonaparté, or, as Mr Sheridan expressed it, in setting the wild young man up in trade. It would, however, be doing great injustice to the defenders of the peace to quote some of them, on this head, to the exclusion of others; for there was not one of them, who made a speech of ten sentences, who did not utter precisely the same sentiment, and almost in the very same words, "We have nothing to fear from the aggrandizement of France. However colossal her power may be, our best means of defence will be found in the fruits of our industry, in our commercial wealth, in our national credit, and in the preservation of our inestimable constitution." This was the stave, which Mr. Pitt gave out on the 3d of November, and which the well-trained choir most harmoniously chaunted to the end of the session. Well, then, the "true balance" against the aggrandizement of France still exists in all its glory. We are as industrious as ever, and, to any one who has the patience of Job, Mr. Chalmers or Sir Frederick Eden will prove, by rules of "moral arithmetic," that the soldiers who have returned to the loom weave more cloth now, than they did while they were using the musket, that, therefore, they are more profitable to the state, and that, as money is the sinews of war, or (to cite a sententious maxim of lord Auckland) as "war is a science of money," and as "that side must first quit the field, whose exchequer first fails," the country derives greater security from the weaver than from the soldier, from the loom than from the musket. Our credit too is yet unshaken. Our commercial wealth is as great as ever; nay, if the government statement respecting the Custom-house returns be correct, it is much greater than ever; and, blessed be God, our constitution remains unimpaired, by any thing, at least, that has happened since the treaty of Amiens. What are we afraid of, then? The means of defence, which were to set France, "however colossal her power," at defiance, are all in our possession, and within ourselves. Why, then, do we now seek for security in extraneous means; and in those very means, too, which both the late and present minister declared to be not only inefficient for the purpose, but calculated to have an effect precisely the contrary to that which they now are expected to produce?—We are reluctantly compelled to break off.

TO THE
FELLOWS OF THE ROYAL SOCIETY.

GENTLEMEN, London, 4 November, 1802.

The season approaches, when, by the constitution of the Royal Society, the authority delegated by us to our President, Council and Officers, devolves again to the body at large, to be by them conferred anew on such of the members as appear the most worthy of their approbation and confidence. That this annual election is by no means a matter of form, or a mere ceremonious confirmation of the authority of the President and officers, is evident from the statutes of the Society, which direct that repeated public warning should be given by the President to the body, "How much it importeth to the welfare of the Society, that such persons be chosen of the Council, out of whom a proper choice may be made of President and officers."—We are therefore called on seriously to consider the merits or demerits of those on whom we have conferred the honourable guardianship of our fame and interest; and a candid examination of their conduct, so far as it relates to the Society, is not merely the exercise of a right; it is the discharge of a duty.

Under this consideration, I feel myself more than simply justified in recalling to your recollection, and pressing on your mature consideration, a letter written by your President, some months since: and which, though at the time it caused much discussion, and met with universal disapprobation, both in and out of the Society, seems gradually to have dropped from our memory, without having excited any permanent intention of asserting the honours of the Society, by public animadversion on the conduct of Sir Joseph Banks.

I propose, in the first place, to lay before you an accurate statement of the facts to which I allude, and then to make a few observations on the conduct of our President.

In the latter end of the year 1801, Sir Joseph Banks was elected by the National Institute of France, the first of forty foreign members, whom by their new regulations, they were empowered to add to their body. In answer to the official letter from the Secretary of the Institute, announcing to him his election, he wrote a letter, in English, of which the following translation was published in the Moniteur of the 18th of March last:

[578

INSTITUT NATIONAL.

Traduction d'une Lettre de Sir Joseph Banks, Président de la Société Royale de Londres, au Président et Secrétaire de l'Institut National de France.

Citoyens, Londres, 21 Janvier, 1802.

"Veuillez offrir à l'Institut National l'expression de ma reconnaissance pour l'honneur qu'on m'a fait en me donnant le titre d'associé de ce corps savant et distingué.

"Assurez en même temps mes respectables confrères que je considère cette marque de leur estime comme la première et la plus agréable des distinctions littéraires que je pusse recevoir. Etre le premier choisi pour associé de la première société littéraire du monde, surpasse mes vœux le plus ambitieux; et je ne puis être trop reconnaissant envers la société qui m'a conféré cet honneur, et envers la nation dont elle est la représentation littéraire; nation qui, pendant les convulsions les plus affreuses de la plus terrible révolution, n'a jamais cessé d'avoir mon estime, dans la persuasion où j'ai toujours été, même pendant les périodes les plus désastreuses, que les bons citoyens y étaient en nombre considérable, qu'ils reprendraient infailliblement le dessus et qu'ils rétabliraient dans le cœur de leurs compatriotes l'empire de la vertu, de la justice, et de l'honneur.

"Recevez en particulier, citoyens, tous mes remerciemens pour la manière vraiment obligeante dont vous m'avez communiqué cette bonne nouvelle.

" Je suis avec une estime sincère pour vos talents distingués, etc. Signé, JOSEPH BANKS."

It may reasonably be demanded, why the original answer of Sir Joseph is not laid before you, rather than the French translation. The reason is, that the English letter is guarded in the archives of the Institute, with so jealous care, that even a sight of it is refused to the members of the Institute themselves; and a copy of it has been positively denied to the most pressing application. As, however, the accuracy of the translation has never been denied, either by Sir Joseph, or any of his friends; and as no letter has been brought forward purporting to be the genuine original written by Sir Joseph, it is surely not unjust to conclude, that the sentiments contained in this translation are those of the writer, and to reason on it as a document of unimpeached authenticity.

It appears to me, that language can scarcely furnish terms of more direct insult to the Royal Society, than have been, in this letter, employed by their President. The honour of being elected one among forty foreign members of a newly established foreign scientific body, he, in unequivocal terms, places above that which the Royal Society of London have annually, during a period of 23 years, conferred on him. Forgetful of his country, of his friends; insensible to those feelings of attachment and gratitude which naturally should flow from long habits of intimacy, and a sense of benefits repeatedly conferred, he tells the Institute of France, and through them all Europe, that it is better to be one of their forty associates, than to preside over the first scientific body in his native land; in whose rolls the Sovereigns of this country have, from its foundation to the present day, considered it as not unworthy their high station personally to inscribe their names; and of which his present Majesty has, by repeated acts of munificence, most peculiarly declared himself the protector and patron.

If such, gentlemen, are the sentiments of Sir Joseph Banks, let him enjoy the honour he so highly esteems, but let us find some other person on whom to confer a favour which we have long considered as of the highest value; which certainly is the highest which we have to bestow on one of our own body, and which it is evident Sir Joseph so lightly prizes.

But, gentlemen, is this all? far from it.—Not satisfied with telling the world how little he esteems the honour of presiding over us, he proceeds, as far as in him lies, to degrade the body of the Society itself, from that high rank which it has held during more than a century, by the unanimous consent of all the learned in every country of Europe. If we look into the enumeration of titles which the literati are, with a pardonable vanity, fond of affixing to their names, we shall find, without an exception, that every nation has concurred in giving precedence to the title of Fellow of the Royal Society, over all foreign academies; each country, placing it immediately after their own national institution. This universal homage it would be an affront to Europe to suppose undeservedly paid; and as an Englishman, as a fellow of Royal Society, I view it with great and honest pride. From this pre-eminence has the society been attempted to be thrust, by the man, of all others, whose situation pointed him out as the jealous guardian and assertor of her honor and fame; whose peculiar duty it would have been to have vindicated her long-established rights, had any foreign nation attempted an attack upon them; and this strange homage to a foreign academy of yesterday is the more offensive, because totally unnecessary; as a letter of thanks, without a single word leading to abase one society by comparison with another, is all that could have been asked, and probably all that has been paid, by every person who has received this honour, Sir Joseph Banks alone excepted.

Hitherto, gentlemen, the voice of our President alone has degraded us, but if we tamely acquiesce in the insult he has offered us, we make ourselves parties in our own disgrace, and tell both our countrymen and Europe, that having abdicated the first rank, it remains with them to assign to us our new place; nor can we be either surprised or offended if that place is the last.

On many other exceptionable passages in Sir Joseph Banks's letter, I shall make no comment, as they have no immediate connexion with the honour of the Royal Society; but I cannot forbear recommending the general tenor and spirit of the whole to your serious consideration.

Although at the time when the letter was the subject of very general discussion, Sir Joseph Banks himself, as far as I can learn, preserved a cautious and gloomy silence on the subject; yet several of his friends offered different excuses in extenuation of an act which nobody was sufficiently hardy to justify. These it is but fair briefly to consider.

By some, the letter was affected to be treated as words of course, mere compliments, meaning nothing less than their obvious import; and this society as well as this nation, had, they assured us, no warmer friend than Sir Joseph Banks. Was I in the place of the right hon. baronet, I should feel but little obligation to those who thus asserted my principles at the expense of my veracity, and without diminishing the insult offered to my old friends, charged me with insincerity to my new ones.

By many the letter was ascribed to a moment of intoxication; drunk with the honour conferred on him, the President committed to paper what in his cooler moments he would have disavowed. The fact I am perfectly ready to admit, as I am convinced that no man in his sober senses could have written such a letter; but since (to borrow bacchanalian phrases) our president's head is unfortunately so weak, that he has, in this affair, been evidently more than half seas over; however we may pity his infirmity, we shall but ill consult our honour or our interest, if we do not select for our guidance a pilot who may steer us rather nearer to our own coast.

The many and great obligations which the society owes to their president, and the great injury we should sustain by losing him, have been urged as reasons for our passing over without notice this insult offered to us. I shall be perfectly ready at all times to acknowledge with gratitude any favours received, and in the present instance I am willing to take for granted what would admit of some discussion; but, however high the account may be stated by the friends of Sir Joseph, I think that on a fair estimate, the society will be found far from his debtors. To our favour, gentlemen, Sir Joseph Banks owes most of the honours he now enjoys. His place among the trustees of the British Museum he holds as President of our body. The ribbon which decorates his person, and the honour of a seat at the board of his Majesty's most hon. privy council, no man can affect to deny were bestowed on the President of the Royal Society; nay, it is more than probable that this foreign honour, this Lotus, was principally conferred on him as a mark of respect to the society, over which he has still the honour to preside.

"Which whoso eats forgets his former friends,"
"His country, and himself!"

As to the difficulty of replacing Sir Joseph, I should think myself highly wanting in respect to the society, could I, for a moment, suppose that had death or resignation vacated the chair before this letter was written, no man among the long list of eminent and dignified names of which the society consists, could have been found of merit equal to his; but in the present case I do not hesitate to declare it as my decided opinion, that until another member can be pointed out who has equally insulted us, Sir Joseph is the most unworthy of the chair.

Deeply as I am affected at the insult offered us by our President, and convinced as I am that I have not in any degree exaggerated its magnitude and extent, yet there is a possibility that I may feel myself called on to disavow all that I have written. If the evening of the 30th of November sees Sir Joseph Banks unquestioned and uncensured in the chair of the society, I shall then indeed, with what feelings I need not say, be compelled to own, that our President has rightly estimated, and justly placed us.

I have the honour to be, gentlemen, your sincerely attached and obedient Servant,

A Fellow of the Royal Society.

EUONAPARTE'S CONDUCT IN SYRIA.

"He that hath ears to hear, let him-hear!"

Extract taken from SIR ROBERT WILSON'S "History of the British Expedition in Egypt,"
" &c. &c." just published.

Buonaparté having carried the town of Jaffa by assault, many of the garrison were put to the sword; but the greater part flying into the mosques, and imploring mercy from their pursuers, were granted their lives; and let it be well remembered, that an exasperated army in the moment of revenge, when the laws of war justified the rage, yet heard the voice of pity, received its impression, and proudly refused to be any longer the executioners of an unresisting enemy. Soldiers of the Italian Army, this is a laurel wreath worthy of your fame, a trophy of which the subsequent treason of an individual shall not deprive you!

Three days afterwards, Buonaparté, who had expressed much resentment at the compassion manifested by his troops, and determined to relieve himself from the maintenance and care of three thousand eight hundred prisoners,* ordered them to be marched to a rising ground near Jaffa; where a division of French infantry formed against them. When the Turks had entered into their fatal alignment, and the mournful preparations were completed, the signal gun fired. Volleys of musquetry and grape instantly played against them; and Buonaparté, who had been regarding the scene through a telescope, when he saw the smoke ascending, could not restrain his joy, but broke out into exclamations of approval; indeed, he had just reasons to dread the refusal of his troops thus to dishonour themselves. Kleber had remonstrated in the most strenuous manner, and the officer of the Etat Major who commanded (for the general to whom the division belonged was absent) even refused to execute the order without a written instruction; but Buonaparté was too cautious, and sent Berthier to enforce obedience.

When the Turks had all fallen, the French troops humanely endeavoured to put a period to the sufferings of the wounded, but some time elapsed before the bayonet could finish what the fire had not destroyed, and probably many languished whole days in agony. Several French officers, by whom partly these details are furnished, declared, that this was a scene, the retrospect of which tormented their recollection, and that they could not reflect on it without horror; accustomed as they had been to sights of cruelty! These were the prisoners, whom Assalini, in his very able work on the plague, alluded to, when he says, that for three days the Turks shewed no symptoms of that disease, and it was their putrifying remains which produced the pestilential malady which he describes as afterwards making such ravages in the French army. The bones still lie in heaps, and are shewn to every traveller who arrives; nor can they be confounded with those who perished in the assault; since this field of butchery lies a mile from the town.

Such a fact should not, however, be alledged without some proof, or leading circumstance stronger than assertion being produced to support it; but there would be a want of generosity in naming individuals, and branding them to the latest posterity, with infamy, for obeying a command, when their submission became an act of necessity; therefore to establish further the authority of the relation, this only can be mentioned,—that it was Bonn's division which fired, and thus every one is afforded the opportunity of satisfying themselves respecting the truth, by enquiring of officers serving in the different brigades composing this division.—P. 72. * * *

The next circumstance is of a nature which requires, indeed, the most particular details to establish; since the idea can scarce be entertained, that the commander of an army should order his own countrymen (or if not immediately such, those amongst whom he had been naturalized) to be deprived of existence, when in a state which required the kindest consideration. But the annals of France record the frightful crimes of a Robespierre, a Carrier; and historical truth must now recite one equal to any which has blackened its page.

Buonaparté, finding that his hospitals at Jaffa were crowded with sick, sent for a physician, whose name should be inscribed in letters of gold, but which from weighty reasons cannot be here inserted: on his arrival he entered into a long conversation with him respecting the danger of contagion, concluding at last, with the remark, that something must be done to remedy the evil, and that the destruction of the sick at present in the hospital, was the only measure

* Buonaparté had in person inspected previously the whole body, amounting to near five thousand men, with the object of saving those who belonged to the towns he was preparing to attack. The age and noble physiognomy of a veteran Janissary attracted his observation, and he asked him sharply, "Old man, what did you do here?" The Janissary undaunted, replied, "I must answer that question by asking you the same; your answer will be, that you came to 'serve your Sultan; so do I mine.'" The intrepid frankness of the reply excited universal interest in his favour. Buonaparté even smiled. "He is saved," whispered some of the aids de camp. "You know not Buonaparté," observed one who had served with him in Italy, "that 'smile, I speak from experience, does not proceed from benevolence; remember what I say.'" The opinion was too true! The Janissary was left in the ranks, doomed to death, and suffered!

which could be adopted! The physician, alarmed at the proposal, bold in the confidence of virtue and the cause of humanity, remonstrated vehemently, representing the cruelty as well as the atrocity of such a murder; but finding that Buonaparté persevered and menaced, he indignantly left the tent, with this memorable observation: "Neither my principles, nor the character of my profession, will allow me to become a human butcher: and, General, if such qualities as you insinuate, are necessary to form a great man, I thank my God, that I do not possess them."

Buonaparté was not to be diverted from his object by moral considerations: he persevered, and found an apothecary, who (dreading the weight of power, but who since has made an atonement to his mind, by unequivocally confessing the fact) consented to become his agent, and to administer poison to the sick! Opium at night was distributed in gratifying food, the wretched unsuspecting victims banqueted, and in a few hours five hundred and eighty soldiers, who had suffered so much for their country, perished thus miserably by the order of its Idol!

Is there a Frenchman whose blood does not chill with horror, at the recital of such a fact? Surely the manes of these murdered, unoffending people, must be now hovering round the seat of government, and
* * * * *

If a doubt should still exist, as to the veracity of this statement, let the members of the Institute at Cairo be asked, what passed in the sitting after the return of Buonaparté from Syria: they will relate, that the same virtuous physician, who refused to become the destroyer of those committed to his protection, accused Buonaparté of high treason in the full assembly, against the honour of France, her children, and humanity; that he entered into the full details of the poisoning of the sick, and the massacre of the garrison, aggravating these crimes, by charging Buonaparté with strangling, previously, at Rosetta, a number of French and Copts who were ill of the plague; thus proving, that this disposal of the sick was a premeditated plan. In vain Buonaparté attempted to justify himself*; the

* Buonaparté pleaded, that he ordered the garrison to be destroyed, because he had not provisions to maintain them, or strength enough to guard them, and that he destroyed the sick to prevent contagion, and save themselves from falling into the hands of the Turks; but these arguments were refuted directly, and Buonaparté was members sat petrified with terror, and almost doubted whether the scene passing before their eyes was not illusion:—There are records, which remain, and which, in due season, will be produced. In the interim, this representation will be sufficient to stimulate inquiry; and, Frenchmen, your honour is, indeed, interested in the examination. * * * Let us hope, that in no country will there be found ANOTHER MAN of such Machiavelian principles, as by sophistry to palliate such transactions * * * —P. 74.

PUBLIC PAPER.

Communication from the Imperial Plenipotentiary at the Diet of Ratisbon, on the 20th of October.

His Imperial Majesty has been pleased to announce, by his sub-delegate, to the Deputation Extraordinary of the Empire, that having, agreeably to his anxiety for the maintenance of tranquillity, removed every obstacle which opposed the success of his negotiations at Paris, and having taken for the basis of the conclusive arrangement the supplement of Indemnity offered by the French government itself, for his Royal Highness the Grand Duke of Tuscany, his Majesty hopes to see instantly established an amicable understanding, which will have for its immediate consequence, the most satisfactory regulation of the business with which the Deputation is charged. Since, from the nature of this affair, his Imperial Majesty must reserve to himself a final approbation, he has no doubt but that the co-estates which form a part of the Deputation will content themselves with this preliminary declaration, and will repose in him, on that head, the confidence which he thinks he merits, after having given so many proofs of the sincerity of his views, and the moderation of his sentiments.

(After the perusal of the above Communication, a Declaration to the same effect was made by the Minister of Bohemia.)

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

The Council of Execution to the Inhabitants of Helvetia.

Citizens of Helvetia, the government is assembled at Berne. The events which had necessitated its departure, and those which have preceded its return, are sufficiently known to you. We will not, therefore, speak to you of the past: we wish only to open your eyes to the present, and to seek, if it be possible, your preservation for the future. It is not a requisition of the Helvetic government that will cause the French to march among us; but the First Consul of the French republic cannot suffer factions and civil war to obliged to rest his defence on the positions of Machiavel. When he afterwards left Egypt, the Savans were so angry at being left behind, that they elected the physician president of the Institute, an act which speaks for itself fully.

desolate a country bordering on France; a country attached to France by treaties; and which will for ever be indebted to France alone for the restitution of its independence. There cannot, therefore, Citizens of Helvetia, be any question, at this moment, of dispute, as to this or that system, or on the pre-eminence of this or that opinion; the object is to prevent the occupation of our country by foreign troops, and all the evils that would be the result of it. Only one mode remains to us to prevent those evils; it is that which the proclamation of the First Consul points out to us. Citizens of Helvetia, we counsel not to repel it: it is the last plank by which we can escape shipwreck. The abyss is beneath your footsteps, and your ruin is certain if you neglect to seize it. A general officer attached to the staff of the army of observation on our frontiers, has arrived at Berne, to see with his own eyes, if the orders of the First Consul are punctually executed throughout. He will cause the troops to enter if a single canton resist. Yes, a partial disorder, a single unconstitutional authority refusing to dissolve itself, or an assembly refusing to lay down its arms, will be sufficient to draw down on you this misfortune. Let every citizen, therefore, submit to the constitution re-established, and await in the dispositions of peace and good will the definitive order of things which is announced to us by the mediation of the First Consul. Let all party denominations and hatred be abjured; let a general desire to preserve the existence and independence of our country; let the necessity of preserving for ourselves and our families the feeble resources that remain to us, command tranquillity, and unite all minds. For every true Swiss there can henceforth be but one thought, one end, and that is, the preservation of the Swiss country.

Gibraltar, Oct. 18.—By the Medusa Frigate, Capt. Gore, which arrived here yesterday from Malta, in twenty-one days, we learn that 2,000 Neapolitan troops had arrived there, who were doing duty on the opposite side of the harbour from the British.—A Grand Master had at last been appointed, who is an Italian nobleman now in England; and the evacuation of the island by our troops will probably be delayed till his arrival.—The transports had sailed from Malta for Alexandria, to bring away the whole of our troops now in Egypt; and they were expected at Malta by the 10th of November.—The Medusa fell in with our squadron which sailed hence on the 6th, off Carthage, all well.—Sir Richard Bickerton had received orders to remain in the Mediterranean, with the whole of his fleet, after Malta was evacuated.

Vienna, Oct. 25.—Three principal objects at present occupy our politics; the first is, the journey which the Archduke will very soon take to Paris; the second is, the fate of the Duchy of Parma; some say it will be given to the King of Sardinia, for whom England and Russia interest themselves strongly; but it appears from the public acts at Ratisbon, that Russia and France are inseparably united, and that our court can obtain nothing but by their mutual consent.—The Russian grand duke Constantine arrived here yesterday the 22d Oct. and was received with the most distinguished attention. All the Archdukes at Vienna immediately waited upon him, and the Archduke Charles is expected at Vienna, for the purpose of paying his respects to him.

Basle, Oct. 26.—There is yet no certain intelligence of the dissolution of the diet of Schwitz.—The troops of the smaller Cantons, who had returned to Lucerne, under the command of general Aut-dér-Maur, received orders from the diet of Schwitz to repair again to Berne, and to recommence hostilities against the Helvetic troops; but they refused to obey the order, and quitted Lucerne to return to their homes, in spite of the entreaties of general Bachmann, who was at Lucerne, and who endeavoured to induce them to change their resolution.—The provisional government of Schaffhausen having been invited by that of Zurich to send it its succours, and place at its disposition the contingent of Schaffhausen, returned from the army, has contented itself for the present with sending two deputies to Zurich. The canton of Schaffhausen has received a summons on the part of the Helvetic government, to return under the constitution. At the departure of the last courier, there were about 4000 French in the canton of Basle.

Oct. 27.—A part of the French troops, assembled on our frontiers, is returning to the fortress of Alsace, in the interior of France. The 14th light demi-brigade, which has long been in garrison, is on its march for Marseilles, where it will be informed of its ulterior destination. A part of the 104th, cantoned at Bienne, has received orders to return to Strasburgh. The troops who are on their March from Mentz, and other parts, have received counter orders.—We have here a garrison of two French battalions of the 16th demi-brigade, which had hitherto occupied the Brisgau. The 27th demi-brigade is destined to form the garrison of Zurich, with the 13th regiment of Chasseurs. A battalion of the 104th is going into Argovia. The troops from Geneva and Versoix will occupy the cantons of Berne and Fribourg. We are ignorant whether these troops will be sent against the small cantons. The contingents of Uri, Unterwald, Schwitz, Glarus, Appenzell, and the Grisons, have returned home.—The staff of general Bachmann is dissolved—the greater part of the persons composing it, as well as their chief, are gone to Schwitz to Reding.—Civil war has broken out with great fury in the district of Zurich, not only on both sides the lake but also in the mountains. We are assured, that the Zurich contingent, commanded by major Ziegler, which, after its return from Berne, had been sent to the districts which had refused to submit to the provisional government, has been defeated by a corps of peasants in the environs of Gruningen.—The constitutional regime has been restored at Schaffhausen. Agitation has ceased in the Frickthal.

Ratisbon, Oct. 27.—The Deputation of the Empire yesterday held its 20th sitting. The minister of Bohemia, M. de Schaant, and the Imperial plenipotentiary, M. de Hugel, communicated two notes, by which they inform that assembly, that the indemnity of the Grand Duke has been finally settled with the French Government, and that this arrangement will be immediately communicated to it. They hope, in consequence, that the Deputation will no longer complain of delays in the business of the indemnities arising from that cause.—The ministers of Brandenburg, Bavaria, Cassel, and Wurtemberg, have not explained themselves upon the contents of this communication. Those of Mentz, Saxony, and of the Grand Master of the Teutonic Order, have, on the contrary, testified to the sub-delegate of Bohemia, their joy at this happy event.—The Deputation, in the same sitting, agreed to the conclusion, relative to the future maintenance of the upper clergy of Germany, and its functionaries.—M. de Hugel, the Imperial plenipotentiary, yesterday gave his formal adhesion to the conclusion of the 21st, by which the Deputation of the Empire has adopted the general plan of indemnities of the 8th.—We have been informed this day of the negotiations which have taken place touching the indemnities of the Grand Duke, between the court of Vienna and the French Government. The following is a brief sketch: The plan for investing the Archduke with all the ecclesiastical possessions in Suabia having been rejected at Paris, Count Cobenzel received on the 8th of last September, orders to demand from the French Government the exchange of the right bank of the Inn against the Austrian possessions in Suabia. This proposition having met no better reception, that ambassador was authorised to present another projet, offering to the Grand Duke Prince Ferdinand, besides the country of Salzburg, and the other possessions conferred upon him by the plan of indemnities, a mass of abbeys and other ecclesiastical properties which should make his annual revenues amount to 1,300,000 florins. This is the plan which is said to have received the approbation of the First Consul, and which has served for the basis of the Convention that has been concluded at Paris.

Oct. 28.—We have received positive intelligence that Aloys Reding has again convoked the diet of Schwitz, and read to them the summons of general Rapp, inviting them to dissolve themselves.—After an animated discussion the assembly determined not to obey the summons, and to remain united. The proclamation of the First Consul indeed has produced no effect in any of the Eastern Cantons. The authorities established by the insurgents at Zurich, in the petty Cantons, in the Grisons, and at Lucerne, are still in vigour. The provisional government of Zurich passed on the 23th inst. a decree which proves that it is in no manner disposed to lay down its usurped power. It has dissolved all the tribunals of the district, as well as the tribunal of the canton, and has supplied their place by a provisional tribunal in each district, composed of a president and eight judges.

Hamburg, Oct. 29.—Yesterday, at nine o'clock in the morning, a general meeting of the Senate and principal Burgesses of this city took place at the Town-Hall, and lasted till near six o'clock in the afternoon. This meeting had, amongst other things under consideration, the proposed cession of the rights, privileges, and revenues, which his Britannic Majesty, as Elector of Hanover, possesses in the Cathedral of Hamburg, its precincts, and the dependencies belonging to it on the Hamburg territory. Some notes from the Regency of Hanover, and from the King of Denmark, in his quality of Duke of Holstein, against the plan, were also taken into consideration; but the result of the debates still remains a profound secret.—The exchange of couriers between Vienna and Petersburg becomes brisker every day, and the dispatches received are reported to be of the utmost political importance. At some ministerial conferences which lately took place, both the English and Russian ambassadors assisted, but Citizen Champagny was not present.—The news of the death of the Duke of Parma has occasioned no small sensation at Vienna, and some negotiations will, it is said, immediately be set on foot in favour of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, which will be supported with the whole influence of the Russian cabinet. It is currently reported that the Grand Duke of Tuscany is to marry a Russian princess.—A gentleman of the court has been sent as courier to the Archduke Charles, at Prague, to induce his Royal Highness to hasten his return to Vienna, to be present at the festivities to be given in honour of the Grand Duke Constantine.—Advices from St. Petersburg, of the 13th instant, mention, that the officer who invented the story of a conspiracy against the life of Alexander I. and wounded himself with a pistol to give more sanction to his wicked invention, has been tried by an imperial special commission, which not only found him guilty of the charges preferred against him, but sentenced him to be quartered alive by four horses. This sentence, however, was too severe for the humane feelings of the Emperor, who changed it into perpetual banishment.—In several parts of the Northern Continent of Germany, and on the right bank of the Rhine, large herds of bullocks are now purchased for the English market.

Oct. 30.—The provisional government sent back the circular letter of the Helvetic government without opening it, and have resolved to wait for the arrival of the French troops before they yield. The insurgents begin to throw up entrenchments in the mountains. The number of French troops which will occupy Switzerland are estimated at more than 30,000.—A battalion of the 27th French demi-brigade is arrived at Zurich. General Serras has fixed his head-quarters in that city. The provisional government has been summoned to dissolve itself. It had already received a like summons on the part of the executive council, but it paid no regard to it. The troubles which have broken out in this Canton are not yet appeased, although the contingent of Schaffhouse has been sent to the succour of the city of Zurich. We are even assured that it has sustained a complete defeat. The inhabitants of a great part of the Canton of Schaffhouse, in support of the Helvetic government, have formed a kind of congress, which has recognized the legitimate authorities, and sent a courier to Schwitz to recall from the diet of the confederates the deputies of that canton. Those of our own have done the same.

“Berne, October 30.

“Citizen Minister—The council of execution “have received the letter, by which you communicate to it the decree of the First Consul of the “25 Vendemiaire, which appoints you minister plenipotentiary from the French republic to “the Helvetic republic. The First Consul could “not manifest in a more striking manner his benevolent intentions towards Helvetia, than by “adding to the military powers with which you “are invested, diplomatic functions, which, placing you in immediate contact with the government will furnish it with numerous opportunities to call your attention to the means of obtaining the object of the First Consul, which is “the re-establishment of order and tranquillity in “this country.”

“To General Ney.”

General Rapp arrived the 25th at Basle. On the same day the insurrectional authorities were dissolved. On the 26th entered at Basle the 1st. battalion of the 104th, the 2d of the 16th, the 2d of the 42d, and the 1st of the 80th demi-brigade; besides the thirteen regiments of chasseurs, and six pieces of artillery.—Letters from Arau state, that in the night between the 26th and 27th, the tocsin was sounded in several villages of Argovia. The peasants are assembling in great numbers, and have taken up arms. In the Canton of Baden the insurrection is also become general. The city of Arau was under the greatest alarm, when on the morning of the 27th, five companies of French infantry entered there with two pieces of cannon. Other detachments occupy Olten, Arbourg and the whole country.—We learn from Zurich that that Canton is in the greatest disorder; but the inhabitants of the district of Wald, and a great number of republicans of other districts, having taken up arms, have taken possession of Winterthur, and threaten to march to Zurich. The Diet of Schwitz, they say, has consented to dissolve itself; but it persists in disowning the authority of the Helvetic Government. This obstinate folly cannot but have the most disastrous consequences for our country. The French troops have not yet entered into the Grisons, as has been said. The national prefect of that country, after having suffered from the insurgents a detention of more than six weeks, has been set at liberty.—The first use which he has made of it has been to repair into the bosom of the authority, and to summon it to dissolve itself. It has taken that part, but reserving its rights in the same manner as the Diet of Schwitz. General Ney set out yesterday for Olten. Citizen Verninac is preparing to set out for Paris.

Paris, November 1.—The first Consul staid a long time in the field of battle at Ivry, where the mayor and the principal inhabitants of the commune pointed out to him the different positions of the two armies. He ordered that the pyramid raised on the field of battle, and which had been destroyed during the revolution, should be re-established.—He ordered also that there should be added an inscription, declaring that the misfortunes experienced by France at that epoch, were the result of the appeal made by the different parties of France to the Spanish and English nations, and that every family and every party which calls foreign powers to their aid, has merited, and will merit, to the most distant posterity, the curses of the French people.—The mayor of Ivry delivered the following address to the First Consul:—"General First Consul.—The Commune of Ivry could not have expected to receive in its bosom the hero of France, and the pacificator of Europe. Your exploits, General First Consul, recall to mind those of the hero, who, in the plain of which it bears the name, conquered, and was immortalized—Your regards, General Consul, are worthy of the great deed which are past, and they leave to posterity the remembrance of two great men."—The First Consul entered Evreux at four in the evening. The mayor presented the keys of the town. It would be difficult to express the sentiments of attachment and gratitude which the people testified towards him in his progress.—At Louviers, he visited, in detail, the manufactures of that town, and particularly that of Citizen Decretot.—At Pont-de-l'Arche, he went to the copper-forges of Romilly, to which he paid much attention: he distributed to the workmen of the manufactures that he visited, extraordinary gratifications.—At Evreux, twenty girls, the oldest not twelve years of age, were presented to Madame Buonaparte.

The King and Queen of Etruria arrived at Barcelona on the 3d of October, five days after their departure from Leghorn. The Queen, although recently delivered, disembarked on the 5th, in the best state of health.

We read in the Journal of Rouen of the 30th ult. that the First Consul was certainly expected that morning. They had prepared and decorated at the Theatre of the Arts in that city, the places destined for the First Consul, Mad me Buonaparte, the Minister of the Interior, and the superior officers who accompany them.—The First Consul was expected at Rouen on Saturday.—"One hundred young men (says a letter from thence of the 29th), formed into a company of horse, are assembled at this moment, and only wait for the arrival of the courier, who is to announce the hour of his arrival. Their uniform is the frock and pantaloons, yellow buttons, French hat, with a plume of feathers and a belt.—The Chamber of Commerce, and all the merchants are assembled to give the First Consul a fête in their hall."

Paris, Nov. 6.—(Moniteur.)—What is the interest which the faction hostile to Europe, takes in the Swiss Insurgents? It is easy to see that it would make of Switzerland a new Jersey, to weave plots there, pay traitors, circulate libels, welcome all criminals, all the enemies of France, and do on the East, what it does constantly, by means of the position of Jersey, on the West. It would thereby have this particular advantage, of being able to disturb the fine manufactures of Lyons, which are rising from their ruins, and which lay a hand of steel upon the balance of trade, in order to make it lean in favour of French industry.—What is the interest of France? It is to have none but good neighbours and sure friends.—In the south, the King of Spain, the ally of France from inclination as well as from interest, and the Italian and Ligurian Republics, which enter into her federative system.—Switzerland, the Duke of Bavaria, the good Prince of Baden, the King of Prussia, Holland, to the north and east.—The faction hostile to Europe, and which wishes to agitate the Continent, will neither find in those states accomplices nor suffrance. Yet those agitators never sleep: they have attempted at the same time at Genoa, in Switzerland, in Holland. Their plots assumed consistency in Switzerland, when the proclamation of the 8th Vendemiaire calmed every thing. Every thing has returned to its natural state, into that state which on all sides will exhibit the fine territory of France surrounded by friendly people.—That situation is the result of ten years triumphs, of hazards, of labours, and immense sacrifices. The Peace of Luneville, the preliminaries of London, and the Peace of Amiens, far from having changed it, have consolidated it.—Why attempt now what they could never hitherto accomplish? Do they think we have become cowards? Do they believe we are less powerful than we have always been?

—It is easier for the waves of the ocean to root up the rock which has braved the fury of them forty centuries, than for the faction, hostile to France and to man, to reverse war and all its fury in the bosom of the West, and above all, to dim the lustre of the Star of the French people for a moment.

DOMESTIC.

Several recruiting parties of the guards have left London within this week.

At the feast of the installation of the Mayor of London, which was, as usual, held on the 9th instant, the "blessings of peace were represented by a display of the weapons of war reversed, and agriculture and industry were seen joining hand-in-hand."

The French Minister Plenipotentiary, ANDRE-OSI, arrived in London on Saturday, the 6th instant, at one o'clock in the morning.

Lord Whitworth and his suite arrived at Dover on Tuesday, the 9th instant, between three and four o'clock, and embarked, on the 10th, for Calais.

On the 10th instant, a court of directors was held at the East India House, when George Hilario Barlow, Esq. was appointed to succeed to the government-general of India, upon the retirement of Marquis Wellesley.

A person, whose name it appears is Richard Nield, gained admittance at Buckingham-house on Tuesday morning, between nine and ten o'clock. He had penetrated beyond the lodge before he was recognized, and was proceeding to the interior of the palace. An alarm was given, and he was immediately apprehended. He exhibited every symptom of a man deranged in his intellects; he said he was the son of the prophet, sent on a divine mission from the Lord, and uttered various other extravagancies, equally indicating a distempered brain: he was secured, and it appeared he was from Birmingham, and by trade a chair-maker, and that he had been last year apprehended for lurking about the palace. The result of his examination was, his committal to Tothil-fields Bridewell, from whence, do doubt, he will be removed to Bethlehem Hospital.

Dublin, Nov. 6—A meeting of the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common council, was yesterday held, to consider the steps necessary to be taken by the corporation, upon the subject of a charge made against an Alderman, of drinking as a toast, the health of "James Napper Tandy, General of Division, and success to freedom," when the opinions of the Attorney-General, and the Recorder, that the crime was punishable by indictment, were read. As the former part of this business was conducted in private, we deem it unnecessary to state more of the particulars, than that the alderman accused having appeared in the commons' room, and made a full submission and ample apology for his misconduct, a general disposit on seemed to prevail, of letting the matter die away; but the papers upon the subject, were referred to the law committee.

TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD HAWKESBURY,

His Majesty's Sec. of State for Foreign Affairs.

MY LORD,—Since the date of my last letter (p. 532), a French Ambassador has arrived: one small point has thus been conceded by Buonaparté, and of this, I doubt not, you and your colleagues will make the most. But, all the substantial differences remain to be settled, and, without particularizing them, it is evident to every beholder, that they amount altogether, to something very little short of war. Thus situated, then, it behoves us, as I before observed, to enquire into the change which these six months of peace have made in our position, naval and military, domestic and foreign.

Before, however, I enter upon this enquiry, it seems not improper, nor altogether unnecessary, to remind your lordship, that this uncertain state of things is not only the consequence of the peace of Amiens, of that peace for which you called upon the nation to rejoice, and of which you expressed a desire to be known to posterity as the author, but that, you and your colleagues were, in due time and place, warned that such would be the consequence of that compact; a warning which you treated with that superciliousness, which never fails to mark the deportment of the low-minded when exalted to power.

The consolation of those who attempted to defend the preliminaries, whether in parliament or out of it, was, that the great sacrifices which had been made, would tend to give stability to the peace. Disgrace they felt, and most of them, in private, acknowledged; but, disgrace they were willing to bear, because it was accompanied with security for durable repose. "The terms are such that they have left nothing to biggle about." On this standing answer to every objection urged against the preliminaries, it was observed by Lord Caernarvon, in his speech on the 3d of November, that "some noble lords would have "silenced all their apprehensions by a persuasion, that this peace will have left us "no bone of contention: it is," said his lordship, "a singular argument for the surrender of every thing valuable, that we shall "enjoy the beggar's security, who CANTAT "VACUUS CORAM LATRONE; but the present, or future, ruler of France may "again adopt the maxim, DELENDA EST "CARTHAGO, before the rest of Europe "have renewed their exhausted strength; "and, every principal point is left for future "discussion, while the preliminaries only tend "to show how much disposed we are to renounce "every thing for peace."—The Bishop of Rochester described the peace as the "semblance, the counterfeit, the pretence of "peace, which contained in it the germs of "future war, and possibly of the ruin and "destruction of this country." Lord Fitzwilliam, quoting the words of Lord Grenville, called it "a hollow and precarious "truce, that carried with it no symptoms of "security or permanency." Doctor Laurence, in the house of commons, on the same day, expressed his marked disapprobation of the vague manner in which the preliminaries were drawn up: "As," said he, "we "never, by any treaty, made such sacrifices, "so never, by any treaty, did we leave such "room for altercation."—I could go on, my lord, to show, by quoting several other members of parliament, that you had warning, and timely warning, of the disagreeable and dangerous consequence of concluding a peace, in a tone and upon terms, which should render its durability so uncertain: nevertheless, you proceeded to the conclusion of a definitive treaty, which was, if possible, even more vague than the preliminaries. "Almost every thing that, "properly speaking, constitutes the cede of "peace between nation and nation, must

"form the subject of new negotiations, instead of being completed to most practical purposes, as in former cases, by a "definitive treaty of peace, renewing former treaties. Here war ceases; peace does not begin. Every thing is yet to be negotiated, "and, when we consider the character of "our rivals and the talents of our ministers, "we cannot doubt in whose favour the result will prove." These were amongst the observations, which were made and published upon the appearance of what was then called the definitive treaty: that they were just your lordship will not, now, I presume, have the confidence to deny.

The present state of things was, then, foreseen, my lord, and you were forewarned that it would exist: you were told, that all your concessions would avail you nothing; that they would only whet the appetite of the all-devouring monster, and bring him upon you the sooner. He has not been stayed one single hour by the numerous sacrifices we have made to him; but, on the contrary, has been thereby encouraged to push on with the greater rapidity. You have come to a parley with him, and you will, if possible, patch up another short-lived armistice, which will soon be succeeded by another dispute, and that dispute by another armistice, and so on, for about two or three years, when the people, wearied with a repetition of disappointment and disgrace, will seek a shelter from both in that submission to their conquerors, to which their minds will have been gradually bent. There is nothing so well calculated to break the spirit of a nation, and to prepare it for that sort of revolution, which the French have in store for us, as an alternate series of disputes and submissions, which makes a people ashamed, first of their rulers and next of their native land, and which leads them, at last, to abandon both without regret. Tyranny has certainly produced some disaffection in the world, but cowardice infinitely more: brave men may adhere to those whom they hate, but cowards only will adhere to those whom they despise.

Since, then, it is, in my opinion, evident, that a prolongation of the present armistice would lead to certain destruction, I hope, my lord, that, in spite of your "hereditary "disposition for office," the nation will insist upon war; and, in that case, it will behove them to inquire, as I now propose to do, into the change which these six months of peace will have made in our position, naval and military, domestic and foreign.

All the members of both Houses of Parliament, and on both sides of the question, with respect to the peace, agreed as to the propriety and necessity of keeping up a considerable force by sea and land. I say all of them, because the exception of Messrs. Jones, Fox, and Robson, is hardly worth notice. How have the measures of you and your colleagues, my lord, corresponded with this unanimous opinion, with this unanimous desire? Scarcely was the treaty of Amiens ratified, when you began to discharge the sailors and to dismantle the fleet, with as much alacrity as if the French nation had been extirpated; and such admirable dispatch have you made, that, at this moment, we could not, were ever so pressing an exigency to offer, send out of the United Kingdom, a squadron of ten sail of the line. Every one knows how difficult it is to man our fleet at the beginning of a war; how long we always are before we are ready for any enterprize, or even for our own defence. I well remember, that your lordship, in stating the relative strength of the two countries, made a proud enumeration of our ships; but, my lord, ships without men are only useless masses of timber and iron, and the men who formed the soul of our eight, hundred and thirty-four armed ships are now nearly all scattered far beyond the reach of a press-gang. It is said, that from ten to twenty thousand of these men have gone to France. This is improbable; but, I have very good reason to believe, that several thousand have gone thither; and to the United States of America such is their desire to go, that ships bound to that country are now, especially from Bristol and Liverpool, frequently navigated free of the expense of seamen's wages. That the artificers, of which the dock-yards are already stripped, will follow the example of the sailors, there can be no doubt, nor can there be any, that their loss will be most severely felt. This loss, both of sailors and of artificers, would have taken place, to a certain degree, at the peace, whenever and however it might have been made; but, if France had been, by the treaty, reduced within proper bounds, or if we had retained foreign possessions to balance, in some sort, against her acquisitions on the Continent; in other words, if we had preserved, undiminished, our navigation and our honour, neither poverty nor shame would have driven our sailors and ship-owners to France, Holland, and America.

The army has experienced a fate similar to that of the navy. In all the kingdom

we have not fifty thousand effective men; and we could not bring, even in the space of ten days, twenty thousand to act together on any one spot. The militia are disbanded, not only before others are drafted and ready to supply their place, but before others are ballotted for; so that even this raw, undisciplined, feather-bed army, could not possibly be embodied in less than two or three months. You are sending round engineers to survey the coasts; be you assured, my lord, that Buonaparté has better engineers than we have, and that some of them are, too, at no great distance from your lordship. Surveys, my lord, are of little use. We cannot make a fortified place, we cannot make a septagon or an octagon of our island, covered by horn-works and half-moons; surveys of the coast may serve to excite fear amongst ourselves and mirth amongst our neighbours on the Continent, and may, moreover, afford occasion for a few decent and profitable jobs; but, my lord, rely upon it, that, if this our country is to be defended, if this dear little island, "this precious diamond" set in the silver sea," is not at last to be rifled by a host of the most desperate, rapacious, impious, and bloody villains that ever disgraced the human shape, it must owe its deliverance, under God's providence, to the hearts and arms of disciplined soldiers. The sleek-headed shop keepers and manufacturers may hug themselves with the thoughts of their salt-water girdle and of the wooden walls of Old England, and your lordship may feel equally snug behind your tripple rampart of "capital, credit, and confidence;" but, here, upon this land, the French will come, and here we must fight them, and beat them too, or surrender at discretion. In our fleet there is, indeed, great hope, but at best it is only a hope: whatever depends, even in the smallest degree, upon the winds and waves, is any thing but certain. To be in a state of defence, therefore, we must have an army, an effective disciplined army. Without this species of force we shall be in continual alarm and continual danger. Do you think, my lord, that Buonaparté, or his successor, will ever care to menace our coast? No; from this very hour, till some dreadful battle has been fought on the land of England or Ireland, we never shall experience one moment's repose, one moment's real peace. That "eternal war," against which your stupid partizans without doors were intrusted to clamour, began on the 1st of October, 1801; and the moment of its beginning was precisely that which we chose for disbanding our army.

If, by the peace, France also had been disarmed and dismantled, and if no new harbours, fortresses, or other means of safe defence and of annoyance to her neighbours, had been placed in her hands, our relative position, naval and military, would have continued the same; and peace might, in this respect, have been as safe as war. But, it so happens, that, by your lordship's peace, the enemy, in every instance, gains just as much as we lose. Your lordship and your colleagues found him so powerful as to be likely to overcome us, and in order the better to defend us against the fury of his attacks, you took the sword out of our hands and put it into his. This would have been very consistent, had you intended to have surrendered the country to the mercy of Buonaparté; but that you had no such intentions appears now evident, from the orders sent out to retain the unrestored conquests: after giving him fast hold of the sword you are endeavouring, baby-like, to take it again.

Some of our conquered, military and naval stations may, at the expense of a war, be still kept out of his hands; but of others, and those the most important too, he has already taken possession. Minorca and Elba give him great advantage in the Mediterranean; and, if it be true, that he has obtained two ports on the coast of Africa, we must send re-inforcements to Egypt, in opposition, perhaps, to the will of the Sovereign of that country, or see it again occupied by the legions of France, to the imminent danger of our East-India territories.

How far we have proceeded in surrendering our conquests in Africa and Asia is, I believe, not known even to your lordship and your watchful colleagues; and, as I will not suppose, that any man will, in the present state of things, dare to advise his Majesty to make any further surrender in those parts, I will indulge the hope, that the Cape, Pondicherry, and Cochin, are still in our hands. There is, however, no certainty of this; nor ought we to be at all surprized, if the next vessel from the Cape were to bring us the news of that most important post, for offering to give up which, Mr. Dundas declared that any minister ought to lose his head, being in the hands of the "Batavian Republic;" that is to say, of the Republic of France.

As to the West Indies, unhappily, there is no room for hope; and very little as to South America. We are told, indeed, in the ministerial gazette, that, "as a balance against French influence in Holland, we now ought to keep Surinam, Demerara, Berbice, Essequibo, and Curaçoa;" but, my lord, if these valuable colonies are not surrendered to Holland, it is neither your fault nor the fault of the Dutch. They have lost no time in sending out troops to receive them, nor you in giving orders for giving them up. If, therefore, we yet hold this part of the balance, it is by mere chance that we do it; and the same may be said with respect to the West India colonies conquered from the French, of the restoration of which, however, there can be little doubt. But, if there be an uncertainty as to the recovery, on the part of France, of the possession, there is none as to the recovery of those which were not before in her possession, and which are, on every account, the most important part of her West India possessions: I mean Guadaloupe and St. Domingo, of which the peace, and the peace alone, has again given her the command. In these two islands and their dependencies she has now, (thanks to the peace) fifty thousand effective troops, well commanded and appointed. A descent upon the island of Jamaica is the work of five hours sail. This is well known to every one acquainted with the West Indies; and, should a war be the consequence of the present dispute, real property in that our most valuable colony, would sink one-third in value, merely from the change produced by your negotiations, in the attitude and means of St. Domingo, and in the degree of security enjoyed by Jamaica. Then will it be seen, whether it was good policy in us to assist in the destruction of Toussaint; then, my lord, will the nation be enabled to form a just estimate of the wisdom of your lordship, of Mr. Addington, General Maitland, Lords Castlereagh, Ellenborough, &c. &c. who asserted, that the black army was more dangerous to our colonies than a white one could be. The same persons, my lord, who persuaded you, that the reduction of St. Domingo by France was necessary to the safety of our colonies, will endeavour to persuade you, that Le Clerc cannot find the means of transporting twenty thousand men twenty or thirty English miles across the Channel to Jamaica. Do not believe them, my lord. Le Clerc can, at any moment he pleases, put two hundred merchant ships in a state of requisition, together with all the shalloops, sailors, and every other person and thing belonging to them. That it would be useless, in a commercial point of view, for France to take Jamaica, when the sea would be covered with our ships, and when it would be impossible for her to derive any profit from the produce of the island; but, this is not the view with which she will endeavour to conquer; her profit consists in our loss; she will not seize for the purpose of preservation, but of destruction, a purpose which she would execute with all that vigilance and remorselessness, for which she is so famous. Do not believe those drivellers, my lord, when they console you with a sort of undefined hope, a sort of general confidence in God knows what, that France can do nothing by sea. They have deceived you once already: France has done something by sea; she has, in the space of seven weeks only, sent thirty-five thousand men from Brest, and landed them on the island of St. Domingo; and that too in the most tempestuous season of the year! This expedition, which she executed at the close of a war that had, according to the accounts of our financiering politicians, left her without a groat, is, in every point of view, far greater than any that Britain, with all her eight hundred ships and her three hundred millions of money, never ventured to undertake.

But, my lord, the peace restores to the service of France forty thousand seamen belonging to herself and her satellites, who, together with those which she will receive from our fleet, will form a fearful augmentation of her means of defence or of attack, by sea, while her army, instead of being reduced, like ours, to a mere skeleton, has been increasing from the signature of the preliminaries to the present day. Here your lordship will again observe: "so much the better: the paying of this immense army will "exhaust her." But here I again reply, that she will never be exhausted by such means. There is no fighting her in her 'Change Alley: she has, unfortunately for us, no such field of action: "Capital, credit, and confidence" are not upon the list of her warlike means: her dependence is not placed upon the good opinion of a set of miserable Jews, but upon the arms of her soldiers.

Disadvantageous, however, as would be the change in our naval and military position, disadvantageous as the change always must be from offensive to defensive, we shall suffer still more from the change, which the peace will have produced in our domestic and foreign affairs.

By our domestic position I do not mean our position with respect to trade, revenue, and finance: had I time to go into this subject, I could easily shew, that our trade has already been considerably diminished by the peace, and that, upon the breaking out of a war, we must experience some of the well remembered evils of 1793, without immediately deriving any benefit even from a prosperous campaign; I could show, that the revenue has been materially injured by this same "blessing" of six months, and that, so far from having made any progress in paying off the national debt, which Mr. Addington promised us would be accomplished in something less than forty five years of peace, we shall, in case of a new war, be obliged to add to it about three millions more than would have been added, in the same space of time, if the war had never ceased! This is Mr. Addington's way of "husbanding our resources;" this is the effect of that "safe" system of politics, of those "prudent" measures, for which you and your colleagues have received such applause. This is what Sir Frederick Eden most aptly calls, "improving the golden opportunity, "and catching the good that is within our "reach." But this, my lord, is not the part, in which we shall have suffered most by this short-lived armistice: we have money enough: what we are deficient in is a martial spirit, a love of national glory, which, already greatly enfeebled by the system pursued from the very beginning of the war, was extinguished by the peace, almost as completely as it is possible to extinguish a passion so natural and so ardent. You, my lord, your colleagues, and some of your defenders, rejecting with disdain, the plea of pecuniary necessity, have held a language tending to make the world believe, that there existed a sort of popular necessity; that the voice of the people imperiously demanded peace, even such an one as that which was concluded by the treaty of Amiens; and, that, therefore, if the measure has been productive of evil, the people and not the ministry are to blame. Were I to admit the premises, I should most assuredly deny the conclusion. But, far am I from making any such admission, and, were not you, my lord, amongst those, who have preferred this charge against the people, I should not scruple to assert, that they have been most grossly and shamefully slandered. Just such a charge was preferred, at the time when a former attempt was made to conclude a regicide peace. On that occasion Mr. Burke was the defender of the people:—"As to the great majority "of the nation," said he, "they have done "whatever, in their several ranks, and con"ditions, and descriptions, was required of them by their relative situations in society. They look up to that government, which they obey, that they may be protected. They ask to be led and directed by those rulers, whom Providence and the laws of their country have set over them, and under their guidance to walk in the ways of safety and of honour. They have, in all things, reposed an enduring, but not an unreflecting confidence. The people stand acquitted, if the war is not carried on in a manner suited to its objects. If the public honour is tarnished; if the public suffers any detriment; they, not the people, are to answer it, and they alone. Its armies, its navies, are given to them, without stint or restriction. Its treasures are poured out at their feet; and its constancy is ready to second all their efforts."

Such, my lord, was truly the state of things, when the first regicidal negotiations were opened, at the suggestion, and in a great degree, through the means, of Mr. Wilberforce; and such, with very little difference, it was, at the commencement of, and during, the negotiation of the preliminaries to the treaty of Amiens. Yet, it is pretty clearly understood, that the faults of the peace is now to be thrown upon the people, on "the voice of the nation, to which ministers paid a becoming deference." Of a measure, which his Majesty has been advised to describe as "honourable to the British character," and to which every epithet of praise has been affixed, by the ministers and their friends; of a measure, of which your lordship expressed a desire to be known to posterity as the author; of the peace, to celebrate which thousands and thousands of pounds of the public money were, by the ministers, expended in illuminations; of the safe, the honourable, the glorious peace of Amiens, the fault is now to be laid upon the people! And where, I pray you, my lord, will your advocates seek for proof in support of this charge? Through what channel was "the voice of the nation" conveyed to your ears? What remonstrances, what petitions, have you upon record? Was there, my lord, a single county, was there a single town, in the whole kingdom, that asked for peace? And, in spite of every effort, fair and unfair, to wring from them addresses upon that event, did they not come from every part of the country like drops of the heart's blood?

There was no fault on the part of the people: the war was never more popular than at its close, and the "universal joy," as it was called, which was expressed at the peace, only serves to show, how great is the influence of government over the minds of the people, when that influence is exerted with a hearty good will. In this instance it was so exerted, and with a most pernicious effect. The terms of the peace were so glaringly disadvantageous and disgraceful, that, to defend the treaty, it became necessary to speak of it merely as something which had put an end to war, and then to speak of war as an evil greater than all others, to describe it as "the accursed thing," which must, if not speedily got rid of, produce, some how or other, our total destruction. The defence of the treaty was, indeed, varied, as to manner, style, and phraseology, both in and out of Parliament; but I have here fairly stated the substance of it, such as it was impressed upon their minds. Before motives so imperious as these, on which this defence was grounded, all notions of honour, of justice towards our allies, of liberty, of loyalty, of national independence, and of regard for the happiness of our posterity, vanished in a moment. The people were betrayed by both sides, by the new ministerialists and by the old opposition: by the former, from motives of interest, and by the latter from motives of consistency, or rather of revenge.

From this state of mind, from this indiscriminate love of peace and hatred of war, my lord, the country has to pass through many degrees of elevation, before it again attains the altitude, from which it was hurled on the 1st of October, 1801. It may be goaded on to war; but, upon the least reverse of fortune, upon the slightest appearance of danger, upon the most distant apprehension of what the Bishop of London called "famine," it will instantly recoil. Under your auspices, my lord, it has, for the first time, grown reconciled with dishonour: in the treaty of Amiens it stands posted as a coward: you have proclaimed its inferiority to France, and thus have furnished it with the poltroon's plea, with at once an inducement to, and an excuse for, non-resistance and submission. Ask the first man you meet, my lord, what he thinks of a renewal of the war with France. He will exclaim against the ambition and the injustice of the French, and then he will conclude with these words: "but, I am afraid they'd be too many for us." Dreadful words, my lord! It is the first time they ever were heard from the lips of an Englishman; and, for the sentiment, the base and cowardly sentiment which they express, the nation is exclusively indebted to the makers and defenders of the peace of Amiens. * * * * I am reluctantly compelled to postpone the conclusion 'till the next number.

I have the honour to be, &c. &c. &c.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

The fate of Germany appears to be decided. The Emperor (see p. 638) has, by a treaty with France, agreed to accept of a certain compromise for his brother the Archduke of Tuscany; and, thus, with very little alteration, the plan, imposed on the Empire by Russia and France will be carried into effect. His Imperial Majesty has, indeed, shewn, that he has yielded to necessity, and not to the justice of either the principle or the terms of the plan of indemnities: his several remonstrances would serve as a sufficient protest against this unjust and violent proceeding; but, who can hope to see the time, when that protest shall be of any use?

Switzerland, for the independence of which, a few weeks ago, our ministers were going to war, seems still to furnish a fair ground for the interference of any body but those who have sanctioned the Treaty of Amiens. French troops have entered the country, and the larger cantons have readily submitted; but, it appears, that the lesser ones have not. Accounts from Basle of the 31st ultimo, represent the cantons of Schwitz, Uri, Underwalden, Glarus, and Appenzel, as bent upon resistance. The patriots, as they are called, have arms and ammunition, for which they will have abundant employment, as French troops are pouring in from all quarters, for the evident purpose of reducing the whole country to subjection. The number employed is said to be 40,000. This may be an exaggerated account; but, the war will bear a strong resemblance to that lately carried on in the West-Indies; and, without comparing the brave Swiss (for whatever other faults they have, they are brave) to the blacks of Saint Domingo, we venture to predict, that they will meet with a similar fate.—It is impossible to behold the present state of Switzerland, without feeling a desire to shew, from the experience of that country, how vain was the hope of finding, in neutrality, a shelter from the all-searching eye and all-devouring jaws of the Republic of France. "If," (says a writer, who is highly indignant at the conduct of Buonaparté towards the Swiss), "If there were a people upon earth that had claims to the eternal gratitude of France, it was "the unfortunate Swiss. When France was "assailed, on almost every side, by a combination of powers, such as Europe never "before witnessed; when her armies were "flying before their opponents; when Vur-dun and Thionville had opened their gates; "and even Paris was trembling for its security, did Switzerland then violate her "treaties with France? No.—She persevered, "notwithstanding the very strong solicitations of other powers. She persevered, almost singly, in her neutrality, and that "too at a period when her feelings must have "been wounded by the cowardly massacre of "that gallant band of Swiss who remained "faithful to the unfortunate Louis, when "he was attacked by one part of his subjects, and abandoned by the other." Now, without saying whether this writer took the surest way to justify the Swiss, and to excite compassion in their behalf, what a lesson is here for those members of the British parliament, who contended for neutrality as the best defence against the arms and principles of France?

Buonaparté left Rouen on the 5th, and reached Havre de Grace on the 6th. He was expected to return to Paris in a few days; but it is most likely that he will go to Boulogne and Calais, if not to Dunkirk and to Antwerp, as was expected some time ago.

The French official journal has brought us another hostile manifesto (page 592). It is, if possible, more bitter against this country, than that which we had occasion to notice in our last. It repeats, and inculcates, with great vehemence, the notion of our entire exclusion from the Continent, and it will, in that respect, doubtless, give great satisfaction to the wise-acres, and particularly to their chief, Mr. Wilberforce. The idea of the "Western Nation," too, which was first thrown out by Buonaparté to Mr. Fox, is carefully preserved. It will, by little and little, grow familiar to us; nor shall we be at all surprised to see it, in a very little time, acted upon by many persons in this country.—As a sort of counterpoise to the English press in London, the French have established an English press at Paris. A news paper entitled the Argus, is published, under the direction of one Louis Goldsmidt, an English Jew. This man has, in all probability, been for a long time in the pay of France. It was he who translated and published (at his own house), the work of HAUTERIVE. His printer, at Paris, is one McCrae, a Scotchman, who formerly carried on his business in London.—The WEEKLY MESSENGER, published by Bell in the Strand, is the only English paper which is suffered to circulate in France. There is an office for the sale of it, open at Paris, by express permission of the government. This paper is conducted by an Italian, named Badini, who has lately boasted, that Buonaparté is about to bestow a reward on him. These facts will sufficiently account for the sentiments contained in that print.—The Argus, which contains the most atrocious libels upon the British government, and upon His Majesty himself, is circulated in this country, by the clerks of the General Post-Office, who, to the great scandal of that office, are also news-venders, and some of them news-printers and publishers. The Post-Office, we are sorry to say it, is, and long has been, a scene of great abuses, which, to our knowledge, have been duly represented in vain, and which we shall, in our next number, expose to the animadversion of the public. Mr. Cobbett, in the month of June, 1801, addressed a letter to Lord Auckland, on this subject, in behalf of himself, and of the news-men and news-paper proprietors in general; and, after having respectfully waited upwards of twelve months for redress, he thinks himself at full liberty to shew, that if His Majesty be now libelled through his dominions, by the instrumentality of the General Post-Office, it is not the fault of the Editor of this work.

The question of peace or war is, as Buonaparté wishes it to be, a matter of greater uncertainty than ever. It is said, that he wants us to surrender Malta, and to suffer him to send 17,000 men to India; and it is further said, that he will leave Malta in our hands, provided we accede to the latter part of his proposition. We are far from vouching for the truth of this, though we think it is not altogether without foundation. The fact is, that our ministers themselves do not know what Buonaparté intends to do with them and their country. They are as anxious to learn news as any of us. They cannot even guess at what will happen during any six succeeding days.—PRINCE RUSSOLI has, we are informed, expressed his resolution not to accept of the Grand Mastership of the Order of Malta, which is, in reality, not legally vacant, which has, therefore, been illegally conferred, even if it had been conferred according to the provisions in the treaty of Amiens, and which, were there no other obstacle, would now be unworthy of the acceptance of any one entitled to the character of a gentleman.

The political scene, at present before us, is an undescrivable medley. While the French Ambassador enters the metropolis on one side, orders go out on the other for putting a stop to the reduction of the army: While omnium is $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. below par, while every thing has the appearance of war, the corporation of London decorate their Hall with the emblems of “the blessings of peace,” thereby verifying the words of the wise man:—“Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar, amongst wheat, with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him.”—The stock-jobbers hope there will be peace, because they think Buonaparté will not go to war, ‘till he has got all our conquests restored to him.’ Truly a most patriotic hope! Whatever foundation there may be for the stock jobbers’ hope (and we are not bold enough to say that there is none), we scruple not to declare, that if our ministers maintain what is called peace upon such terms, they deserve, and we hope they will receive, the punishment long ago allotted to a less crime by the Right Honourable Henry Dundas, who positively declared, that any minister who should ever propose to surrender the Cape of Good Hope would deserve to lose his head.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CANDIDUS, who has, in the news-paper called the STAR, made some animadversions on the letter of our worthy correspondent, Mr. JOHN TIETENSER of Reading, Berks, shall hear from us in our next.—We have received, from another esteemed friend, a valuable communication or two upon the same subject, which we shall not fail to insert in our next.

The Ballad entitled “ADDINGTON and HAWKESBURY,” and sung, as it appears, to the tune of “MOTHER SAUNDERSON,” is under consideration.—We shall be obliged to A. X. for the facts respecting the persons whom Buonaparté employs about the Press in London.—A. R. will see, in our Summary of Politics, that we have by no means forgotten the abuses in the General Post-Office.

LETTER ON THE PEACE.

This letter, of which we spoke in our last sheet (p. 549), was, as the reader will see, written on the 1st of September, 1801; and it was published in an English news-paper, called the Times, on the 23d of the same month, which was even days before the British public knew, that a treaty was concluded or nearly concluded between England and France. This circumstance is of great importance in estimating the opinions expressed by this foreigner, who seems to have understood our affairs abroad infinitely better than Lords Cornwallis and Hawkesbury. The editor of the Times remarked, by way of preface to the letter, that he “differed in opinion with some parts of the letter: but that he preferred the insertion of the whole, in order that it might be seen what opinions were entertained of the unfortunate state of the Continent in the event that Great Britain should make peace with the enemy. The writer, said he, argues very ably as a politician, viewing the situation of this country at a distance, without reflecting on the multiplied inconveniences attending the continuance of the war; and under this opinion, he is apprehensive our ministers may be disposed to concede too much, in order to attain what he conceives would be a short-lived peace.”—We shall detain the reader only one moment longer, just to remind him, that the writer of this letter is the gentleman, to whom the Register is indebted for the valuable articles contained in pages 129, 355, and 548.

SIR, Amsterdam, Sept. 1, 1801.

For these ten or twelve days past, we have been amused here with rumours of a speedy peace, and by reading your good Times we begin to be seriously apprehensive that your ministers do really think of negotiating a peace with the Arch-Consul. Nobody in England can wish more ardently than we do, but we tremble at the thought of peace, which is to crumble down the one-half of Continental Europe under the bloody feet of a republican banditti, and which must drive the other half under the iron protection of a Russian knout;* and surely no other sort of peace can be made at this juncture.

It is a singular phenomenon in the history of mankind.—Two States, in the course of a nine years bitter conflict for the extirpation of one another, have doubled their respective national powers! It is but a few years since we saw Continental Europe united with Great Britain in bloody warfare to destroy the French Republic; and now we see that same Continent at the feet of the Prime Consul, and its sovereigns receiving their orders from the aides de-camp of General Buonaparté! It was only a few months ago we saw all the maritime power of the world rallying under the banners of the French chief and his associates, for the express purpose of breaking the heart and vital strings of the British Empire; and now we see all the maritime states of Europe busied in sinking at their own ports the one-half of the scanty wrecks of their naval force to protect the other. In short, we see that Great Britain and France, by a nine years inveterate war with one another, have raised themselves to the absolute dictatorship of the universe. They stand alone, and equally powerful, at the head of the civilized world, and to which, as well as to the savage world, they might give laws and civilization without the effusion of a drop of human blood. But Great Britain and France are still inveterate enemies, each government considering the extirpation of its antagonist as necessary to its own existence!

In this state of things, upon what principle are you to make peace? and where are the men equal to the important task? To set out on the old beaten path of political combination and balance of power, you will find none of the former steps or land-marks which guided your negotiators: There are no intermediate powers now to join issue with the one party or with the other; nor is there any power, or combination of powers that can offer a mediation. Great Britain and France stand singly, and by their own internal strength; and are alone in possession of the military theatre of the world. The question of a peace between these two nations, is reduced to the simple alternative for each—Permanent preponderance in its sphere—or rapid destruction.

Will a peace, purchased upon your principle of “indemnity,” secure the permanent preponderance of the maritime empire of Great Britain? Buonaparté is at this moment sovereign lord and absolute governor from the Ems to Cadiz; from thence by Otranto to Ancona; and from Mantua to Maestricht; and that dominion renders broken-hearted Germany, the open and feeble coast of Barbary and Morocco, and the European dominions of effeminate Turkey, immediately dependent upon the Military Republic. What have you to offer to the Republic as an equivalent for her dominion and ascendancy over Europe and Africa? Conquered colonies, Malta, Egypt, the Cape, and the bonne-foi and pacific moderation of your ministry. But will their philanthropy break down that rampart which Britons have, with streams of blood and heaps of treasure, at length completed around their empire? Then the British minister (and not Buonaparté) will have made the French Republic mistress of the world! Whatever colonies, posts, or places, you give up, must necessarily become so many additional acquisitions of power to France: and in a double sense,* because they weaken Great Britain. But the concessions which Buonaparté may sneeringly make to you, cannot add an atom to the power or security of Great Britain, nor diminish in one atom the power of France.

What you give up to Buonaparté or to his dastard allies, and which may be of any value or military importance, will be instantaneously put in such a state of defence, as to secure the possession; but for what Buonaparté may give up on the part of the Republic, you can have no other guarantee than the paper on which the treaty is written. The Prime Consul may at any time sign away Holland, Brabant, Portugal, and Italy, with much indifference; for when he has disarmed you, and is in possession of your ceded colonies, the Republic can resume her dominion over those states at her pleasure: and in spite of any effort of your's to prevent her. To disarm you, and to get possession of your colonies, Buonaparté may even promise to give us back the Prince of Orange instead of Augereau; and he may displace Jourdan, to give the administration of Piedmont to the King of Sardinia; and so on *—But what then? It is only changing his prefects. For since France drew forth and felt her physical and moral force, you can neither give nor secure to any of us our national independency. Why will you then compromise the safety of Great Britain by augmenting the power of the military Republic with our foreign possessions?

No living Briton can have forgotten the peace of 1763, nor the resignation of Mr. Pitt, in 1761. When Mr. Pitt resigned in 1761, the British government was in a position to have consolidated for ever the independency of the nation, and the superiority of its maritime commerce; and the moderation, or the ill-calculated table of compensations of his successors, in their peace of 1763, brought the national means of defence to such a level, that in 1781, a random shot might have confined the British Empire to the Island of Great-Britain. The shattered remains of your foreign settlements and commerce were saved at the peace of 1783, by the sottishness of the government of France, more than by your own remaining powers. Great-Britain is now raised (by a train of events which no human sagacity could have foreseen) to where she was in 1761. Mr. Pitt has resigned; but it is to be hoped that his successor will not now set down the British Empire upon the capricious will of the cabinet of the Thuilleries, as the successors of his father deposited its existence upon the effeminate depravity of the Court of Versailles.† A second experiment of that sort will be attended with much more risk than the first; the energy of the present republic, or no matter what name you give to its government, will be found much more formidable than ever were the mean intrigues of the old monarchy.

At the peace, or soon after it, all the Spanish settlements in America are, by Lucien Buonaparté's treaty of reciprocity, open to the flag and commerce of the Republic. The settlements of Portugal, as well as of Holland, if your minister has the pacific moderation to leave us any, must be subject to the same fundamental principle

* We cannot refrain from quoting, here, a passage from Mr. Cobbett's LETTERS ON THE PRELIMINARIES OF PEACE, p. 88 and 89. "All the territory, all the commerce, and all the revenue, which your lordship affects to regard as restored to our ancient ally, are surrendered to our implacable enemy. Our sacrifices operate double against us. Not only do we yield up our strength and prosperity, but we yield them to those who will direct them against our existence. We take the point of our sword from the breast of our mortal antagonist, and, like a despicable poltroon, present him with the hilt." We make quotations of this sort in order to show the public, that the ministry sinned with their eyes open; that they despised advice, and that therefore, their ignorance, which is quite sufficient to form an excuse for any other folly however great, cannot be pleaded in their defence, on this head.

* Our ministers stopped very far short of this.

† This has been done, not, however, by "the successor" of Mr. Pitt, but by Mr. Pitt himself. The writer of this letter, like other foreigners, could have no idea that Mr. Pitt would do this thing: but truth, and justice, and the interest of the nation, require, that the deed should be ascribed to the real perpetrator.

of the Buonapartian code of universal reciprocity in trade. By the treaty imposed upon Spain, the republic acquires the sovereignty, the whole Island of St. Domingo, and also the whole Island of Porto Rico, which is to be given up within the space of three years after the general peace; and by our treaty we give up at the general peace all our settlements on the main land, that is, in Guiana, with the Island of Curacao, to France; and the government of Batavia is to use all its influence to obtain for the republic a settlement on the River Ava. These acquisitions, with what Buonaparté may have extorted, and may still extort from Portugal, might, we think, warrant your minister, however moderate, to *keep fast hold of what he has, and even to possess himself of what more he can get.

If Mr. Addington thinks it unfair to retain the colonies and settlements of the weaker powers, he should consider, that by the restitution of them he gives them up to France. Where are the national existences of Holland and Portugal, and can our independency ever be secured? And what is Spain? Are we not all three the well-bound appendages of the military republic of France? Or doth your minister purpose to set certain frontiers to the republic, by getting the other powers of Europe to guarantee his treaty with Buonaparté? Pray where are those powers for whom the Consul manifests the smallest attention or respect? The sovereigns of continental Europe are grovelling in a feverish state of mutual jealousies and mistrust of each other; and in the dastard hope of seeing their neighbours more degraded than themselves; these nerveless princes are successively become the cringing courtiers of the republican chief. The armies of the Continent are beaten; their military honours are tarnished, and their courage is crushed into a contempt of their masters. And the people—to keep up armies which have lost their countries, and to maintain governments that for the paltry price of personal safety, have sold province upon province and nation upon nation into republican servitude—are ruined and fatigued. Conviction has made them dissatisfied, and upon cool reflection they are forced to despise their cowardly rulers.† No! no! such guarantee as you can procure for us on the Continent, will not avail much. Buonaparté knows the state of Europe, and the characters of its governments, better than you do; and he knows the powers of France better than you are willing to allow that he doth.

It is painful to think that your cabinet should believe that the hero of Marengo is disposed for peace. The truth of the matter is, that if Buonaparté appears to you more pacific now than formerly, it is *because the crisis for the execution of some grand project is at hand. The more moderate and definitive the language of the Prime Consul is, the more vigilant you should be. The less you confide in the personal opinions of your public and secret agents and negotiators abroad, the better your affairs will go. It is not the soufflesse and intrigues of negotiators that are to consolidate the prosperity of the British Empire; it is to make a proper use of the powers and positions you now possess. If Buonaparté can, in the present disorganized state of Europe, disarm Great-Britain, no matter by what means, he will then have realized three-fourths of the greatest project that ever was conceived by an individual!

We observe you say, “that Buonaparté did not dare to invade England after the peace of Campo Formio, considering such an expedition impracticable.” Permit me to observe, that this remark of yours only proves that you knew as little of the general’s plan then as your ministry seem to know of the Great Consul’s projects now. The evacuation of Toulon, the affairs of Quiberon, and the evacuation of Corsica, with the easy capture and undisturbed possession of all the sea ports and places in Italy, made Buonaparté turn the proposition of a British minister—“that those who commanded on the ocean would also command the land” into a mauvaise plaisanterie; and made him form the plan, first to cut off the fruit-bearing branches of the British Empire, and to stop up the passages which nourished its roots, and then to make an easy conquest of the withered stock. When Buonaparté sailed from Toulon, he left continental Europe at the feet of the Directory; and he saw almost to reality Asia bowing before his sabre. He laughed at the idea of a naval power whose communication with land was to depend upon his individual will. Nor was there, according to his plan, any thing ridiculous in his nominating his army of the East a wing of the army of England; for he considered the power of England as immediately depending upon the British interests in Asia. Nor did the general discover the error in his calculation until he saw that the Mediterranean and the Red Sea formed a circumvallation round his new depot, and cut off Egypt from every communication with the rest of the world. He was then convinced that whoever were masters of the sea might eternalize their dominion over Egypt; and when Buonaparté met Sir Sidney Smith at St. Jean d'Acre, or rather when he left him there, and heard of the Russian armaments at St. Sebastapol, &c. he first saw that his plan was too large for his means; and then instead of vainly grasping at the wide and growing branches of the British Empire, this champion of military fortune determined, and swore by his enchanted shield to strike a mortal blow at its root.

* The facts stated in this paragraph should be well attended to.

† Would to God that this feeling, and the cause for this feeling, were confined to the ministers on the Continent!

* The new partition of Germany, for instance.

When the execution of this threat of Buonaparté's may be attempted, will entirely depend upon the measures of the British government. The Prime Consul is on his part indefatigable in his preparations for this grand event; nor will the peace signed and ratified with Mr. Addington in anywise abate his ardour, nor alter his unalterable decree. Buonaparté has partly by his victories, but principally by his code of universal reciprocity in trade, detached all Europe and America from the interests of the British government. The governments of Europe and America are not united with the republic by offensive alliances; (such are only paper securities, as you can tell), but they are united in enmity against Great-Britain, or rather against the British government, upon a principal of mutual national interests; and they are inspired with a sort of vengeful jealousy at your prosperity. So that whatever expedition the Consul may undertake against Great-Britain, he will in nowise be molested from any other quarter.

Russia's convention with you, like the Danish convention for suspending hostilities, are measures of mere convenience. They have disarranged Buonaparté's present campaign it is true, but they have not in one hair's breadth changed the dispositions of those governments in respect to you. On the contrary, your campaign in the Baltic has determined the Northern courts, and has pointed out to them the means of preventing your squadrons from ever surprising them again.

Great-Britain must stand upon her own bottom, perfectly unconnected with any leaning-stock; and she has a good bottom, which if preserved entire, may long support her against the efforts of the world, were it possible to combine the world against her.

The mild and ignorant leaders of the French Revolution annihilated the Dutch navy, crippled the navy of Spain, and put the foreign possessions of Holland, and some of those of Spain, into your possession; and the extravagance of Buonaparté has put you in possession of Malta, Egypt, and we hope by this time, of the Brazils. Thus, with the French settlements which you also possess, Great-Britain is rendered, what to be any thing she must ever be, the sole and unrivalled sovereign of the sea. But, consider the French Revolution is no ordinary assurance. If you give up or lose your present hold, you may never be able to find it again; especially, as by carrying an ostentatious formality to perhaps too great a height, the British ministry have also driven military posts and strong holds into the hands of their most powerful enemies. They have given the sovereignty of the Baltic and of the Sound to Russia, and have driven the governments of Denmark and Sweden into the cabinet of Petersburg. But as things have turned out, it only remains for the British government to stand firm in its own strength, and to make no concessions either to Buonaparté or to Alexander.

Buonaparté will most assuredly sooner or later, or whenever you give him an eligible opportunity, attempt the invasion of London; but on your guard he can do you little or no harm. Your late adopted plan of opposing him with arms similar to his own, is the most, or the best reflected arrangement you have made during the war. It disarranges all the Consul's calculations, by preventing the union of his means; and it reflects the highest honour upon its author, as well as upon the noble admiral who is charged with its direction.

Next to France, your most formidable enemy is Russia; and although the unfortunate but honest Paul is dead, it doth not alter your position. Russia and France are now the only independent powers upon the Continent of Europe; and they will very soon divide the continental world between them.*

* How fast are events verifying this assertion?

FRENCH EMIGRANTS.

The following observations have been published in a separate sheet, but, the editor of this work, ever desirous to assist, by all the means in his power, to defend the cause of the French Emigrants, thinks it right to republish it here.—This defence appears to have been drawn forth by certain publications, which, some time ago, appeared in two ministerial papers, called the True Briton and the Sun, and which contained reflections on the character and conduct of the Emigrants, full of falsehood and malice. The chief object of these attacks appears to have been, to drive the last remains of those loyal gentlemen from His Majesty's dominions, and thereby to get rid at once of the charge of maintaining them (or rather of affording them the means of a miserable existence), and of the remonstrances and threats made by Buonaparté, on their account. MR. JONES, the "honourable" the "independant" Mr. Jones, proposed, during the last session of parliament, entirely to cut off the allowance to the French Emigrants. Mr. Vansittart had brought up the report of the supplies necessary for defraying expenses relative to "American Loyalists, Botany Bay Convicts, and French Royalists;" whereupon the "honourable" Mr. Jones observed, that he hoped, that the latter would, after this, receive no more money from government, as the "feeding of them here only tended to prevent them from leaving the country." He might have better said, that it only prevented them from leaving the world! If it be asked, why discover indignation at any thing uttered by such a man as Mr. Jones? the answer is, that it is not Mr. Jones, but a member of the British Parliament, who speaks in behalf of the nation, and for whose sentiments the nation is answerable in the eyes of the world. Dastardly, however, as was the recommendation of Mr. Jones, it was less so than the attack of the True Briton: the ultimate object of both was the same, but the sentiments of the former tended merely to starve the royalists to death, while the latter endeavoured, by the means of falsehood, to fix on them a charge of perfidy, and, thereby, to rob them at once of their reputation and their bread.—In consequence of these public calumnies it was, that the following observations were written, with a view to explain the grounds, on which the royalists now in England have declined to accept of the amnesty offered them by Buonaparté.

Observations on the Senatus-Consultum of the 6th Floréal (26th April, 1802) concerning the Emigrants.

Certain French journals have of late made attacks on the emigrants in general, and in particular on those in London. Those attacks, it is true, ought not to be very formidable, since they are conveyed in papers which have constantly been the apologists of every revolutionary measure, as well as of the monsters by whom such torrents of French blood have been shed: nevertheless, as those journals may fall into the hands of many persons little accustomed to search such matters to the bottom; and who have never seen the Senatus-Consultum of the 6th Floréal, which apparently grants to the Emigrants the power of returning to their country; they may contract prejudices unfavourable to those who think they owe it to themselves to abstain from taking advantage of that law: it has appeared to me that it may be both proper and useful to offer some observations to justify them in the eyes of an impartial public.

When the revolutionary spirit broke out in France, the clergy and the noblesse, which at all times made public profession of their attachment to religion, to the laws, and to their king, strained every nerve to withstand the entire overthrow of their country.

Their opposition irritated the leaders of the factious, who perceived that they never could arrive at their object, so long as those two principal orders of the state should exist: finding it therefore impossible to gain the clergy and the noblesse, they stirred up against them the popular fury over all the kingdom; many of them were cruelly butchered, a greater number treated with every violence, the whole body threatened, and their properties plundered and laid waste. Those atrocities, far from being punished or repressed, were openly and repeatedly encouraged by the ruling party in the National Assembly, which had then usurped the whole authority in the state; and were at last pushed to such extremity, that there was no longer any safety for the members of the clergy and of the noblesse, unless they would contribute to the destruction of the altar and the throne. The King, although apparently still on the throne, was in fact absolutely stripped of all authority. They were no longer in a condition to resist the overwhelming torrent; and were reduced to the cruel necessity of becoming either the accomplices or the victims of the leaders of the day, who already made no secret of their determination to extirpate religion and destroy the King. Their choice was speedily made; they resolved to abandon their native land, and to sacrifice, if necessary, their whole fortunes, and to remove to a distance from all they held dear, sooner than be wanting to what was enjoined them by their conscience, their honour, the fidelity they owed to their country, and the oath they had taken to their sovereign.

Many members of the third order of the kingdom entering into their sentiments, followed the fortunes of the two other orders; — of such men is the body of French Emigrants composed: and who will be rash enough to assert that they were not then, and are not still the most worthy and valuable portion of the French nation?

The brothers of the King having also left France, the Emigrants considered them as the rightful representatives of his Majesty then in thralldom; and rallied round their standard, to be employed under the orders of those Princes, for the service of their unfortunate Monarch.

The efforts of these august personages for the restoration of order and lawful authority in France, and for preventing the dreadful calamities it has since undergone, not having been crowned with success; the Emigrants dispersed themselves amongst those nations whose humane hospitality offered them a retreat: and from thence they have beheld themselves proscribed, ruined in their fortunes, and treated as enemies by every faction which has successively ruled in France; and there they have supported their misfortunes with a firmness and a courage which have gained them the admiration of all observers; adhering inflexibly to the dictates of honour and loyalty.

Agreeably to this faithful picture, whose truth is known to all Europe, can the French Emigrants, in any sense of the word, be considered as guilty persons? ought they to be treated as criminals? No, certainly: — as sincere martyrs to their religion, their honour, and the fidelity due to their lawful sovereign and the laws of their country, they are entitled to the esteem of all nations; and that esteem they have obtained, and will continue to enjoy; and be the objects of the eulogiums of posterity itself.

What reproach can the present government of France itself bring against them? They withdrew from that country in consequence of the laws enacted by their persecutors, who had decreed that all Frenchmen were at liberty to choose their place of abode, the government which should best suit them, and to retire from the kingdom how and when they should think proper; and that even without any passport: since the retreat of the Emigrants, all entrance into their native land has been absolutely prohibited; or if they attempted it, how many of them have been put to death? — If a small number of them have born arms in the service of the powers at war, had they not acquired a right to do so from the moment when their families were plundered of their all, and their persons were publicly proscribed? Did not the same decrees which authorized them to make choice of the government that suited them, by implication grant to them the right of serving under the standard of that government? Besides, for what purpose did they carry arms: but to overthrow that execrable government, which had been established in their country? and can it be now brought against them as a crime by him who has thought that such a government ought to be overthrown, and who in fact has completely overturned it? Is it very prudent in him to wish to humble, nay, even render contemptible, those men whose principles he ought, for his own sake, to desire to be those of all under his command; principles which form the security of every species of government?

I now proceed to explain and examine the principal provisions of the Senatus-Consultum of the 6th Floréal; which in the speeches of the orators of the government is represented to be an act of singular beneficence:

Article I. says, that Amnesty is granted to every individual accused of emigration; yet in Article X. it is said, that one thousand persons may be excepted from the amnesty, by the government which on the 23d Sept. 1802, will make known the names of five hundred only of those proscribed Emigrants: in consequence it retains in petto the names of 500, that it may have it in its power to dispose in an arbitrary manner of the fate of all.

Article II. directs every Emigrant to return to France before the 23d of September, under the pain of being deprived of the benefits of the amnesty: that is to say, that Emigrants are compelled to quit the asylum they enjoy in foreign parts and return to France, before they can know whether or not their names are amongst the thousand to be excepted from the amnesty; and who, until the same period, are utterly unknown.

Article III. directs, that every Emigrant, on his return to France, shall, before a commissary of the government, make a declaration that he was an Emigrant, and that he now returns in virtue of the Act of Amnesty:—that is to say, that he publicly and formally avows himself to have been a criminal: for where there is no guilt, there can be no room for amnesty.

What can have induced the French government to desire, that men alive to the sense of honour, and supported by a good conscience, should disgrace themselves so far as to declare themselves guilty, when they have not seen the slightest blame attached to their conduct? Has the government not perceived, that if there were, among the Emigrants, some persons compelled by irresistible circumstances to comply with their requisitions, such persons must suffer more by the terms imposed on them, than by all manner of wretchedness, and by even death itself: who therefore can blame those who will not expose themselves, by a return to France, to such extreme humiliation?

Article IV. requires every Emigrant, on his return, to take an oath of fidelity to the government: and Art. XII. directs that he shall remain under the special inspection of government for the space of ten years, or even of his natural life; a precaution surely necessary with respect to suspected persons alone.

These two articles brought together intimate to every Emigrant, that even when he takes the prescribed oath, no trust is placed in him; on the contrary, that he is regarded as an unprincipled wretch, whom no oaths can bind. Can any thing be more insulting, or more disgraceful for the man who consents to be treated in such a manner.

Article V. requires all Emigrants, on their return to France, to renounce every sort of pension or other appointment they may have received from the justice or bounty of foreign states; whilst that government which seems to recall them to their country, not only does not restore to them their properties, most illegally as well as unjustly confiscated; but does not hold out to them, even the most slender means of existence: so that one might imagine they were engaged to return to France merely to exhibit them in all their wretchedness, and to render them despicable in the eyes of their fellow-citizens, by a comparison of their miserable condition with that of those who now wanton in abundance gained at the expense of the Emigrants themselves; and this appears more evidently, when we take notice that they are by the law obliged to renounce the settlements made on them by foreign nations, before they can be certain that they are not in the number of the thousand to whom the government does not extend the benefits of the amnesty.

In conformity to the 13th Article, the government is empowered to confine the Emigrants to their ordinary place of abode, or to appoint for them another at pleasure: that is, in other words, that they may be imprisoned or banished, without any means of protection against the most arbitrary orders. Can those Emigrants who have so long enjoyed in England full and entire liberty under the protection of the laws, endure a situation so nearly allied to slavery.

Articles XVI. and XVII. state, that the estates and properties of Emigrants shall be restored to them, with the exception of such as the republic has seized in virtue of a forced division of successions! of those which have been sold or employed for the public service; of woods and forests; duties payable on canals; of demands against the state; revenues due, &c. &c. &c. so that these exceptions include almost the whole property; and ninety-nine Emigrants out of an hundred will have nothing to recover in consequence of the Senatus-Consultum.

Such then is the last law relating to Emigrants, which hath procured so many commendations to the French Government: and occasioned its humanity, its justice, its beneficence to be extolled, not only by the official journals of France, but even by several English writers, who certainly had never read the decree, or who had not fully understood its meaning. Had they examined it with attention, they would have discovered that that law was as impolitic as severe; particularly if they had compared it with the law enacted in Holland on the same subject. The Batavian Government perceived that the only way to put an end to the civil broils and disorders occasioned by the revolution, was to endeavour to reconcile the contending parties, and not to suffer one of them to oppress the other: they have felt, that he who devoted himself to the defence of the government for so many years established in his country, may be unfortunate, but can never be criminal.

The French Emigrants, from the first, perceived clearly, that the provisions of the Senatus-Consultum were dreadful to them: notwithstanding, many of them, worthy and estimable men, overcome by the desire to revisit their native land, never to be extinguished in the heart of a Frenchman, once more to behold the dearest objects of their affection, and by the earnest and repeated solicitations of relations, have resolved to return to France, and to submit to all the hardships imposed on them: thus sacrificing themselves for the good of their families. But what did these unhappy men not suffer before they brought themselves to take that step: some are no more; and how many others have shed bitter tears when receiving the last assistance government bestowed on them, that they might be enabled to repair to their families and friends in France.

There is, however, still a great number who, firm and steady in their principles, will listen only to what their conscience, their honour and sense of duty dictate; and who are determined to do nothing, even in appearance, contrary thereto. Having once taken an oath of fidelity to their King, they think they ought not to do so to a government which occupies his place. They feel too powerfully what they owe to themselves and to the French name, to be willing to expose themselves to be insulted and rendered contemptible in the eyes of all nations as well as their own: they have therefore preferred passing the remainder of their days in an honourable exile.

From this explanation of and observations on the Senatus-Consultum of the 6th Floréal, the accuracy of which is incontestable, I flatter myself that my readers, while they excuse and pity such Emigrants as have, from the powerful motives now stated, resolved to return to France, will at the same time applaud the firmness of others who have been able to resist them.

These last, far from meriting blame, must have acquired a fresh claim to the esteem and regard of all good men: but in a special manner in England, where they have long enjoyed both; where they have been protected and assisted in a generous manner; and where, better than in any other country, a just value is set on sincerity, honour, and loyalty, and that noble dignity of mind which elevates the man, but which is far removed from overbearing haughtiness and pride.

NOTICES OF NEW BOOKS.

I. On the State of Europe before and after the French Revolution; being an Answer to L'Etat de la France à la Fin de l'An V III. By Frederick Gentz, Counsellor at War to his Prussian Majesty, &c.: translated from the German, by John Charles Herries, Esq.—“L'Etat de la France à la Fin de l'An VIII.” was written by M. Hauterive, under the authority of the French government; and published at Paris, in the autumn of 1800. Mr. Gentz, in his answer to this work, has shewn great political knowledge, great powers of reasoning, and exemplary temper. In all controversial writings, the shortest and surest path to victory is a clear and accurate arrangement of the subject. This path Mr. Gentz has pursued with complete success. The “lucidus ordo,” the logical divisions and subdivisions of his materials, raises a prepossession in favour of his integrity, prepares the mind for pointed attention, greatly assists the memory, and enables the reader to judge if the several arguments are fairly applicable to the several positions, and if the different parts of the work form one well-digested whole. Besides the excellence of his arrangement, Mr. G. has great merit in the arguments which he advances under each head: these are always perspicuous, pertinent, full, and, generally, convincing. The nature of political reasoning forbids that it should be always conclusive: for the wisest statesman can do no more by argument, than shew a strong probability that certain supposed events will result from certain given circumstances; and we think that most of the positions laid down by M. Gentz, are supported by much stronger reasons than can be brought against them.

The following extracts will (we think), recommend this work to the perusal of every person, who wishes to understand the past, present, and probable state of Europe: and every Englishman must be particularly gratified, in seeing his country vindicated from those false and insidious charges, so industriously propagated by the French writers, that England has long aimed at obtaining a general monopoly in commerce, and the power of tyrannising over all the other maritime states. Mr. Gentz begins his examination of M. Hauterive’s “L'Etat de la France, &c.” in the following manner:—“The object of the work we are now about to examine, is no other than to shew, that Europe is in future to be indebted to the beneficial influence of France, for the maintenance of all peace and security, and for the preservation of its social and political constitution: that, on account of her situation, her relations to other powers, and the principles of her present government, France can desire and aim at nothing else than the common welfare of all nations, the independence and stability of all governments; and that her political and military greatness, her natural and acquired riches, her present system of administration, and the advantages of a constitution according with the manners and inclinations of her inhabitants, furnish her abundant means, not only to maintain the position she now occupies, but to protect and regulate the nations around her; to establish and preserve the equilibrium among them; and, in short, to become and continue the common centre of a system composed of all the states of Europe. To arrive at this result, M. Hauterive leads us gradually through a series of historical and political reflections, the substance of which is contained in the following propositions.—1st. That at the commencement of the French revolution, there existed no effective law of nations, and no good system of government; that authority was guided by no established maxims; and, that the true principles of the political and federal constitution were neglected or forgotten.—2d. That the war afterwards waged against the French revolution, was the necessary consequence of this universal internal and external anarchy: it was only the last and open effort of that destructive malady which had long been preying upon the vitals of every state, and destroying the frail fabric which supported their connections with each other.—3d. That the event of war has restored France to the place which she ought always to occupy, not only for the sake of her own security, but for the security of all Europe. France is now in a situation to give Europe a new federal constitution, in which its proper place may be assigned and guaranteed to each particular state.—4th. That the stability of the present internal constitution of France, (the necessary foundation of its future political influence), rests upon the most extensive mass of natural, artificial, commercial, and military resources, of which any nation can boast; upon a system of administration, simple, regular, and wise; upon a happy equality between the income and expenditure of the state. It rests, moreover, upon a government exactly adapted to the social and moral condition of the country, perfectly suited to the wants and desires of its inhabitants; and lastly, upon the talents and character of those whom this constitution has placed at the head of affairs.”—“Such is the spirit, such is the argumentation which pervades M. Hauterive’s work: every one, who has read it with attention, will admit the justice of this representation; and the author himself would hardly refuse to acknowledge it. A full examination of its principles will be naturally divided into four principal parts; the first of which will be, an Inquiry into the State of Europe before the War; the second will treat of the Situation of Europe during, and after that War; the third will consider the present Relations between France and the other European Powers; and the fourth will examine the internal Constitution of the French Republic; taking them all, however, in those points of view in which the author has considered them.—Of these four principal parts, the three first only* are considered by Mr. Gentz, under the following heads of argument:—1st. How far did the treaty of Westphalia establish a system of public law in Europe? 2d. How far has the treaty of Westphalia been subverted by the civilization of Russia, the elevation of Prussia, or the commercial and colonial system? 3d. Did there exist any public law in Europe at the beginning of the French revolution? and herein, of the internal conditions and political relations of France, Austria, Prussia, Russia, and England. 4th. General observations on the present relations between France and the other states of Europe. 5th. France, and her allies. 6th. France, and her enemies. 7th. An inquiry into the principal causes of complaint against the commercial-tyranny of England; and herein, of the Navigation Act, the monopoly of trans-European dominions, and the monopoly of British manufactures.—All these several points are very fully and fairly argued: we can insert only some of the conclusions which Mr. Gentz draws from his general arguments.—The inquiry into the object and effects of the treaty of Westphalia is closed by the following remark, p. 13.—“Whoever expected that the treaty of Westphalia would be the foundation of an universal political system to last for ever, must have expected more from it than any treaty ever could possibly fulfil. It has effected all that it could, or was intended to perform; and, what is more, its fundamental principles have endured longer, and with less alteration, than has, perhaps, been the case with respect to any other treaty. Among its fundamental principles, however, I reckon only those which immediately refer to the constitution of the German empire, and those which regard the relations between France and Germany. Before we can determine

* Mr. Gentz has promised a sequel to this work, now under our examination, in which sequel, it is presumed, that an inquiry into the internal constitution of the French Republic will have a place.

“ what subsequent events have overturned, “ or materially endangered the treaty of Westphalia, we must proceed to examine how far either of these fundamental articles “ have been affected by them.”—The following extract closes what Mr. G. has advanced to prove, that, at the beginning of the French revolution, there did exist a federal constitution, or certain relations between the several states of Europe, for the maintaining a balance of power among them, p. 178.—“ I ventured to assert, that “ we ought, upon the whole, to be satisfied “ with the federal constitution, though defective in several important respects; if “ between the principal states composing “ that constitution there existed a due balance of power; if their stability were “ secured, their progress and improvement “ unrestrained; if the independence of the “ smaller states were protected, so much at least, as, in a community with the strong, “ the weak can be effectually protected; “ and if there were no such preponderance “ on any side, as to threaten the liberties of “ the neighbouring states, or endanger the “ peace of the whole.—If the preceding “ survey of the several relations of the “ leading powers be fundamentally accurate, it will not be difficult to form a satisfactory opinion of that federative system which the French revolution found, “ and destroyed; and to decide whether “ (as M. Hauterive has asserted), before “ the revolution all the governments of Europe were in a position false and unnatural with regard to one another, oppressive “ and ruinous with respect to their subjects.”—And, (p. 184.) “ If, in the year “ 1786, the question had been put to any “ candid statesman, (for reason has nothing “ to do with the demands of extravagant “ enthusiasm), if any reasonable and enlightened citizen of the world had been “ asked,—Whether it were advisable to improve the social constitution of Europe, “ by a general and sudden dissolution of all “ existing relations? It is probable that his “ only answer would have been a smile of “ contempt, or an exclamation of horror. “ This dissolution has actually taken place; “ and lamentations are now in vain. Nothing more remains for political wisdom, “ than to search among the ruins of the “ former edifice the materials of a new one. “ But, in order that the mischief may not “ be irreparable, we must banish the fatal “ opinion, that it was unavoidable; and the “ still more fatal one, that it was useful and “ beneficial. The disease is too manifest

“ to be denied; but a false idea of its origin, conceived by mistaken, and encouraged by crafty empirics, has diffused the “ specious persuasion, that it was a salutary “ crisis, and a necessary step to improvement. Until this delusion be dissipated, “ there are no hopes of amendment.”—After proving, by a minute examination of the present relations between France, and the other European states, the great difficulty of making any effectual opposition to the dangerous preponderance which France has obtained by the final event of the war, Mr. G. concludes this head of argument, with the following important observation, p. 264.—“ It “ is a characteristic property of all great “ disorders in the political system, that they “ do as much injury to the states apparently “ benefited by the destruction of the balance, as to the immediate losers, by the “ disproportion introduced. It is the true “ and permanent interest of every nation, “ without exception, to preserve a due proportion between its own strength and that “ of its neighbours; and to maintain a just “ distribution of power among all the members of the federative system. The advantages of a dangerous ascendancy are “ always deceitful; for the public welfare “ of a nation cannot be secure without the “ satisfaction of its neighbours, and the confidence of the world. An enlightened “ policy requires a due attention to these “ important requisites of peace, on the part “ of the greatest, as well as the smallest “ states. Were France to distinguish her “ true interests, were the voice of reason “ to prevail above the dictates of ambition “ and avarice, her statesmen would easily “ be convinced that what now is called, by “ a shameful abuse of words, the federative “ system of Europe, is nothing but a compound of inordinate power on the one “ hand, and impotence on the other; in “ which no real independence, no stability “ or security, and no permanent peace can “ exist; and which is consequently incompatible with the general welfare.”—Of the nature of alliances with France, Mr. G. speaks in the following explicit manner, p. 273.—“ The author of the Etat de la France, has dignified the alliances of the “ French republic with Spain, Holland, and “ Genoa, by calling them the first foundation of a future federal edifice. He quotes “ them as honourable and irresistible proofs “ of the generosity and disinterestedness “ of the republic, as assurances of the uprightness of her principles, and as the “ productions of an almost wonderful poli“tical wisdom, &c. Such were the alliances (though the terms were certainly more favourable), of Sicily, Greece, Asia Minor, Egypt, &c. with the Romans! If the future alliances of France are to be formed on these models; if the present condition of Switzerland and Holland, Italy and Spain, awaits all those to be hereafter leagued with the French government, it may well be asked, whether the friendship and protection of that power are less fatal than her declared enmity. If these relations, formed and maintained by force of arms, are to be the basis of a new federal system, and a future law of nations, Europe must ardently wish that the superstructure, to be raised upon such a foundation, may never be completed, &c. Thus have her alliances been hitherto formed; and thus will it be with all succeeding ones. Such must, and will continue to be the system of politics, when the ascendancy of one nation has destroyed the security of all; when, deprived of every federative safeguard, the weak are reduced to utter helplessness, and the law of nations is supplanted by the law of force.” This picture is faithfully drawn; and the likeness has even become stronger than it was when Mr. Gentz wrote. Nor has Mr. G. shewn less acuteness or judgment in his examination of the situation of France, with respect to her enemies; under which head of argument the following passage deserves particular attention.—Mr. Hauterive asserts, that France has no natural enemy; she recognises none. On this declaration of affected magnanimity and insolent superiority, Mr. Gentz observes, that “There do exist natural enmities between nations, although a more exalted policy may refuse to acknowledge them. I mean by natural enmity, the relations between two states, whose geographical, political, or military situations, or some object common to their industry or desires, though not equally attainable by both, induce a state of continual jealousy, and, consequently, of continual, more or less active opposition. Such was the relation formerly subsisting between Carthage and Rome; two nations, whose irreconcilable enmity, so conspicuous in history, presents an instructive lesson to mankind. In the same relation towards each other, have France and England stood since the beginning of the seventeenth century, from the moment when a large portion of the industry, the power, and the glory of both began to be founded “upon an extensive commerce; when the policy and ambition of both began to be principally directed towards remote settlements and colonial monopoly, and to a powerful marine, as the necessary means of securing these advantages; and when each became the centre of a distinct federal combination, and struggled with its rival for the first place in the general system of Europe. All these natural sources of perpetual opposition have continued, under different appearances, and with various results, until the present day: they will still continue to exist, and to produce the same effects. And although we may hope that wisdom and prudence will moderate their fatal influence, and avert from ourselves and our posterity the shocking tragedy of an internecine war, yet this deep-rooted and extensive rivalry must be taken into the account, in every political reasoning, as one of its constant and most important elements. On the other hand, it is equally certain, that France, before the revolution, stood towards no continental power whatever in the unfortunate relation of a natural enemy, &c. The revolution could not but fill Europe with apprehensions of the most alarming nature, and inspire all that surrounded France, whether friends or enemies, with fear, resentment, or disgust. But had the federal constitution of Europe been replaced on its former footing, at the close of that revolution, had the French nation recurred to its former limits, or the balance of political and military power been restored; whatever might have been the final result of her internal convulsions, the relations of peace and amity formerly subsisting between France and all the continental powers would, in some way or other, have been re-established.—Is that now to be hoped or expected? All Europe bleeds at the wounds inflicted by the aggrandisement of France; and her dreadful preponderance still threatens, like an impending storm ready to burst over the heads of a trembling world. Do we here find the materials for a system of peace, of mutual confidence and security? Does this constrained relation present the prospect of a happy renewal of the bonds of federal union? Is not the whole system, so long as it may yet endure, forced on the contrary to maintain an armed and constant opposition to France? And does not such an armed opposition resemble in “ many essential respects, a state of perpetual war?—The truth therefore is, that France, who before the revolution had no natural and permanent enemy on the continent, is now (in a certain sense of the word) surrounded by nothing but enemies. She may, relying on her great power, continue to despise these enemies: she may even, by moderation and equity in her proceedings, disarm their mistrust for a time: finally, by the coincidence of temporary interests, she may perhaps obtain the alliance of one or other of them. But all this does not invalidate the grounds of my assertion: I still hold by what is permanent and essential in the political system. And to the assertion—that France now acknowledges no natural enemy—I oppose one, which is certainly more conformable to reason and experience, than in the common course of things, a nation, situated as France now is, cannot reckon upon any natural friend.” The following extract, which concludes Mr. Gentz’s Inquiry into the principal Causes of Complaint against the Commercial Tyranny of England, must give peculiar pleasure to every English reader; especially when he recollects that this complete vindication of his country is written by a foreigner, entirely unconnected with England, and consequently unbiassed by any party-spirit or national prejudice. — “ I conceive that the foregoing observations have nearly fulfilled the object I had in view. My design was to rectify the prevailing opinion, with respect to the dangers and evils arising from the commercial superiority of England. I flatter myself I have sufficiently proved, that neither the maritime statutes of Great Britain (I speak of her domestic regulations) nor what is called the British monopoly of colonial produce, nor the indisputable superiority of her manufactures, afford any real or just cause of accusation or complaint. In my inquiry into these complaints, I have uniformly adhered to those principles, which every enlightened mind now reverence with unqualified assent; which alone can lead to the perfection of political economy; and from which Europe has to expect the most important improvements in every branch of general welfare. On these indisputable principles, it is evident that what the ignorant multitude, instigated by sophistical declaimers, decry as the commercial tyranny of the English, is in reality a most essential part of the wealth,

“ an active principle of the industry, and a fruitful source of the present and future riches of all nations: that the only method of diminishing the superiority of British industry, which can be recommended or admitted, is the promotion and encouragement of the same activity in other countries, which would benefit the whole without injuring England; and that every project for actually destroying the foundations of Britain’s power and commercial greatness, by direct and violent attempts upon it, must ultimately prove its author an enemy to the general welfare of Europe. In her peaceful relations we see England in constant and perfect harmony with the interests of the social system of Europe. If she have any way deserved the reproaches of her numerous adversaries, the causes must be sought in other relations; they must be founded on her conduct in war towards countries not immediately engaged in it; and on the abuse of her well-earned superiority, in her oppression of the weak. How far they really are so, will be discussed in a sequel to the present work.”—We hope that the importance and merit of the foregoing extracts will apologize for their length.—To his translation of Mr. Gentz’s book, Mr. Herries has prefixed an introduction of considerable length. It contains an historical account, fairly and clearly written, of the conduct and motives of the Northern Powers, which were parties to the armed neutralities. But the unreasonableness of the pretensions set up by those powers, and the vindication of the maritime code as practised and insisted upon by England, have been more largely and far more ably discussed by Dr. Croke in his excellent “Remarks on Mr. Schlegel’s work upon the Visitation of Neutral Vessels under Convoy.”—The following is the only passage in this introduction which we shall particularly notice. Mr. Herries has said (p. 72).—“ The treaty of the 17th of June, 1801 (with Russia), does great credit to the ministry by whom it was concluded; and we may rest assured that, under their guidance, the honour of our country will be effectually asserted, and its interests vigilantly guarded.” The prophetic part of this eulogy has been woefully falsified; and against this unqualified approbation of our treaty with Russia we enter our formal protest. Because it appears to us that in the third section of the eleventh article of this treaty, in which section is specified "what shall be considered as contraband of war," no mention is made of hemp, cordage, sail-cloth, pitch, or masts. Yet of most, if not all of these articles consists the far greater part of the cargoes imported from Russia and Sweden, for the purpose of supplying the dock-yards of different states with warlike naval stores. It would not be difficult to point out other objections; but it is not our intention to review Mr. Herries introduction, which we are of opinion will do neither harm nor good.

2. Thoughts on the late General Election, as demonstrative of the Progress of Jacobinism.—

By John Bowles, Esq.—Mr. Bowles endeavours to awaken the nation and the government from that state of imaginary security, into which they were lulled by the sound of peace. After giving a concise and accurate account of the Jacobinical proceedings at Norwich, at Westminster, at Coventry, and particularly at Brentford and at Nottingham, he proceeds to show, that they were the natural fruit of unextinguished Jacobinism. In speaking of the German school of philosophy, he cites certain provisions from the new code of criminal law proposed to be adopted in Bavaria, which are truly curious. He closes his pamphlet with the only observation in it, of which we do not approve:—

"A new parliament is about to assemble, which will, probably, hold in its hands, the fate of the British empire, and, perhaps, that of the whole civilized world.

"To assist it in the arduous duties which it will have to perform, it has the inestimable benefit of example and experience.

"To the wisdom, firmness, and energy of the last parliament, we are indebted, under

"Providence, for the happiness of seeing our revered sovereign once more convene

"the states of his kingdom, and of still enjoying, unimpaired, all the forms and "privileges of our incomparable constitution." By parliament Mr. Bowles must here mean the House of Commons, because, otherwise, the word last is altogether inapplicable. And, if this be his meaning, we regret, that he did not point out some particular instances of that wisdom, that firmness, and that energy, which are to serve as an example for the present parliament. Were all, or any one of, these qualities displayed in the almost unanimous vote which was given in favour of the Peace of Amiens? In short, we narrowly watched the proceedings of the House of Commons; we saw twenty bills of great importance passed without twenty members in the House; we saw very little public spirit, and very little of that sort of conduct which we would wish to see imitated. We saw a poor, tame, spiritless set of men, following the minister of the day, let him be who or what he would; we saw Mr. Pitt making a conveyance of their support as if it had been his property in the fee simple; we saw—we saw enough to wish never to see the like again.

—In every other sentiment expressed in this valuable pamphlet we most heartily concur. The appendix contains some very interesting documents respecting the Bastille, as it is called, and as it always will be called, till its real name be made shorter than that of The House of Correction in Cold Bath Fields.

3. Vindication of the Political Conduct of the Rt. Hon. William Windham, addressed to his Opponents at the late Election for the City of Norwich.—There is certainly an error in the title of this pamphlet: Mr. Windham stood in no need of a vindication, on account either of his political conduct or his political opinions, the former none but knaves and fools have ever censured, and the latter have now received the sanction of woeful experience.—

This error is, however, but a trifle, when set against the great merit of the contents of the pamphlet, which is written with energy and elegance, and which abounds in just and useful observations, particularly relating to the bill for the suppression of bull-baiting. The passage on this subject, which we could wish to extract, is too long for insertion here; but we shall certainly give it a place in the Supplement to the present volume of the Register.

The concluding part of it, however, we cannot refrain from quoting:—"Should these "plans of puritanical legislation proceed, the humours, and the inclinations of the "people will be reduced to that state of vassalage, which is always followed by an

"utter depravation of public character. A more desolate, comfortless state of society

"can scarce present itself to the imagination, than that which the schemes of "these sanctified reformers are hastening to establish. When they are matured, (an "event fervently to be deprecated) all high-minded, virtuous courage, all the heroic

"qualities, will die away amongst us. When the theatres, to which we resort to divert

"the mind by a fanciful exhibition of human follies, or to soften it by affecting

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—In your remarks on the election of Prince Ruspoli to be Grand Master of the Order of Malta (see Register, p. 512) you admit this election to be contrary to the treaty of Amiens, and conclude with saying—"whether we have a right to hold " this island is another question." Now, if what is reported be true, viz. that the First Consul has compelled the Dey of Algiers to cede to him two ports on the coast of Barbary, it seems to me that our holding Malta, until France or some other power shall take it from us, ought to be no longer a question: I say this upon the supposition (which will scarce be disputed) that our possessions in India might be endangered by the French becoming masters of Egypt. It is now clear beyond all doubt, that the First Consul has determined to repeat his attack upon Egypt, for on no other account would it be worth his while to expend a single livre in maintaining these two African ports. It was doubtless with a view to this enterprize that he has forced an election of a Grand Master of Malta, contrary to the treaty of Amiens, and in the hope that our government might suffer this manœuvre to pass unnoticed. That Malta would be in effect his own the moment it should be garrisoned by Neapolitan troops, he certainly knows: but he also knows by experience, that even the possession of Malta is not sufficient to keep up a safe communication between Egypt and France in opposition to a British fleet. He has therefore endeavoured to make assurance doubly sure, by getting into his hands these two ports; which, whether they are capable of receiving large ships of war or not, will at least serve as a shelter for frigates and transports, and convenient places of rendezvous for troops. On his part then, this measure of having an establishment on the coast of Barbary is prudent and worthy of his military foresight. Fortunately on our part we can shew equal prudence and foresight in not suffering Malta to go any more out of our hands: that island affording the only point of effectual opposition to the apparent designs of our enemy. So much for the prudence of the respective conduct of England and France on this occasion. With respect to right and justice, the case seems to stand thus. The acquisition of the African ports by France is unjustifiable, because those ports can serve only as posts of attack, and are therefore preparatives to the execution of an hostile intention against England, which has certainly shewn no hostile intention against France. The retaining of Malta by England is justifiable, because that island can serve only as a post of defence; but then it is a post essential to the defence of a part of our possessions against which France has, by her acquisition of the African ports, manifested an hostile intention. Our retaining that island is therefore justified by the law of self-defence, which supersedes all other obligations.

You have said well, Sir, (p. 248) that " the people of England might with some " shew of reason complain, if a peace, " purchased with the safety and honour of " England itself, were so soon to be broken " for the sake of a nest of pirates,"—and let the First Consul and the Dey of Algiers settle the matter as they please between themselves; but whether the First Consul persist in keeping or consent to relinquish these ports, our ministers are to look to the security of our empire in India, and never to suffer the only point of defence in Europe to pass into the hands of France through the medium of an unsubstantial and helpless guarantee.

It is possible that the First Consul, on due consideration of his late conduct and present situation, may not undertake to compel us to perform an article in the treaty of peace which he himself has manifestly infringed. But, in case of necessity, let us oppose to the frequently repeated maxim of the French Republic "delenda est Carthago," a more novel and less presumptuous maxim—" tenenda est Melita."

A Plain Speaker.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,

A Sunday Paper having called the attention of government to an improvement of the situation of the Irish catholic clergy, as a body embracing great talent, great worth, and dependant on a wretched eleemosynary pittance, perhaps the following statement may be sufficient to shew that the popish clergy receive, in fees, for the different offices of their function, more than the whole amount of tythes paid to the established church.—By an estimate of the late Bishop of Cloyne, it appears that the aggregate tythes of all the parishes, including deaneries and other dignities, amount to £148,118. 1s. 8d., which, divided by one thousand, the stated number of clergy, gives an average of £148. 2s. 8½d. to each.—Now, it is calculated that one million five hundred thousand catholics go to confession twice every year, when each deposits one shilling British. This amounts to - - - £162,500 0 0

Suppose, then, another million of shillings presented at the altar at Christmas - - - 54,166 13 4
 Christenings, marriages, and funerals, estimated at - - - 20,833 6 8

Total - £237,500 0 0

Hence the emoluments of the catholic clergy exceed the tythes paid to the established church, by at least £88,381. 18s. 4d.—To this may be added the great profits arising from several other religious ceremonies, all which are paid for, such as extreme unctions, masses for the dead, indulgences, commutation of penances, &c. It is not fairly stated, then, that the situation of the Irish catholic clergy, all of whom must be single men, calls for improvement, while those of the established church, nearly the whole of whom are respectable in point of birth and education, are constrained to live on much less, and even to support large families. Neither is it true that their wretched pittance, as this paper styles it, is elemosynary; on the contrary, it is demanded as a right, for the performance of those services ordained in the rituals of their church, and which would otherwise be withheld. I do not wish, Sir, to detract from the merits possessed by any class whatever: doubtless there may be individuals among the communion alluded to, as among all great bodies, who are endowed with talent and worth; but those who have been witnesses of their general habits, will find no reason to appreciate such talent and worth, to the prejudice of the established clergy of Ireland, whose erudition, morality, and loyalty, were never excelled by any society of men; and whose laudable exertions have been so conspicuous during the late unhappy disturbances in that country.—There are parishes in Ireland without either churches or glebe-houses, the incumbent, or his curate, being obliged to read prayers every Sunday in some obscure room obtained for the purpose. Should not, then, the paper alluded to (and which I have ever considered as an advocate for the established church), rather approve of public money being applied to remedy those defects, than to augment the income of men who have already more than the protestant clergy?—What I have now advanced is merely with a design of correcting an erroneous statement, and by no means directed to the attention of government; being fully satisfied, that while so much talent and integrity preside at the helm, whatever measure may be adopted on this, or any other subject, will be the result of that judgment and equitable decision, which have marked the whole of his administration. I am, Sir,

Your most obedient servant, A. L.

PUBLIC PAPERS.

Definitive Conclusum adopted by the Deputation of the Diet of Ratisbon, on the 21st of October, and the Opinion of Austria on the General Plan of Indemnities.

It shall be declared to the ministers of the mediating powers, that the Deputation have maturely weighed, according to its importance, the new general plan which was transmitted to them under the date of the 8th of this month. They acknowledge, in the first place, the benevolent regard which the mediating powers and their ministers have had for the representations and remarks which the Deputation have made upon the first declaration. They acknowledge besides, with the warmest gratitude, not only the benevolent views and efforts by which the mediating powers have sought to accelerate the re-establishment of order and tranquillity in the empire, but also the indefatigable zeal with which their ministers have sought, hitherto, to fulfil this task. And as the doubt which the Deputation still had, upon the subject of the new plan, is done away by the illustrations given in the Notes of the 13th and 19th of this month, they make no more difficulty in accepting, in all its extent, the general plan of the 8th. In consequence they will adopt, without delay, conformably to that plan, the necessary decisions upon the regulations to be made; they will unite the whole in one act, in order to be able to communicate it to the ministers of the mediating powers. The present Conclusum shall be delivered, in the accustomed forms, to the Imperial Plenipotentiary, with the request that he will adhere to it, and communicate it to the mediating powers.—The Minister of the Teutonic Order lamented that the Conclusum was drawn up, without waiting for the instructions he expected to receive.—In the same sitting in which the Conclusum was passed, the Minister of Austria gave his vote upon the general plan of the indemnities; it is as follows:—"In conformity with the instructions of his court, the Sub-delegate considers the object of the deliberation under two points of view; that is, under that of the justice of the claims made to the Deputation of the Empire for his Royal Highness the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and next under that of the conciliatory dispositions and measures of the Imperial and Royal Court. The Sub-delegate establishes, that France, as a contracting party at the peace of Luneville, cannot conclude any convention with others, nor prescribe plans of indemnities which attack any stipulations whatever of that treaty; on the other hand, the part of mediator does not give the faculty of injuring the rights of a party interested, and the Deputation cannot accede to a plan which injures the treaty of Luneville, considered as the basis and motive of their being convoked. By the treaty of Luneville, the Grand Duke of Tuscany is to be indemnified completely; and that indemnity is neither to be found in the first nor the second plan of indemnities; and to the surprise of the Imperial Royal Court, no regard has been had in the modified plan to the representations made upon the subject, though measures have been taken to answer all other claims. In equity no one can put a false interpretation upon the dispositions of his Imperial Majesty, if he sees himself under the necessity of protecting in the most solemn manner, the rights of his august brother, and of protesting against the adoption of the modified plan of the mediating powers. The legitimacy of this protest cannot be invalidated by any essential reason founded upon the public law of Germany; neither by the majority of votes of the Deputation, because that majority has not authorised the Deputation to outstep the limits and end of its full powers; neither by the invariability of the mediating powers, because these regulations ought to be guided by the legitimacy of the demand, and not by determinations which have their source in dispositions, friendly, but not emanating from any strength of right. It could not be opposed to this demand, that the mass of the indemnities is not equal to the mass of claims; for in that case, the number ought to be restricted to that which is expressed in the treaty, and then the restriction arising from the insufficiency of the mass of indemnities should be applied not to one single part, but to all. Nevertheless, these principles are often departed from in the plan of indemnities.—The Sub-delegate then states, that the negotiations are still in train at Paris; that his court has lately made, by its ambassador, propositions to the French government, which prove its extreme moderation as well as its conciliatory dispositions and just regards for the parties interested, and from which it has just ground to expect a happy result. The Imperial Royal Court flatters itself with having by such equitable propositions evidently manifested the nature of its conciliatory dispositions, and the price which it attaches to the interference and to the friendly propositions of the mediating powers.—After this it has so much the more reason to hope that these powers will have, by reciprocity, just regards for his Royal Highness the Grand Duke, and that they will please to make in their plan of indemnities such modifications as the Imperial Royal Court can agree to.—It must be seen from this statement, that the Imperial and Royal Court cannot incur the least reproach of delay; far from it, the Sub-delegate must regret that the best intentions and conciliatory measures have not been received on the part of the mediating powers, nor by any of the co-estates to the Deputation, with that eagerness, which would have removed, and still may remove by some means or other, all the difficulties. The general state of things is not besides sufficiently pressing to cause apprehension of danger in a more mature discussion. All Europe is tranquil, and wishes to maintain the peace. Germany awaits the decision of its fate with patience and firmness. France has every reason to be content with the advantages which she has obtained from the peace, and has no reason to envy the Royal and Imperial Court the execution of the stipulations which concerns it, and still less to refuse it.—The Emperor Alexander I. is a monarch friendly to peace and justice; he will see in this extreme moderation of a faithful friend of his empire this new proof of her good intentions.—Austria, far from envying any body his just pretensions, is ready to sacrifice more than half of her just claims to facilitate her settlement of the business of the indemnities. As to Passau, the Imperial and Royal Court is disposed to consent to the abstraction of the part of that bishopric situate beyond the Inn and the Danube, provided there be given to the Archduke some other advantage in exchange. She is also disposed to make her troops evacuate that part of Passau, if the Elector Palatine, on his part, shall undertake not to occupy it, until, by some arrangement of indemnity, his Royal Highness the Grand Duke, shall be secured according to the sentiments of moderation above expressed.

Note presented at the Diet of Ratisbon, on the 25th of October, by Baron Bild, the Swedish Deputy for Anterior Pomerania.

The under-signed Minister Plenipotentiary from his Swedish Majesty to the Diet of the Empire, conceives that the time is arrived which requires him to break silence, since the German Empire is threatened with new dangers and divisions, which render it necessary for all the Members of the Empire to unite with their head, to maintain their independence, without which there can be no durable tranquillity or security. The King of Sweden, who is so fortunate as to have lost no territory during the war, is too generous to wish any augmentation of his possessions in Germany, and therefore can have no other object than the true welfare of the German Empire and its legal rights and independence. Actuated by these sentiments, his Majesty would have hesitated to take any part in the affairs of the Empire, had he not found that Foreign Powers have interfered in the present important transactions. His Majesty, therefore, as a Prince of the Empire, and a guarantee of its constitution, is certainly justified in taking a part in the deliberations. His Majesty acknowledges the necessity of changes in the German Empire, on the equitable principles already admitted, in order to indemnify those Princes of the Empire who, by the marable fortune of the war lately concluded, have lost their territories; but such changes, according to these same principles, must be made with all possible propriety and justice, so that those only may receive indemnifications who have suffered actual losses. In conclusion, his Majesty considers it as a duty again to remind the Diet of the Empire, that an improper and dangerous example has been given, by the occupation of territories with an armed force, before the right to them has been legally acknowledged, and that it is necessary, by an express Declaration, to prevent the same in future. Bild.

ON THE SITUATION OF EUROPE AND THE PARTIES OF GREAT-BRITAIN.

To the Editor.

SIR,—That the present moment is the epoch of a great and important change in the whole system of balanced power in the continent of Europe, no man of the most superficial observation will hesitate to allow. They who are even moderately versed in foreign history, cannot but be aware, that no period has been marked by so essential an innovation, since the first establishment of the Protestant interest in Germany by the peace of religion, and the division of the Austrian dominions, when the Emperor Charles the Vth. wearied out and exhausted by a succession of difficult, but glorious conflicts, took the singular resolution of resigning his crowns. The peace of Westphalia in the next century, and that of the Pyrenees, which soon followed, were but a natural result of the events to which I have alluded, and of the intermediate losses which Spain had suffered, in the revolt and independence of the United Provinces, and the disasters and destruction of her naval force. During all this time, the ascendancy of France, as a military power, advanced only by slow degrees, and with frequent interruptions: in her attempts to dispute the empire of the seas she was still more unsuccessful. Now she has at once enlarged her territories, beyond all comparison, with the collective acquisitions of many wars; she has fixed herself in a proud and irresistible superiority; she has surrounded herself with barriers, as it were, on every side; she has recast and remodelled the conterminous states at her discretion, in such a manner, that the new system, once settled and consolidated, will leave her nothing to fear hereafter; she has subdued under her the second in rank of the maritime states, which formerly opposed no inconsiderable obstacle to her efforts of aggrandizement, and she has made herself more or less directly mistress of the principal stations, which command the intercourse of the two hemispheres. One object, and but one, remains for her ambition to accomplish; an object which she has long since openly avowed as nearest her heart, which in war, during negotiation, since the conclusion of peace, she has uniformly pursued, and is still pursuing, with unabated and increasing eagerness; for the prosecution of which she will not cease to employ all her resources; and that object is, not the depression, but the annihilation of the commercial wealth and maritime power of Great-Britain.

On our part, after the most brilliant victories over the chosen troops of the enemy, with fleets the most triumphant that ever stemmed the ocean, with a commerce, contrary to all former example, flourishing more luxuriantly under the protection of our arms, than in the security of peace; fatigued with conquest and fainting in the career of glory, we submitted—yes, however we may seek to disguise the fact, we did in reality submit to acknowledge an inferiority, which did not exist in the relative circumstances of the two countries. We gave up to our adversaries the colonies which we had gained to our own trade and navigation. We agreed to evacuate, in their favour, the commanding stations which we had occupied. We sanctioned, or we connived at, their seizure of other posts, no less important, which they extorted from our allies, or their own. Not a single stipulation did we get to revive old, or procure new advantages to our commerce. Finally, abandoning the wise and manly policy of our forefathers, we surrendered Europe, without capitulation, to France. In making a peace of this humiliating description, we neglected the customary precaution of insisting, that the armaments of both countries should be reduced, at some given time, to some common standard. Not an instant was lost in disbanding our own soldiers and discharging our sailors, thousands of whom are said to have emigrated to France: our ships are dismantled, and our naval establishments have been reformed, till they are brought lower than in any former peace, the most stable and safe: while, on the other hand, the Chief Consul has been recruiting his armies; replenishing his arsenals and dock-yards; building, repairing, commissioning fresh ships; in every way augmenting his military and naval strength. And now the instruments of him, to whose moderation alone our rulers have been persuaded to trust every thing, insolently tell us, that we must fulfil the cessions of our treaty to the most minute letter, but beyond the letter of that treaty we must not look. We shall have the treaty, the whole treaty, and nothing but the treaty. The continent is interdicted to us. It is enough for us to mind our work-shops and our warehouses; to preserve them from the depredations of vulgar felons, that they may in convenient time, furnish richer pillage to the regimented robbers of the Great Nation.

This is a faithful picture, though but in miniature, of the situation, in which we stand, and of the prospect that lies before us. The truth of this representation, I believe, is now generally and deeply felt. You, Sir, of all our political writers, had the merit of leading the way, in awakening your countrymen to a sense of their danger. Latterly, you have been more or less assisted by our public prints of every complexion, with, I think, only the single exception of one paper, which scruples not to boast the patronage of the French government. I do not ever remember such concurring testimony to the unanimity of public opinion, on any subject.

It is with regret, however, that I have observed a disposition prevalent, less to consider the nature of the remedy than the band by which it is to be administered. The former question may now best be left to the wisdom of Parliament, which is assembled; but the latter belongs equally to the people. The monied and mercantile interests of the city, recollecting only the fact, how much they prospered under the administration of Mr. Pitt, without stopping to inquire into the causes, hope to find an immediate cure for the evil in his return to power. Some complain of Mr. Fox in a tender tone, that betrays how anxiously they long to be furnished with any excuse for making him again the god of their idolatry. There appeared not long since, in one of our newspapers, a long and well-written essay, the drift of which was to inculcate, that Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox were alike to be set aside as seceders, and that, if the former should be called to wage new war, he had so acted, that his sincerity could be credited neither by the advisers of war, nor the lovers of peace; that no man, at home or abroad, could seriously think of reposing the least confidence in the talents of Mr. Addington and his colleagues; and that the men (exclusive, I understood, of Mr. Fox) who, till peace was made, never ceased to demand it, and when made approved it, are alone qualified to be war-ministers of the country in the approaching trial of our fortitude; because they always manifested an undoubted and undoubting, pure, abstract love of peace, without regarding with whom, under what circumstances, and upon what conditions it might be concluded! You, Sir, with more apparent consistency, have distributed your strong censures very impartially (whether as prudently, may, perhaps, be questioned) among all our public characters, except those who condemned the treaty of Amiens. But you have lately met with an antagonist, who, assuming to himself, in his signature, an extraordinary portion of candour, seems to have taken up with it, a full share of that pleasant absurdity, which sometimes a little embarrasses that spurious virtue. He joins you in the harshest epithets which can be heaped on the peace; yet he thinks, in some odd way or other, that an increasing conviction of its ruinous operation ought to be accompanied with an increasing love and admiration of the minister, who advised our ruin.* Alas! Sir, this is not a season for these petty bye-games. We shall not have leisure to repent at our ease of such follies. Our destruction will have become inevitable, before we shall have discovered, that our safety could have only been worked out by a cordial combination of all the talents, all the wisdom, all the spirit, and all the prudence to be found among public men.

In absolute monarchies, the vigour of a single mind directing the exercise of uncontrolled power, has sometimes dragged forward an inert and sluggish people to efforts, that seem almost miraculous, and has thus retarded their impending doom. The history of the Roman Empire in its decline, has several splendid instances. But in free states, where, whatever be their form, the character of the people will more or less influence that of the government, it has seldom, if ever, been seen, that the eloquence of one man has been able to rouse his fellow-citizens, when once sunk into the torpor of luxury or pusillanimity, to any timely exertion for their salvation. Other candidates for office, courting popular favour by flattering the love of indolence, natural to man, will always be able to counteract his energy so far, at least, as to delay the adoption of his counsels; if not to drive him, for the sake of preserving his pre-eminence in the state, into a total dereliction of his own proper course. To what do we owe the most beautiful orations of antiquity? To that very situation of the two most illustrious statesmen. Demosthenes warned the Athenians in time against the designs of Philip on the independence of Greece: but his warning voice was raised in vain, till it was too late. Cicero urged the early and decisive prosecution of war against Anthony, as the only measure to secure the recovered liberty of Rome; but he could not prevail, till negotiation and treaty had been tried and by the delay the fatal aid of Octavius had become necessary. To governments such as ours, parties are not only almost inevitably incident, as growing immediately out of the nature of the constitution, but in moments of peril that demand continued exertion, may be essentially beneficial. That inconstancy, which is no reproach to the people, because all multitudes of independent individuals will ever be actuated more by immediate impulses than deliberate judgment, can only be steadied by the widely extended authority of some public connexion of men, embracing chiefs and leaders of various interests, acting together with firmness and determination, because they act from conviction, on principles which they all know and have approved.

Twenty years, Sir, have passed since we have really had in the country any party, the name of which supposed some definite and professed system of foreign and domestic policy. Then began parties of attachment to persons and names, not to things and principles. We might derive much salutary instruction from a review of the interval, if we would look back, not for the purpose of mutual crimination, not with an intention to palliate, but to detect, that we may amend, our own past errors: at present, however, I wish to turn my eyes another way. The late House of Commons, at its close, was more broken down and dissolved into individuality, than any which I ever recollect. That which has now met, will probably, in this respect, resemble the last. But if it long remains in that state of debility (for such in fact it is) all may be gone for ever; since, as Mr. Lascelles is reported to have truly said,

"not only the fate of this country, but, perhaps, of all Europe, may depend upon the deliberations of this session." Let them hasten, then, to unite among themselves, without regard to names, without predilection to persons, and let the bond of union be, not a furious and rash zeal, but a sober, settled, and enlightened resolution, to resist the encroachments of France. Whether this may best be done by fresh negotiations or by war, I do not pretend to say, thinking, as I have already hinted, that they are themselves most competent to that question in Parliament, where it can be ascertained with sufficient precision, what is the true extent of the injuries and affronts which have occasioned the present bustle of preparation, what are our own means, and what the dispositions of the continental powers. But a spirit and tone of unrelaxing firmness instead of pliant conciliation, a look of severe vigilance instead of shy connivance, a heart that beats with the full pulse of our ancestors towards France, are the leading qualifications which we have now a right to expect, in all who aspire to the name of British Statesmen. A party constructed on the broadest base of such a test can alone, in our present situation, deserve the public confidence; and if the Sovereign and his people should be so fortunate as to have a choice between parties, heartily concurring in this fundamental point of foreign policy, and differing only about the means of most effectually prosecuting the same great end, instead of contending which is most sincere in declarations, of amity and concession their competition will be still more salutary in its effects, and afford, under the blessing of Providence, the surest human means of success.

Highgate, Nov. 17.

A Freetholder.

TO THE RIGHT HON. LORD HAWKESBURY,
His Majesty's Sec. of State for Foreign Affairs.

MY LORD,—In resuming the pen for the purpose of concluding the subject of my last letter (p 605), it may not be amiss to recapitulate the points of the former part of it I proposed, in the out-set, to enquire into the change which these six months of peace would (in case of a renewal of the war) have made in our position, naval and military, domestic and foreign. I had, by way of introduction to this enquiry, stated, that the present uncertain state of things was not only the consequence of the peace of Amiens, but that your lordship and your colleagues were duly warned, that such would be the consequence of that compact, a statement which I supported by a reference to several speeches delivered in both Houses of Parliament. Having, next, endeavoured to shew the fatal effects which must result from a prolongation of the present armistice, by the means of further acts of humiliation; having brought the question to the simple alternative of war, or submission to France, I, of course, expressed my hope that the nation would insist on the former. Entering, then, upon my subject, I took a view of the change, which the peace had produced in the relative position, naval and military, of Great-Britain and France, in which, however, I omitted to mention, that, since the signature of the preliminaries, the latter nation has (though in contradiction to the opinion of your lordship)* launched eighteen ships of the line, at the three ports of Brest, Rochefort, and Toulon. From the physical I came to the moral disadvantages, which will be found to have been produced by the peace; and here the decline of the national spirit first presented itself. I endeavoured to shew how fatal the tone of the negotiation, the terms of the treaty, and the arguments by which it had been defended, must prove in any future belligerent contest. Here I was reluctantly compelled to break off, without having sufficiently dwelt on certain particular acts, opinions, and expressions, which tended to humble and debase the public mind: this part of my task, therefore, remains to be performed, previously to the observations with which I shall take the liberty to trouble your lordship, as to that branch of the subject which is more immediately within the province of a Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The first overture towards the negotiation was accompanied, on our part, by an act, of which, it is probable, not ten persons, even in this country, would have been found capable. But however the world may admire in your lordship, those qualities, which, while they prove your "hereditary disposition to office," enable you to bare your head to a Commissary of Prisoners, it is certain, that, at the out-set of a negotiation for peace, a more dangerous step could not have been taken. Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coute; a proverb which your lordship and your colleagues have most amply verified: for, from the day when one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State first stooped to solicit a personal interview with a French Commissary of prisoners, for the purpose of obtaining peace, hardly a week has passed without exhibiting to the people of England some new mark of national humiliation, some unequivocal proof that their country is, after a long struggle, become inferior to that of their ancient rivals and antagonists.

During the whole of the negotiation of the preliminaries, the language of the ministerial prints was perfectly in unison with the tone of our negotiators. It was, indeed, qualified in various ways; but the conclusion always was, that peace must be had upon any terms, for that any longer continuation of war would be certain destruction. When, therefore, this blessing, or rather this escape from annihilation, was announced, the people, who, to prepare them for such a peace as it was foreseen would be made, had been scared half to death, were lost in "a tumult of exultation and delirium of joy;" and that disgraceful and ominous deed, of dragging the French aide-de-camp through the streets of London, was, to say the truth, nothing more than the natural consequence of the feelings, which the conduct of the government had excited in their breasts. "Till this time, too, no one had ever dared openly and despitefully to set the laws of the country at defiance. This is a country of law: veneration of the judges and the magistrates in general is so deeply rooted in the minds of the people, that the impunity with which Lundberg and Lauriston were suffered to pass, seemed little short of a partial revolution: it was, at least, such a proof of submission to France, of dread of that nation, of consciousness of our inferiority to her, as nothing could invalidate or controvert. Close in the rear of this came the surrender of Napper Tandy, at the same moment that the people were informed, that their government had not been able to save a single royalist of La Vendée! Lundberg had passed unapprehended; but Napper Tandy had been apprehended, tried, convicted, and condemned: France snatched him from justice, with the halter about his neck, and compelled us to convey him, in one of our own ships, in triumph to her coast. There, my lord, in that act, I greatly fear, that loyalty, public spirit, and national character, in this country, received a blow, from which they will never recover.

* Amongst other grounds of security, your lordship stated, in the debate of the 3d of November, 1801, that it would require "a great number of years for France to bring her navy to what it was at the beginning of the last war," and that, during those years, "we should be employed, not in building ships, but in making seamen." You concluded the memorable observations with asserting, that, "in the course of eight or ten years, we should be enabled to renew the contest with more advantage than we began it last war!!!"—Oh! most "safe politician!"

The sentiments and language of the makers and defenders of the peace, were perfectly consonant to these humiliating and disgraceful acts. Sir Joseph Banks has been strongly and justly censured for his crawling letter to the Institute of France; but, the writer of that letter may very fairly plead the example of the ministers and the parliament. It was, by some members, declared, in so many words, that, in estimating the terms, we should not forget that we had "treated with a nation MORE POWERFUL than ourselves;" and this was, in fact, the conclusion to be drawn, and which the people drew, from every argument made use of in defence of the peace. Nay, out of doors, no one, that I know of, except Sir Frederick Eden and Mr. Chalmers, has attempted to defend it upon any other ground. Mr. Belsham, for instance, calls it a peace of necessity, and says that it was wisdom in your lordship and your colleagues to submit time enough to avoid destruction. This is the light in which the great mass of the people have been made to see the measure; it is the light in which they still see it. It is not easy, my lord, to rouse a people so humbled to a vigorous renewal and prosecution of the war; and, I think, I am now warranted to repeat, that this humble and debased state of the public mind is to be attributed to the makers and defenders of the treaty of Amiens.

I now come, my lord, to the concluding object of my enquiry, to wit: the change, which the negotiation and the peace, or, in your lordship's own pretty words, which "the time, the tone, and the terms of the treaty of Amiens," will, in case of a renewal of the war, have made in our position with respect to those foreign powers with which we were in amity during the last war—And here I may observe, without the fear of contradiction, that an impression, similar to that which has been produced, by the peace, on the minds of the people of this country, will have been produced on the minds of all foreign nations. The loss of our character, on the continent, was most forcibly described by Lord Minto, in the debate upon the definitive treaty. During the war, his lordship said, "it was his fortune, in those moments of timidity and despair, which marked the despondant

"feelings of other nations, to inspire them by appeals to the example of his country, and thereby to endeavour at rallying their broken spirits and languid exertions to the common cause. When the news of this ignominious peace arrived at Vienna, he, as well as others, treated it as a fabrication of the French; but, when he was convinced of the fact by an official communication, the sensations of sorrow, of shame, and of indignation that he felt, were not to be expressed: he wished, but in vain, to retract those representations of the undaunted spirit and unshaken fortitude of his country, which he had so often and so proudly urged to the ambassadors of other powers, in his endeavours to encourage them to renew and maintain the contest. All his assertions honourable to his country were completely falsified by this disgraceful act, which had destroyed all the admiration of England, all the dread of her anger, and all the desire to cultivate her friendship, which formerly existed on the continent of Europe."—In America the feelings, with respect to our disgrace, will be still more injurious to our cause in any future war. On the continent of Europe we are envied: in America we are both envied and hated, by a considerable portion of the people, who will now treat us with that malicious species of contempt, which is invariably bestowed upon fallen pride. This contempt we shall have to encounter, too, in the negotiation of a new treaty of amity and commerce, which must be made before the 1st of October, 1803, or America will be at full liberty to impose whatever restrictions she pleases on the importation of British goods. Whenever this treaty shall be made, my lord, the Americans will remember the ingenious argument, which you employed in defending the treaty of Amiens, that by placing the French upon the back of the Americans, in Louisiana, we should compel the latter to attach themselves more closely to Great-Britain; the Americans will remember this, my lord, and England will have to pay most dearly, as, indeed, she ought to do, for this lapis lingue of one of her favourite sort of statesmen, one of her "safe politicians."

But, to return to my subject, besides that general impression, that thorough persuasion of our degeneracy, and of our inferiority to France, which will have been adopted by foreign nations, and which will, upon the breaking out of a war, have marked us out as a people to be shunned; besides our acts of folly and pusillanimity, there are acts of bad faith towards our allies, which, had we still retained our character for bravery and power, must have operated greatly to our disadvantage. We may talk of our good faith, but no human being will believe us, while we retain Trinidad and Ceylon, the former of which we purchased with a part of the territory of Portugal, and the latter with a most shameful abandonment of the Stadtholder! With what face can your lordship and your colleagues complain even of that most daring act of injustice, the new partition of Germany? Would not Russia bid you remember the King of Sardinia? and would not the First Consul of the Western Nation ask you where, if not in Germany, you expected him to find, for the Stadtholder, that compensation, equivalent to the loss of his property and his stadtholderate, for which you had the generosity to provide by the treaty of Amiens? "And shall you," would he say, "ask me why I cut up the empire of Germany; you, who abandoned the Stadtholder, and who left me to reward him for his services and sacrifices to you? you, who were duly informed, that his compensation was not to come from Holland; you, who well knew, that he was to share in the plunder of your German friends and allies; shall you ask me what right I have to parcel out the electorates and principalities of the Empire?" I know not what answer your lordship would make him.—I am not one of those who wish to draw a veil over these dark transactions; for, in the first place, though we may deceive ourselves, we cannot deceive the world; and, in the next, I am fully convinced, that we must openly confess the sins of this dishonourable and dishonest peace, express our abhorrence of them, and shew, by our future conduct, that this abhorrence is sincere, before we can hope to retrieve our character. I will not, however, take up your lordship's time with speculating on what may be the consequence of this loss of character, as to our influence with other powers; I will content myself with shewing what has already been the consequence of it, confining my illustration to the instance of Russia. The connection between that Empire and France has cut us off from the continent of Europe, which it has enslaved. It has produced the destruction of the Germanic constitution, of which England has long been a guarantee, and it has placed what is still called the German Empire under the absolute command of our mortal and formidable enemy. The consequences of this unnatural connection were not unforeseen, my lord. MR. GENTZ, whose valuable work has been, I believe, patronized by you and your colleagues, gave you timely warning of these fatal consequences. "There was a period," (says he, alluding to the negotiation between Buonaparté and the Emperor Paul), "when Russia seemed disposed to form a close alliance, and act in concert with France. It was natural and consistent that the French government should use all its efforts to accomplish this singular metamorphosis; and that the partizans of that government should exhaust their eloquence and ingenuity to prove to the Russian monarch how infinite the glory and advantage he was to derive from his new connection. But that they should expect to gain the assent of the rest of Europe to their new doctrine, and to persuade all the nations that this monstrous alliance was to be a source of security, liberty, and prosperity to them; this required a degree of assurance on the one hand, and of credulity on the other, almost surpassing all conception. I will not here enquire, whether the true interests of Russia can ever induce its government to form an alliance with France (which can hardly be conceived possible, unless its ancient relations with England be entirely given up); I am speaking of the interests of Europe, and of the politics of each nation with respect to the whole. In which view of the subject, I assert, upon the firmest conviction, that an alliance between Russia and France, such as was some months ago, and surely not without reason, apprehended, would be the most dangerous, the most fatal of all political combinations; that if in the politics of Europe there yet remained any sense of dignity, of interest, and of duty, every nerve would be strained, and every power employed to counteract this last and most formidable evil; and that if ever it should be realized, the moment of its formation would be the last of all independence, all security in Europe, all peace BUT THE PEACE OF THE GRAVE."

These are, indeed, my lord, only assertions, but they are the assertions of a profound and experienced politician, well acquainted with the state of the Continent: and, what gives them still greater weight, there is every appearance of their being fully verified by the effects of the much-dreaded connection, which has since taken place, and which has already changed the face of Europe. Why then was not this connection prevented? How came France to effect it? Where was your lordship, and where were all your able negotiators? That the Emperor Alexander was well disposed towards us, and towards the cause of us and our allies is evident from the notes of M. Kalitschef (See Register, Vol. I. p. 73.) respecting the dominions of the King of Sardinia. In fact, up to the very moment of the signature of the Preliminaries of Downing-street, Russia was not only willing, but desirous to act in concert with us, for the purpose of making such a settlement as should preserve the Continent from the fangs of France. Every means in the power of your lordship, your colleagues, and your negotiator, had been used to damp the "intemperate ardour" of the young Emperor, to prevent him from taking any step that might deprive you of the means of obtaining for us THE BLESSINGS OF PEACE: but, till he actually saw the preliminaries of peace, till he had proof positive of our resolution to leave the Continent to the mercy of France, he never listened to the offers of Buonaparté. To the peace, therefore, we owe not only the loss to ourselves of this most powerful friend, but the addition of his power to that of our enemy; to the peace, and to the peace alone, we owe the new division of Germany, and, as a consequence of it, the almost total impossibility of ever again deriving any support or assistance from the Continent.

Such, my lord, is the change, which these six months of "feverish repose" have produced in our position, naval, military, domestic, and foreign: such are the disadvantages, under which we must again have recourse to arms, unless we prefer absolute submission to the enemy: such have already been the consequences of a peace, which you and your colleagues termed honourable and glorious, and for the conclusion of which you bade us return thanks to the Almighty!!!

I have the honour to be, &c. &c.

READING BALL ON THE PEACE.

We have received the following letter, by post, we know not from whom; but, as the writer appears very much in earnest, we have given it insertion.

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—Whether your correspondent, who signs himself J. Tietenser, be a real personage or not, I am a little puzzled to determine, for I certainly do remember such a name at Reading, though I rather believe it was differently spelt. Of one thing, however, I am certain, that he was not at the ball. Mr. Addington assuredly did say, that he was an instrument in the hands of Providence to obtain the blessings of peace.

You have in your own person, Sir, indirectly passed a very severe censure upon the phrase, and I should agree with you, if I had understood it as you appear to do. But I confess it appeared to me, delivered as it was with almost a funeral solemnity, to be no more than a pious submission to the Supreme will, clearly manifested in the present situation of the country: I thought that the minister was meritoriously imitating the patience of Job, in referring all as blessing to him who takes away as well as gives. I do not know whether this sentence, which is used in our burial service, formed a part of the "Anthem on the Peace," with which, instead of a song, Mr. Addington was entertained after dinner, at the house of a gentleman in this neighbourhood. At any rate it is probable, that the religious impressions made by this singular, but laudable, mode of entertainment, suggested the phrase in question.

Mr. Tietenser possibly may have heard both stories of Mr. Addington's reception at Bisham Abbey, the house of the worthy member for the county, as well as at Reading, and, not being very accurate himself, may suppose the person who gave an account of the latter to have confounded them both together. I cannot conceive, however, what he saw in this that was "ludicrous." There has been, in my judgment, too much joke besides on this occasion. Grave subjects (and I know not any more so than the dispensations of Providence in this peace) ought to be treated with becoming gravity.

Whitehall, Nov. 10, 1802.

N. V*.

* We do not know to whom we are to attribute the favour of the preceding letter, but the writer certainly seems to be well acquainted with the subject. Of the new circumstance, which he mentions, we can ourselves confirm the truth; that an anthem on the peace was really selected, instead of a prophane song, to entertain the pious Mr. Addington after dinner. Light, however, and trifling as is the whole story of the minister's late progress into Berkshire to snuff up the incense of his Secretary's family and friends, of his own cavalry corps, and his Reading neighbours, of "dancing misses and negus-swigging fiddlers;" much as we are provoked to laughter by his solemn lamentation over his removal from Woodley to Richmond Park; yet we do feel with our correspondent, that there is much more to occasion

TO THE EDITOR.

Sir,—If you think the following can afford any amusement to your numerous Readers, it is very much at their service. You will readily perceive, that I have done little more than tag with doggerel different hints which I have taken from your valuable Register. Should you think any notes or references necessary, you will be so good as to add them at your discretion.

I am, Sir, your constant reader,

ADDINGTON AND HAWKESBURY.

*An excellent new Ballad to the tune of "Widow
"Saunderson."*

Did you ever hear Addington?

Hey Sir, ho Sir,

Did you ever hear Addington, O?

Did you ever hear Addington,

So solemn and sad in tone?

O he is a solemn fellow!

O he is a solemn fellow!

If his treaty distresses you,

Hey Sir, ho Sir,

If his treaty distresses you O!

If his treaty distresses you,

'Tis Providence blesses you:

O he is a blessed fellow, &c.

Do the people feel shame of it,

Hey Sir, ho Sir,

Do the people feel shame of it O!

Do the people feel shame of it,

He gives them the fame of it!

O he is a modest fellow, &c.

Give up all for security,

Hey Sir, ho Sir,

Give up all for security O!

Give up all for security,

And the rest he'll insure it ye:

O he is a prudent fellow, &c.

And if still you are driven, Sir,

Hey Sir, ho Sir,

And if still you are driven, Sir O!

And if still you are driven, Sir,

He'll detain what was given, Sir, very grave reflections indeed. Let the people of this country look back to the date of these follies; let them look also to the date of those events, which have forced even our pacific cabinet into a new tone and attitude of hostility; and then let them think, what must be the frivolity of that mind, on which, should another war ensue, their very existence may depend. Neither can we forbear again more directly, since the fact is now established, to mark with the most serious reprehension that affront offered to the Omniscient in magnifying his bounty for the blessings of a peace, which he who, to round a sentence, affected this criminal piety, admitted at the first moment, not to be glorious, and had since discovered not to be safe. With these few remarks, we hope not too grave, we for our own part shall dismiss the subject for ever.

O he is an honest fellow, &c.

Then up gets Lord Hawkesbury,

Hey Sir, ho Sir,

Then up gets Lord Hawkesbury O!

Then up gets Lord Hawkesbury,

While cries, half he talks, bury;

O he is a talking fellow, &c.

All was but a merriment*,

Hey Sir, ho Sir,

All was but a merriment O!

All was but a merriment,

A peace of experiment:

O he is a merry fellow, &c.

Does France threaten your commerce, Sir,

Hey Sir, ho Sir,

Does France threaten your commerce, Sir, O!

Does France threaten your commerce, Sir,

He'll save it all from her, Sir,

O he is a careful fellow, &c.

Credit, confidence, capital,

Hey Sir, ho Sir,

Credit, confidence, capital, O!

Credit, confidence, capital,

Safe and snug shall enwrap it all;

O he is a clever fellow, &c.

For old treaties, oh! scout-em all,

Hey Sir, ho Sir,

For old treaties, oh! scout-em all, O!

For old treaties, oh! scout-em all,

You are better without-em all!

O he is a cunning fellow, &c.

In Paris victorious,

Hey Sir, ho Sir,

In Paris victorious, O!

In Paris victorious,

Once he long'd to be glorious:

O he is a glorious fellow, &c.

Now the pacificator, Sir,

Hey Sir, ho Sir,

Now the pacificator, Sir, O!

Now the pacificator, Sir,

He thinks himself greater, Sir,

He now is a solid fellow, &c.

He would have the day noted, Sir,

Hey Sir, ho Sir,

He would have the day noted, Sir, O!

He would have the day noted, Sir,

When thanks the House voted, Sir,

O he'll be a noted fellow, &c.

'Twas the fifth† of November, Sir,

Hey Sir, ho Sir,

'Twas the fifth of November, Sir, O!

'Twas the fifth of November, Sir,

So remember, remember, Sir,

O he'll be a flaming fellow, &c.

* We believe the writer alludes here to the name of the gentleman at Paris, through whom the principal part of the negotiation passed. He is familiarly known upon London 'Change by the name of Merry Andrew.—EDITOR.

† We thought our correspondent wrong; but on turning to the newspapers of the fifth, we find that the address was not voted till near one in that morning. This we presume to be our correspondent's allusion.—EDITOR.

Then sing Mr. Addington,
 Hey Sir, ho Sir,
 Then sing Mr. Addington, O!
 Then sing Mr. Addington,
 There is not such a lad in town:
 O he is a famous fellow, &c.

And sing, too, Lord Hawkesbury,
 Hey Sir, ho Sir,
 And sing, too, Lord Hawkesbury, O!
 And sing, too, Lord Hawkesbury,
 Whose fame shall Guy Faux bury,
 He, too, was a famous fellow, &c.

PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT.*

Tuesday, November, 16.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—This day, being the day appointed by Royal Proclamation for the meeting of the new Parliament, it was opened by Commission, by the Lord Chancellor, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duke of Portland.—Adjourned till next day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—The House proceeded, according to instruction, to the choice of a SPEAKER. The Right Hon. Sir Wm. Scott, at the close of a short speech, moved "That the Right Hon. Charles Abbott be again called to the chair of this House," which was seconded by Mr. H. Lascelles. The choice was unanimous. Mr. Abbott then returned thanks to the House. An eulogy on Mr. Abbott was then pronounced by Lord Castlereagh; after which the House adjourned till next day.—About 300 members were present.

Wednesday, November 17.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—The Speaker of the House of Commons was received and approved of by Commission.—Lord Keith (made a peer of the United Kingdom) was introduced, and took his seat.—Several lords were sworn in.—Adjourned till next day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—The Speaker and several members were sworn in.—Adjourned till next day.

Thursday, November 18.

Both Houses were employed swearing in new members.

* Foreseeing, that an account of the Proceedings in Parliament, such as we gave in our last volume, will take from the Weekly Number too large a portion of that space, which we shall want for other matter, we propose to confine ourselves to a mere narrative of the business brought forward, and of the nature, the progress, and result of the divers discussions, reserving for the SUPPLEMENT to the Volume, an ample report of every important debate.

PUBLIC PAPERS.

Decree of Mederic-Louis-Elie Moreau de Saint Mery, issued at Parma, October 23, 1802.

In the name of the French Republic.—Mederic-Louis-Elie Moreau de Saint Mery, Counsellor of State, Administrator-General of the States of Parma, Piacenza, Guastalla, &c.—A Convention concluded between France and Spain, the 21st March, 1801, places at the disposal of France the States of the Infant Duke of Parma, and death having carried off that Prince upon the 9th of October, 1802, the First Consul has decided, that from this moment the exercise of the Sovereignty is transferred by just right to the French Republic, and he has in consequence cast his eyes upon us, and declared us Administrator-General of these States. We have in consequence decreed as follows:—I. Reckoning from the 9th October all the rights and powers attached to the sovereignty in the said States of Parma, Piacenza, Guastalla, &c. belong and remain to the French Republic.—II. The Provisional Regency established the same day, that his Royal Highness the Infant Duke of Parma had ceased to live, is suppressed.—III. All the Functionaries of the old government shall continue provisionally, and until a new order express their functions.—IV. The Public Acts, whatever their nature, shall be made out in the name of the French Republic, and shall bear a double date, viz. that of the Calendar of this Republic and that of the old Calendar.—V. No Act of Public Administration or Legislation shall have any validity, unless it emanates directly from us, or is clothed with our approbation.—VI. We enjoin all the Public Functionaries, without exception, under their responsibility, to increase their zeal and activity, to labour conjointly with us to maintain good order and public tranquillity, to secure the triumph of justice, without which there is no society, and to preserve among a people, worthy of all our cares, the respect which it owes to its Magistrates, as also the sentiment of happiness to be governed by France.—VII. The present decree shall be printed, published, and posted up in the usual places, and enregistered in the different offices through the whole extent of the States of Parma, Piacenza, Guastalla, &c. in order that it may be known by every body, and that all may conform to it in every respect, &c. &c.—Parma, Oct. 23, 1802.

(Signed) Moreau de Saint Mery.

Note addressed, on the 26th of October, by the Diet of Schwitz to General Ney.

The President of the Confederated Cantons having been required, on the part of General Ney, by his Adjutant, M. Bechet, to declare whether the Diet would accept the proclamation of the First Consul of the French Republic, the Diet have the honour to observe to the General, that already on the 15th of this month, they had taken the resolution of delivering up their powers into the hands of their constituents as soon as the French troops should enter Switzerland, having never entertained the design of opposing them by force of arms.—Now that the Diet is positively informed that the Cities of Basle and Berne are occupied by French troops, it no longer delays to dissolve itself; at the same time, they seize this opportunity of declaring to the General, that conformably to the instructions they have received from their constituents, which they consider themselves obliged to conform to, they cannot regard the Helvetic government as established, nor alienate the sacred right which their nation possesses, of forming a Constitution for itself, a right which they inherited from their ancestors, and which was confirmed to them by the treaty of Lunéville: but, on the contrary, are firmly convinced that the Swiss will never recover their tranquillity and their happiness, but in the exercise of that right.

They pray that the General will place before the eyes of the First Consul, this just demand, which is not only the expressions of the sentiments of the Diet, but of all Swiss who wish well to their country.—In the name of the Diet, Alors Reding.

Royal Patent Ordinance relative to the occupation of the Bishopric of Osnaburg, has been published in that Bishopric: it is dated Hanover, Nov. 4, 1802.

WE, GEORGE the THIRD, &c. hereby signify to the canons and other clergy, to the knights, vassals, burgers, inhabitants, and subjects of the late Bishopric of Osnaburg, our royal favour and good will. Forasmuch as by the late relation of the Indemnities in Germany, in pursuance of the Peace of Lunéville, adopted by the Deputation of the Empire at Ratisbon, the late Bishopric of Osnaburg, with all its dependencies, is secularized and assigned to Us and our House, as an hereditary principality; and as such has been accepted by Us, and as We have agreed with respect to its cession and evacuation, with its Sovereign, our beloved Prince FREDERICK DUKE OF YORK and ALBANY, We have thought good, and resolved to take possession of the said principality of Osnaburg, with all its dependencies, and the government of the same for Us and our House; and for that purpose, have appointed our state and cabinet-minister, Christian-Louis-Augustus Von ARNSWALD, our commissioner plenipotentiary, and have ordered our troops to march. We, therefore, by this patent, take on ourselves the government of the principality of Osnaburg, and require the canons and other clergy, the knights, vassals, burgers, and other inhabitants and subjects, to acknowledge Us as their only Sovereign, and to be true and faithful to Us, our heirs and successors. We cannot doubt but they will deport themselves peaceably on this occasion, and render obedience to all orders which may be signified to them in Our name, by Our minister plenipotentiary, and that they will transfer to Us, the fidelity and duty they shewed to their former Sovereign, in which case they may rely with full confidence on Our unwearied care for their welfare, and paternal protection and favour.—Ad Mandatum Regis et Electoris Speciale.
Kielmannsege, — Arnswald, — Döcken.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

St. Petersburg, Oct. 22.—In the 5th article of the treaty of peace concluded with the French Republic, on the 8th of October, 1801, it is stipulated that all the former commercial connexions between Russia and France shall be renewed between the two powers, and restored to the state in which they were before the war. As, therefore, on the 31st December, 1786, a treaty of commerce was concluded with France for 12 years, which was only carried into effect till the 8th of February, 1793, his Imperial Majesty has given orders that the said treaty shall be considered as revived from the present time, and continue in force for five years.

Basle, Nov. 3.—The Diet of Schwitz exists no more; it was forced to dissolve itself on the 28th of October. The last categorical declaration from General Rapp, and the approach of the French troops to the place of their meeting, made them separate against the wishes of their President, the celebrated Alors Reding, who preferred war. Before it closed its sittings, it published a proclamation, in substance as follows:

"The members of the Diet return their powers to the hands of their Constituents, having been checked in their proceedings by a foreign armed force, and by the influence of extraordinary circumstances; they do not renounce the right guaranteed to the different cantons by the treaty of Lunéville, of giving to Switzerland a suitable Constitution, and they protest before hand against all that other inhabitants of Switzerland are about to do to renounce that right." (That is to say, what the Helvetic Consulta, which is to assemble at Paris, shall decree relative to the future Constitution of Helvetia).

Nov. 4.—After several protests, the Municipality of this city, formed since the commencement of the insurrection, has dissolved itself, and the Municipality has been re-organised after the constitutional mode. The free corps of this city, suppressed at the commencement of the revolution, and re-established two months ago, has been disarmed and disbanded by order of the French commandant. The disarming has also taken place in the country parts, the misunderstanding which reigns between the inhabitants and the country people having given rise to apprehensions of fatal consequences.

French troops have passed through this city in great numbers for the last week. We have reckoned nine battalions of infantry, five squadrons of cavalry, and a numerous train of artillery. All these troops have proceeded to Argovia and the Eastern Cantons. Several more battalions are to pass through this city for the interior of Switzerland.

Tranquillity is not yet re-established in the Canton of Argovia; the peasants of the district of Brugg are still in insurrection.

The Canton of Schaffhausen has not yet been garrisoned by French troops. That canton has in general distinguished itself by its wise conduct, though much misunderstanding exists between the city and country parts—the former inclining to the ancient regime.

All the measures of the Helvetic government since their return to Berne, indicate that they wish to avoid all new reaction, and to conform strictly to the dispositions of the proclamation of the First Consul. This is perhaps the motive which has engaged them to confirm in their functions the Prefect, and other functionaries, of the Canton of Berne, who had been appointed during the reign of the Provisional Government.—

Verninac is still at Berne; but he is going soon to Paris.

Hamburg, Nov. 5.—Private letters from Petersburg, of the 19th ult. contain the important intelligence, that the present political circumstances have occasioned, from a certain great power, proposals of a triple alliance between Great Britain, Russia, and Austria, to which Sweden and Denmark will be invited to accede. The plan itself has been very favourably received by the Russian cabinet.—Letters from Vienna of the 27th ult. in corroboration of the above, state, that very important negotiations are now on foot to secure the tranquillity of Europe, and these are assigned as the reason of the frequent exchange of couriers between the British, Russian, and Austrian cabinets. Count Stahrenberg, add the same advices, goes to London with dispatches of the highest importance; and his diplomatic abilities being rated very highly by the Emperor, he has obtained a great augmentation of his salary, and is invested with the most extensive authority.—A neighbouring government is said to be apprized of the new federation which it is now the object of several great courts to accomplish, and has charged its diplomatic agents to counteract it by every means in their power. A French courier, with very important dispatches, passed a few days ago through Frankfurt on his way to Petersburg.

DOMESTIC.

On the 17th. inst. His Majesty held a levée at St. James, when the French Minister Plenipotentiary, ANDREOSI, was introduced (in his engineer's uniform, with pantaloons and boots on, and a tremendous sword dragging the ground), and after the levée delivered, in a private audience, his letters of credence to His Majesty.—Saint James's Street and the upper end of Pall Mall were filled with carriages and persons on foot, to see the French Minister, who was, in several parts of his way, to and from court, hailed with loud huzzas by the people.

On the 18th. inst. Her Majesty had a drawing-room, which was unusually crowded. Mr. ANDREOSI had the precedence.

On Tuesday evening, Mr. Stafford, the chief clerk, attended by a body of police officers, went to the Oakley Arms, Lambeth, where they apprehended Col. Despard, and near forty labouring men and soldiers; the major part of them Irish. They were all immediately taken to Union Hall. The whole of the party on Wednesday morning underwent a long private examination before R. C. Smith, T. Evance, and P. Broadley, Esqrs. when Mr. Despard was committed to the county gaol of Surrey, on suspicion of being concerned in treasonable practices. Twenty were committed to Tothill-fields Bridewell.—On Thursday, Col. Despard was brought to Lord Pelham's office, when he underwent a very long examination before Sir Richard Ford, the particulars of which did not transpire. He was committed to Newgate.

The warrant of commitment expressly charged him with conspiring to compass the death of the King, and was grounded upon the oath of the soldier who gave the information, and the circumstances of his examination. A printed form of an oath was found in the room where the party were sitting. It is said to be something in the nature of the United Irishmen's oath, and that they were in the act of administering it to each other. We understand that it was the object of the conspirators to make an attempt upon the life of His Majesty, on his way to the Parliament House, on Tuesday next. In this horrid undertaking, they were to be joined by 2000 of the poor of Spitalfields, and about the same number from St. George's fields, &c. amounting in the whole to 10,000. The attempt on his Majesty was only intended as the first scene in this frightful tragedy; and, it is said, that having succeeded in that, it was their farther plan to seize the tower, where having armed themselves, they meant to return and take possession of the Bank. From thence they were to proceed to Buckingham House, and seize the rest of the Royal Family resident there. These latter circumstances have been mentioned by the soldier, who gave the information at Union Hall. This business is likely to engross the whole attention of government for some days. It is almost unnecessary to add, that he is the Colonel Despard who was so long confined in Cold-Bath-fields prison.—N.B. The above particulars we copy from this Morning Post, and have no reason to question their authenticity. Mr. Pitt was immediately sent for to town!!!

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

The fate of Switzerland is, it seems, now completely decided. The Diet of Schwitz is dissolved, and the country is taken possession of by the armies of France. The ministerial papers, the True Briton and Sun, of the 19th of October, informed the public, that His Majesty's ministers would not "QUIETLY SUFFER Buonaparté to destroy the "independence of Switzerland." Yet the independence of Switzerland is destroyed by Buonaparté; and great indeed will be our surprise, if those ministers should attempt to punish him for despising their interposition.

Since our last, the Consul, who is a great favourite of fortune, has come to an additional inheritance. The Duchy of Parma, and its dependencies, have fallen to him, by the death of its former possessor. It is a little wind-fall, which he will of course take to himself, and with which we have no manner of business. The lovers of peace and plenty were greatly indignant at the decree of M. L. E. Moreau de St. Mery, (see p. 658), till it was proved to them, by uncontrovertible evidence, that Parma was ceded to France by Spain, (who, by the bye, had no more right to cede it, than we had to make a constitution for Malta), in a treaty, which was made on the 21st of March, 1801, and which was published in this work on the 30th of January last, (see Vol. I. p. 52). By that treaty, the Duchy was ceded to France, without reservation as to time: the words are:—"The reigning Duke of Parma renounces for himself, and his heirs for ever, the Duchy of Parma, with all its dependencies, in favour of the French Republic." Short and pithy!—No time is specified; the date of the treaty is the date of the cession; and, therefore, Buonaparté has really shewn no inconsiderable degree of moderation and forbearance, in suffering the old Duke to expire in his dominions. This prince seems, however, never to have been informed, that Buonaparté was ever to be his heir; for he left, by will, a regency, of which his Duchess was at the head. The Duke of Parma was wrong not to take in the Moniteur, which is now become le livre des destins for all the states in the world. M. L. E. Moreau de St. Mery, however, (who was a bookseller in Philadelphia in the year 1798), took care soon to inform the Duchess, that she was any thing but a regent; and that she must immediately quit the states of Parma!—This Duchy, which is both populous and rich, brings to France an additional population of nearly half a million of souls; making, together with Piedmont, the total population of the French Republic amount to little short of thirty-six millions. The situation of the Duchy of Parma is the most advantageous that can possibly be conceived for the purpose of introducing, at pleasure, the armies of France into the heart of Italy. It lies almost in the centre of the Italian Republic; and while that part of this republic which is on the left of the Po is entirely exposed on the side of Piedmont, the part on the right of that river is equally exposed to the Duchy of Parma. The town of Placentia furnishes a passage of great importance over the Po, and the cession (which France knows how to obtain), of a very small portion of the territory of the river of the Levant, will give her the gulph of Spezzia, the best and most spacious port in the Mediterranean. A road, of about 90 miles, leads from Spezzia to Mantua, by the way of Pontremoli and Parma. This road will enable France at once to carry the trade of upper Italy to Spezzia, from Leghorn and Genoa; and to march, unknown to the court of Vienna, any number of her troops from her southern departments, to the banks of the Adige, that is to say, to the weakest part of the Austrian frontier.—The destruction of the house of Austria is an object of which France never for a moment loses sight. Parma itself eventually belonged to Austria; so that, by the present seizure, the French republicans accomplish the triple purpose of opening a way to the Austrian frontier, of diminishing the Austrian dominions, and of insulting, by a low-born, low-bred, low-minded agent, a princess of that illustrious house!—As to this country, what can its present ministers object to the measures of France with respect to Parma?—They made peace with her, being, at the same time, fully informed of the existence of the convention, in virtue of which France now takes possession of the Duchy. What simpletons are those, then, who are whining about this "new en-croachment," and who approved of, and rejoiced at the treaty of Amiens, and the "blessings" which it brought them!

The ministers have now expressed, through their prints, the True Briton and Sun, the "satisfaction" they feel at perceiving, that the "Chief Consul has given way, upon some important points, to Austria, in the settlement of the indemnities;" and this concession they affect to regard as "a circumstance which holds out a better prospect "of the pacification of Europe, than any thing they have witnessed for some months past!"—What can these "important points" be, then, upon which the Consul has given way to Austria?—Why, truly, the emperor has, after a long series of humiliations and insults, been able to obtain for his brother, the Grand Duke of Tuscany, the revenues of two or three German abbeys, the monks of which, that is to say, the real lawful proprietors of those revenues, will, in consequence, be turned out to beg their bread! This is the favourable circumstance, this is the important change, which has produced so fair a prospect of "the pacification of Europe."—True is the saying, that drowning men catch at straws! How desperate must be the situation, or how callous must be the feelings of ministers, who can have recourse to such palpable, such shameful misrepresentations!

The attempt, sometime ago spoken of, to make such a change in the government of Holland as would, in some small degree, lessen the oppressive influence of France, has, we are informed, completely failed; and the Dutch have been compelled to pay two hundred thousand pounds sterling to those who have, on this occasion, acted as the protectors of their independence!—But, what have we to do with this? Our ministers did, indeed, in the True Briton of the 30th of October, make a sort of promise, that, if Buonaparté interfered in the affairs of Holland, they would keep the Cape, Demerara, and Essequibo, because "these were ceded, at the peace, to Holland, certainly, at that time, too much under French influence; but not to Holland, a province of France."—Such was their tone on the 30th of October; but, since that day, Buonaparté has called them in his paper, a "prudent ministry," and has signified his intention to let us still enjoy "the blessings of peace," provided they remain in office.

There is a rumour, that the Toulon fleet, with a great number of troops on board, has put to sea. This news may be premature, but, if the French have not possession of Egypt before the month of March next we shall be very much deceived. It is said, that our army is not upon the best possible footing with the Turks; and it would be folly, in the extreme, not to anticipate the most dangerous consequences from the all-powerful influence, which the French possess at Constantinople.—The time may come, when the government of England will regret the want of a Sir Sidney Smith at Acra, and will reflect, with shame, on its ingratitude towards that gallant officer.

Buonaparté has returned to Paris, safe and sound, in spite of the prayers and predictions of the timid herd, who were in hopes of losing their fears in his loss of life. There are none but the basest of cowards, who look to the death of this man as a deliverance from danger. Yet, disgraceful as is the fact, the hopes of no small portion of the advocates of peace have no better, no more honourable, foundation. Those who, like ourselves, were opposed to a disgraceful peace with Buonaparté, do not, nor ever did, entertain any such foolish hope; we know that if he were dead to-morrow, another, perhaps even more dangerous, would arise to fill his place: we are for the employment of no base means of offence or of defence, but are for a fair and honourable contest between the two nations, in which, with God's good help, we should hope to come off victorious, and to rescue our country from impending ruin and slavery.—The Consul has been received at the several places which he visited on his tour, with every demonstration of joy; precisely such as we could wish to see accompany the steps of our gracious Sovereign.—People may say what they please about the hypocrisy of this joy; we, for our parts think it perfectly sincere, and, what is more, we see no reason why it should not be so. We have nothing to say against those meek and unambitious persons, who sicken at the sound of military fame and national conquests; but, we must confess, that, for our parts, we should not like a leader the worse, for having extended our sway over one half of Europe, added ten millions to our population, and humbled our rival in the dust.—No, no; such a man may be hated by the Addingtons and Hawkesburies, and by all those who dread the increase of his power, but not by the people of France, not by those, the advancement of whose glory (which is inseparable from his own) is the only object of his life,

Lord Whitworth arrived at Paris on Sunday last, the 14th instant. It is thought, by some persons, that, however great the talents and merit of Lord Whitworth may be (and few people deny him either), there was very little dexterity or policy in sending the husband of the Dutchess of Dorset to Paris. It is mortifying enough to be compelled to send a lord to bow before Buonaparté, without sending a Dutchess to curtsy to his wife. It is, more than ever, necessary to pay attention to these things.

The time is gone by when our fleets and our guineas were sure to vanquish the men and the women of France.

But why do we vex ourselves with reflections like these? Why disquiet ourselves in vain at the forced humiliation of one noble pair abroad, while hundreds, at home, and under our very eyes, voluntarily run to prostrate themselves, not before Buonaparté, but before his representative? The introduction of Andreossi at the British court was attended with circumstances well calculated to do away the charge of pride, which has so long been preferred against the English nation. That Andreossi should be received with shouts of joy at Dover was quite natural; Dover and Calais live by peace and starve by war: they are two spots, which may always be considered as extra-political; but that, after what has passed, a French Minister should be received with acclamations within the verge of the court, is not less ominous than disgraceful. It appears that Andreossi really thought, that his entrance into London would produce some marks of unpopularity; and this is thought to be the reason why he chose to come in at midnight. The Minister's prints, the True Briton and Sun, took occasion, from this circumstance, to boast of the patriotic disposition of the people. "If," said they, "the arrival of the present French Minister has not been greeted with such enthusiastic symptoms of cordiality" [as those which were discovered upon the arrival of Lauriston], "how are we to account for it? Because circumstances have occurred, in the course of the last three or four months, too well calculated to repress the hopes, so creditably entertained by our generous countrymen, that the sincerity of France would keep pace with our own. Because his arrival had been preceded by two of the most violent and hostile manifestoes, which have appeared in the French official paper." It would have been much more natural to have accounted for this want of enthusiastic symptoms from the simple circumstance of the man's coming in at a time when all the lovers of peace and plenty were in bed; but the passage here quoted from the official papers was intended as a hint to the people for the regulation of their conduct. To the utter confusion, however, of the ministerial host, the people "to whose voice the ministers paid a proper respect in restoring to them the blessings of peace," paid no attention to the hint: but, on the contrary crowded, from all parts of the town, to see, to bow to, and to hail with huzzas, the representative of Buonaparté. Not less than a thousand persons ran after his carriage down Bond-Street. St James's-Street was lined on both sides with carriages of the nobility and gentry, and with an innumerable herd on foot, by whom he was repeatedly cheered, on his way to and from the court. To avoid this disgraceful symptom, it was given out, by the direction of Government of course, that Mr. Andreossi was not coming to court that day; but this wise expedient failed also: the people, the good people, were not to be so cheated out of the benediction, which they expected from this Minister of peace and plenty.—This scene is, by the sleek-headed sons of hope, attributed to the mere curiosity of a crowd of gaping fools. Amongst the carriages in St. James's-Street we hear there were several with coronets on them, and we have too much respect for rank to call the persons within "gaping fools." Besides, suppose they were all fools that gaped at Andreossi, foolish as they are it never came into their heads to gape at, or run after, any other foreign minister. Granted, too, that it was "mere curiosity" that assembled this extraordinary crowd; but what was it that occasioned the curiosity? Did the person of any other foreign minister ever excite such curiosity, or, indeed, any curiosity? We have had ambassadors from those illustrious Sovereigns the Emperor of Russia and from the Emperor of Germany, our great and faithful allies, and formerly from the King of France: but, did any of these ever excite any public curiosity? Were the streets ever crowded to see them pass? Were they ever cheered with the huzzas of an English populace?—To the makers and defenders of the peace, to those who brought this man amongst us, and who broke down the pride and spirit of the people, we cheerfully resign all the pleasure to be derived from reflecting on these circumstances, which, to us, are infinitely more terrific than was the mutiny in the fleet.

We intended to give our opinion, at some length, on the paltry accommodation, which, it is but too evident, ministers are resolved to make with France, and on the political objects, which ought immediately to be attended to by the parliament; but, these subjects we are obliged to postpone for the purpose of making some remarks on the domestic occurrence, which at present engrosses public conversation and enquiry. The reader will, at once, perceive, that we allude to the conspiracy, imputed to DESPARD and his associates, an account of which will be found under our Domestic head. This is another of the " blessings of peace." The defenders of the treaty, which Mr. Windham emphatically called " the death-warrant of England," were under no apprehensions of the tendency which the peace would have to revive the hopes and plots of the republican conspirators. We will not sicken our readers by quoting the words, in which lord's Hawkesbury and Castlereagh and several other speakers, assured us of our perfect security in this respect. It must be well remembered, that the fears, expressed by Mr. Windham were treated as a dream, and even so represented by a ministerial caricaturist, who described the " alarmist orator" in his bed, surrounded by priests, bishops, gentry, nobility, princesses, princes, the queen, and the king, with their heads chopped off, and their necks streaming with blood; while, in a distant scene, lord Hawkesbury was sitting in a chair, in the act of signing a paper, having his fingers directed by the hand of Mr. Pitt, who stood at his back.—It is an old saying, that there is many a true word spoken in jest; and many a dream that comes true! God in his mercy forbid that this should; but who will now dare, who will have the boldness, who will have the profligacy, to laugh at Mr. Windham's awful predictions? The jests, which, as the newspapers told us, the sprightly Lord Hawkesbury cut upon that gentleman's most solemn and impressive speech of the 29th of October, 1801, may possibly be turned into bitter mourning; and, could that mourning be confined to himself and to those who, with him, made and defended the treaty of Amiens, we, for our parts, should feel little inclination to repine.—Let no one charge us with vindictiveness; we can have no private interest to answer, no private feeling to gratify; but, we cannot view the present state of things, we cannot contrast it with the time when our army had just re-conquered Egypt, when our fleets blockaded Brest, Cadiz, and the Texel, when all our colonies and our trade, were in perfect security, and when this island itself was a scene of tranquillity and happiness; we cannot make this comparison, and particularly we cannot think of the danger which has menaced, and which, perhaps, yet does menace, the precious life of our revered and beloved sovereign, without feeling resentment against those "safe politicians," whose ignorance, weakness, pusillanimity, and selfishness have already thus plunged us into a state of jeopardy little short of revolution.—That the conspiracy is to be ascribed to the peace, and to the peace alone, no man of sense and sincerity will attempt to deny. All the elements of it, as far as they have yet been made public, arise out of the peace. The peace has taken off certain legal restrictions; the peace has opened a free channel to and from France; French republicans and regicides can come here, and English traitors can go there; French regicides have been introduced in the Royal Society of England. But, we shall be told, that this must have happened at any peace; and that, to avoid it, we must have had " eternal war." Eternal war, dreadful as is the thought, would have been preferable to the present situation of this country. But " eternal war" was not the only alternative. It is the tone and the terms of the peace, and not peace itself in the abstract, which has produced all our dangers, and which has, in a more particular manner encouraged the republicans to renew their nefarious projects. That tone and those terms convinced them, that the government was become weak and pusillanimous; the humiliating the disgraceful conditions, to which this country had stooped, effaced, in their bosoms, the last remaining traces of regard for it; and, if it be true, that DESPARD had conceived the design of raising his hands against the sacred person of his Sovereign, who can say how far that damnable design ought to be attributed to the triumph of the traitor Napper Tandy? And, indeed, who will venture to assert, if DESPARD should be found guilty and condemned, that he also does not expect, nay, that he also will not find a friend powerful enough to demand and to obtain his release? Thus do all our troubles, all our dangers, naturally flow from the peace: from that measure, which sunk the government in the eyes of the people; and the nation in the eyes of the world.—One word more: it is said, that there is an intention again to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act. We shall not stop here to remark on this as a symptom of that "perfect security," that "calm delight," that "tranquil repose," so forcibly and elegantly described by Lords Castlereagh, Belgrave, and Hawkesbury, but shall just express our anxious hope, that, while we are at peace with France, the discretionary power of imprisonment will never be lodged in the hands of the present ministers, notwithstanding even Buonaparté bear testimony of their "prudence."

FROM THE LONDON GAZETTE, 1802.

At the Court at St. James's, the 3d of November, 1802, Present the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.—His Majesty having been pleased to appoint Geo. Prevost, Esq. Governor and Commander in Chief of the Island of Dominica, in America, he this day took the usual oaths appointed to be taken by the governors of his Majesty's plantations.

War Office, Nov. 8. 1802.—His Majesty doth hereby direct and require, that all the out-pensioners of Chelsea Hospital, residing in South Britain, who were discharged from their respective corps, as serjeants, corporals, drummers, or private men, (those resident in London, or within twenty-five miles thereof, who are to attend at Chelsea on such days as the Commissioners of the said hospital shall appoint; the out-pensioners from the late Horse Guards, and Horse Grenadier Guards, the Life Guards, and Royal Regiment of Horse Guards; such men as, by the hospital books are now more than fifty-five years of age, or had served twenty-five years in the army previously to their discharges; those who have lost a limb, or their eye-sight, or are cripples, and the letter-men excepted,) do personally appear at the places, and on the days hereinafter mentioned, in order that such of them as, on examination, shall be found fit, may be sent to garrison duty, viz.—[Here follows an enumeration of the different places at which, and of the days when they are to appear.]—His Majesty is graciously pleased to declare, that, every man found fit for duty shall be entitled, on his arrival at the garrison to which he shall be sent, to receive a bounty of one pound five shillings, or so much thereof as shall remain after supplying him with proper necessities; and those who, on examination, are found unfit for duty, shall be dismissed with proportionate subsistence to carry them back to their homes.—And it is hereby further notified, that all out pensioners in South Britain, discharged as aforesaid, as well from the cavalry as infantry (except as above excepted) who shall not appear at the times and places herein appointed, will be considered as otherwise provided for by government, or as dead; and they will accordingly be struck off the books of the out pension of the said hospital without any prospect of being restored thereto,

By His Majesty's command, C. Yorke.

✍ Mr. Cobbett's Letter to Lord Auckland, respecting the abuses in the General Post-Office, together with several other articles are unavoidably omitted.

LONDON, November 20 to November 27, 1802.

ABUSES IN THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE.

It will be perceived, that the following letter was written to the noble lord, to whom it is addressed, so long ago as the month of June, 1801. The writer received an answer almost immediately, but that answer was in terms that left him perfectly in the dark as to his lordship's intentions. He has, therefore, waited patiently for redress; till, perceiving no likelihood of seeing that redress take place, he thinks it not improper to lay his complaint before the People, by whose opinion, now-a-days, the Ministers themselves are, or affect to be, guided. The writer has now no private interest that can possibly be affected by the abuses of which his letter complains; and he begs the reader to observe, that if could in no wise have originated from the violence committed on his premises by the clerks in the Post-Office, seeing that it was written nearly twelve months before they were guilty of that crime. On the contrary, however, he cannot help observing, that he had good reason to suspect, that it was the people of the General Post-Office who headed the mob in the demolition of his house in October, 1801, that is to say, in four months after the letter was written; nor will he be denied the justice further to make known, that CHARLES BELOE (son of the Rev. William Beloe), and CHARLES WAGSTAFFE, the two clerks, who were convicted of having headed the mob at his house, in April last, were not only retained in their places in the General Post-Office, but were never suspended for a moment, on account of a crime, for which they were committed to jail, for which they were indicted, and of which they were convicted.—The truth is, that the writer of this letter did intend to publish it at the meeting of Parliament, last year; but he was restrained by the fear, that the publication might possibly tend to excite disaffection towards the Government (not the ministers), a fear which is now completely subdued by the hope of preventing the Post-Office clerks from continuing (through the means of the abuses here complained of) to circulate over the kingdom, the libels, published at Paris, against his Majesty and his Government.

Pall-Mall, June 15, 1801.

MY LORD,—I take the liberty to submit to your lordship some facts and observations on a matter which, in my humble judgment, calls for the interference of his Majesty's Post-Master-General. — Unaccustomed as I am to the making of applications of this nature, I trust that your lordship will overlook any little irregularity that may be perceived in my mode of proceeding, as I assure your lordship that I approach you with all the deference and respect which are due from the most humble to one of the most exalted of his Majesty's subjects.

When I began the publication of my Newspaper, the Porcupine, I placed great dependance on the circulation which it would obtain in the United States of America, in his Majesty's Colonies on that continent; and in the West-India Islands, where my former customers were very numerous, and whence a previous intimation of my design had brought me in advance a great number of orders for my London Porcupine. To this intercourse, which promised much advantage to myself, some increase to the revenue of the kingdom, and, as I hoped, no harm to the political interests of his Majesty's Government, I met with an insurmountable obstacle, precisely where I expected to find the means of conducting it with facility. I mean in the General-Post-Office.

The King's packet-boats are, more especially in time of war, the only frequent, regular, and sure means of conveying Newspapers to either of the countries above mentioned, and I naturally concluded that the terms of sending papers by those boats were similar to those on which they were and still are sent to the different parts of Great-Britain and Ireland. I supposed that they were carried post-free to Falmouth, and that they were, after being landed at Kingston or at Halifax, for instance, conveyed post-free to the person to whom they were directed. And with respect to the United States, I could not possibly conceive that newspapers were loaded with a sea-postage, seeing that even letters, which bring no stamp duty to the revenue, are encumbered with no such charges.

Under this impression I took the liberty to apply to Mr. Freeling, the secretary and surveyor of the General-Post-Office,* for information as to the mode of transmitting papers through that office. In answer to this application, Mr. Freeling informed me,† that the exclusive privilege of forwarding newspapers and other periodical publications to the West-Indies and America had been granted to him, as a remuneration for public services, and that his charge for forwarding a daily paper to either of those countries was five guineas a year.

This information, together with the very high terms it specified, astonished me much. I was deceived by the Red-Book, if Mr. Freeling did not receive, as secretary and surveyor, twelve hundred pounds sterling a year, fixed salary; and though I could form no judgment of his public services, I humbly conceived that whatever farther remuneration his Majesty's Government might think proper to make him, was never intended to enhance so greatly the expences of newspapers to those who happened to reside in the Colonies, particularly when it was considered that such enhancement must materially injure the revenue, at the same time that it operated as a bar to our most useful, commercial, and political connexions, and, which I thought of still greater moment, as a novel and very dangerous controul over the Liberty of the Press. The rate appeared to me to be out of all reason. Five guineas a year for a daily paper nearly doubles the original cost, and must inevitably operate as a severe check on the exportation of an article, which, if not very necessary to the importer, is at least very productive to the State.

My desire to execute the orders I had received, did however urge me to endeavour to surmount this formidable obstacle. I wrote again to Mr. Freeling,* stating that the expence of five guineas a year on each paper was more than I thought myself at liberty to impose on my friends, without having previously obtained their consent for so doing; that I should, therefore, for the present, endeavour to send my papers by the merchant ships; that I should write to my customers, informing them of his terms, and that in the mean time I should be glad to know if he had any objection to

Pall-Mall, Nov. 25, 1800.

* SIR,—A Nova Scotia gentleman led me into a mistake, or I misunderstood him. I conceived from what he said, that the paper, if sent through the Post-Office, would cost no more to a customer in Nova Scotia than to a customer in London. Had this been the case, I should have sent by the packet several hundred sets to America and the West-Indies, but the additional expence of five guineas a year is more than I think myself at liberty to impose on my friends, without having previously obtained their consent for so doing. Till, therefore, I receive an answer to the letters which I shall immediately dispatch, I shall send the papers by ship to New York and Kingston. In the mean time give me leave to ask, if you have any objection to my inserting a notice in my paper, specifying the terms on which it may be had by the King's packet? This would save me a good deal of trouble in writing, and would be an useful article of information to a great many merchants here, who wish to send out papers to their correspondents, and who do not know any thing of the regulations which have been established at the Post-Office.—I am, Sir, &c. &c.

(Signed) Wm. Cobbett.

Francis Freeling, Esq.

P.S. I shall have in America and the West-Indies about 500 constant customers. Three hundred and ninety-seven sets are already ordered. Would not a couple of guineas a year for each customer, (considering the great number) be an allowance worth accepting of? I should think it would, especially if I paid you the 794 guineas down in advance, which, were we to agree, I should have no objection to do.

* Pall-Mall (No. 18), Nov. 24, 1800.—SIR,—There are several files of the Porcupine ordered in Canada and Nova Scotia, and the gentlemen who have ordered them inform me, that they have been in the habit of receiving other papers through the General Post-Office, franked by you, and without any additional expence on account of postage. Being a stranger to the mode of doing this business, I take the liberty to request that you will be pleased to inform me how and at what time the papers are to be sent to the Post-Office.

General Post-Office, Nov. 25, 1800.

† SIR,—I have received the favour of your letter, relative to the mode of forwarding newspapers to America.

In reply to which I beg leave to inform you, that the exclusive privilege of forwarding newspapers and periodical publications to the West-Indies and America has been granted to me, as a remuneration for public services, and that the expence of forwarding a daily paper to America is £5:5:0 per year. Any papers which you may wish to send to America, you may depend on being forwarded with the utmost regularity by my clerk, on their being sent to him at this office.—I am, Sir, your obedient humble Servant,

William Cobbett, Esq.

my inserting a notice in my paper, specifying the terms on which the paper might be had by the King's packet-boats. I informed him, at the same time, that I should send three hundred and ninety-seven papers, and asked him if two guineas a year for each paper would not be worth his acceptance, provided that I paid him down the seven hundred and ninety-four guineas in advance.

To this I received an immediate and a very polite answer from Mr. Freeling,* who was so good as to say that he was very desirous to meet my wishes to the utmost of his power, and to converse with me on a subject on which our mutual interests seemed to be so materially concerned. He proposed a meeting at the Post-Office; or, if more convenient to me, he condescended to offer to call upon me, the next day, in his way to the Treasury, which latter, for the reasons mentioned in my letter † was preferred.

Mr. Freeling accordingly called upon me at my house in Pall-Mall. He now offered, ‡ to forward my papers at the rate of three guineas for a year's papers, in consideration of my paying down the whole of the money in advance, as hinted in my letter (see p. 676); but observed at the same time, that my papers, by arriving abroad at a lower price than those of other persons, would certainly cause mine to be taken in preference to those of others; and therefore, he hinted, that it would not be proper to make our contract known, lest other printers should think themselves ill used. He desired me to think of his proposal, and to let him know the result, which closed our conversation on the subject. I did think of the proposal; but the papers arriving abroad at a lower price than those of other persons, would certainly cause mine to be taken in preference to others; and therefore he hinted that it would not be proper to make our contract known, lest other Printers should think themselves ill used. He expressed a great desire to do me or my paper any service in his power, I replied I could take the liberty to ask him for nothing but the advertisements from his office. These he assured me I should have; and he farther said, that the only reason that prevented me from having received the advertisements hitherto was, that it was not the custom of the Post Office to send them to papers, till those papers were established by a probation of three months; but that I might now, (when my paper had been begun only 29 days) depend upon having them, and upon receiving every other assistance he could give my paper. I observed that there were doubtless other papers to which he might very reasonably be more attached, and that I should think it no hardship not to be permitted to participate in his favours with those papers. In answer to which he said that there were no papers that merited more favour from him than mine did; and that every friend of the Government and the country ought to look upon it as his duty to assist me. He next asked me why I refused to publish the advertisements of his father-in-law, Mr. Newbery, the medicine-seller? I told him I had no objection, provided the advertisements contained no obscene or filthy expression or allusion. After this he pulled out a letter which he had just received from Hamburg, dated Nov. 18, giving an account of an express having arrived from Russia, stating that the Emperor Paul had laid an embargo on all the British ships in the port of Riga, amounting to seventy in number. We then returned to the newspaper business;—He desired me to think of his proposal and let him know the result. I told him I would, and so we parted. (Signed) Wm. Cobbett.

Certificate.—William Cobbett of Pall-Mall, appeared before me, John Gifford, Esq. one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the Counties of Middlesex, Essex, Surrey, and Kent, and swore to the truth of the contents of the above memorandum.

Given under my hand and seal, this fifteenth day of June, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and one.

* Mr. Freeling presents his compliments to Mr. Cobbett, he is very desirous to meet Mr. C.'s wishes to the utmost of his power, and if Mr. C. can call at the Post-Office to-morrow morning before twelve, he shall be glad to converse with him upon a subject in which their mutual interest seems to be so materially concerned—or, if it be more convenient to Mr. Cobbett, Mr. Freeling will readily call upon him at one o'clock to-morrow on his way to the Treasury.

General Post-Office, Nov. 26, 1800.

† SIR,—In acknowledging your favour of this morning, I am sorry it is not in my power to say, that I will wait on you, but I trust you will have the goodness to excuse me for requesting you to call here, when I assure you, that it is absolutely impossible for me to stir from home without neglecting some part of my multifarious business. I am preparing large shipments of books, &c. for America and the West-Indies. I have invoices, letters, &c. &c. to prepare, and have not a soul to assist me. It, therefore, you will do me the honour to call here to-morrow at the hour you mention, or at any other hour more convenient to you, you will very much oblige Sir, your most humble and most obedient Servant,

Francis Freeling, Esq. Sec. Gen. Post-Office.

Pall-Mall, Nov. 27, 1800.

‡ Memorandum.—Mr. Francis Freeling, Secretary of the General Post Office, called on me at my house to-day. He proposed to send my papers to America and the West Indies, at the rate of three guineas for a year's papers, in consideration of my sending such great numbers, and also in consideration of my paying down the whole of the money in advance, as hinted at in my letter to him of the 25th instant. He observed that my more I thought of it, the more I was convinced of the impropriety of acceding to it. Previous to this interview, I might have consented to give even the three guineas a year for each set of papers; but when, from the conversation of Mr. Freeling, I found I should, under a promise of secrecy, thereby obtain an unfair, if not an unlawful advantage over my contemporaries, my mind revolted at the clandestine compact, and I resolved neither to avail myself of the proffered terms, nor to encourage the continuance of what I could not help regarding as an abuse of office, with which his Majesty's Post-Master-General was totally unacquainted.

Such, my lord, are the facts which I have thought it right to lay before you. The observations which I am about to add, are submitted with great deference to your lordship's better judgment.

The regulations of which I complain may be considered under four points of view: to wit, 1. The hardship which these regulations impose on his Majesty's subjects who reside in the colonies. 2. The injury to the political influence of Great-Britain. 3. The injury which they do to the revenue of the kingdom. 4. The undue influence which they give the Secretary of the Post-Office over the Press.

1. I humbly presume that while those of his Majesty's subjects who reside in the United Kingdom are furnished with newspapers free of postage, there can be no solid reason why those who reside in the Colonies should be compelled to forego the amusement, the information, and satisfaction to be derived from this source, the amount of the price which is paid by those of their fellow subjects who remain in Europe. That the inhabitants of the Colonies, whether on the Continent of America, or in the West-Indies, are as deserving of the indulgence of the government as are the inhabitants of the United Kingdom, I am persuaded will be denied by no one who is acquainted with their loyalty and public spirit.

2. The influence of the Press on the opinions of men, and finally on the affairs of nations, has now become fearfully manifest, even to the most superficial observer, and that this influence must be felt abroad as well as at home there can be no doubt.

* * * * *

With the Colonies a constant communication through the channel of the press is still more necessary. As the affections of separated relations are kept alive by the aid of letters, so are those of the Mother-Country and her Colonies by the aid of the Press. The perpetual motion of this potent machine preserves the chain from that rust which first corrodes, and finally cuts it asunder. Every tax, therefore, under whatever name it may be imposed, that lessens the exportation to the countries above-mentioned of the productions of the English Press, has a direct tendency to destroy the influence of Britain, and to sever from her that attachment which it is her undoubted interest to preserve.

3. The injury to the revenue from this privilege of Mr. Freeling is very great. It prevents me from exporting as many papers as would yield a stamp duty of £1600 a year, to which must be added the duty on the paper before it is printed, which is very considerable. Besides newspapers, the monthly publications are also loaded with this franking impost; and it appears to me that at a very moderate computation, the loss to the revenue, from the operation of the privilege I complain of, cannot be less than one hundred and forty thousand pounds a year.

4. But, not any nor all of these considerations, important as they are, are of nearly so much importance as the great, the undue, and dangerous influence over the Press, given by this privilege to the Secretary of the General Post-Office. The Freedom of the Press has for many years been a favourite in this island, and however it may have been abused, it is yet a favourite. It is the boast of Englishmen. But the Freedom of the Press does not consist merely in the right of printing and publishing. If the circulation of a thing be impeded after it is published, the liberty to publish it is of very little use to the public or the nation. Viewing the impediment in a more mercantile light, the success of the printing trade, like that of every other, ought to be left to depend on the industry, the enterprise, the talents, and integrity of the tradesman, and ought never to be interfered in by government; for if the government, either by exclusive licenses or by exclusive privileges, grant to one man, or to any number of men, the sole power of vending newspapers, for instance, in a certain district, or the sole power of sending them there to be vended, as far as that license or privilege extends, it completely annihilates that fair competition which is the great spur to individual exertion, and the never-failing source of national prosperity. Were Government to propose a tax, a certain fixed and uniform rate on the franking of newspapers and other periodical publications to America and the Islands, the regulation would, in my opinion, be a great hardship on the Colonists, and would be very injurious to our foreign connexions, as well as to the revenue; but to authorise a secretary to the Post-Office to vary the rate as his personal partialities, his private interests, or his political opinions may dictate, is to vest in a single subaltern officer of Government, a power which I conceive never ought to be entrusted to any Minister, or to any department of the State; a power so extensive in its influence, so dangerous in its consequences, so contrary to the spirit of our laws, and so abhorrent from the best sentiments of Englishmen, that I cannot help regarding the exclusive privilege of Mr. Freeling, as an assumption entirely unwarranted by his Majesty's Post-Master General.

Having ventured, my lord, to trouble you with this grievance, I beg leave to trespass a little farther on your time with the representation of some others, part of which appear to me to have grown out of it.

Since it was found, from my long silence, that I would not submit to the terms of the Secretary, I have experienced every species of injury that it was possible for him and his inferiors to do to my undertaking, which, without the effects of their enmity, has had, God knows, difficulties enough to struggle with.

My American newspapers, which generally come by the merchant ships, and are deposited in the Post-Offices at Dover, Bristol, or Liverpool, were, previous to my rejection of Mr. Freeling's proposal, delivered to me at the rate of ten shillings and sixpence for a package; but since that time they have been presented to me, as before, with the enormous charge of five or six guineas on them, and have not, upon a discovery of the contents of the package, even been offered me upon lower terms. These papers are of great value to me; but the Secretary doubtless conceives that a greater "public service" is rendered by committing them to the flames, than by delivering them to me, though about ten guineas a year would thereby be added to the treasury of the kingdom.

But, my lord, these things are trifling compared with another kind of hostility which I have every reason to believe the Post-Office is carrying on against my undertaking. The clerks of the roads exercise the business of newsmen; that is, they receive orders from the country, in consequence of which they send newspapers by post from London to the persons giving those orders. His Majesty's General Post-Office is thus rendered a sort of newsman's rendezvous, by which means the Secretary, clerks, &c. obtain a very great, though indirect, influence over the press, which influence it would require an uncommon portion of charity in me not to suspect, when employed to the detriment of my undertaking. Since it must have been well known that I had resolved not to yield to Mr. Freeling's proposal, I have received from almost every part of Great-Britain complaints of the irregular conveyance of the Porcupine. In many instances complainants have stated, that the paper was frequently replaced by the True Briton, the Herald, the Times, and in many instances by the Morning Chronicle. Detection is next to impossible; but when I compare this circumstance with the general conduct of the Post Office towards me, I can have little doubt as to the source of this cowardly hostility.

As to Hamburgh news, my lord, the clerks of the General Post-Office possess an almost absolute controul over the newspapers of the whole nation. When the Hamburgh Mail arrives, an abstract translation of the news which it brings is made out at the Post-Office; copies of this translation are taken, and carried to the several newspaper-offices, from the proprietors of each of which the clerks demand a guinea each time. Thus not only are the proprietors of newspapers laid under a heavy contribution, by persons who are already paid by the public, but the news with which that public is supplied, is left to the selection of men, on whose judgment, or on whose principles, I can see no reason for placing such implicit reliance.* If I am told that the receiving of the translation from them is the voluntary act of the proprietors of the several newspapers, I answer that it is not so. If the mail arrives too late for that day's delivery, then the proprietor of each morning paper must submit to give a guinea to these venders of what ought to be regarded as the secrets of the mail-bag, or his paper must be ruined by the advantage which others will thereby obtain over it; so that the purchasing of these translations is far from being a voluntary act, on the part of the proprietors of newspapers, who yield to the extortion from necessity and not from choice. The people of the Post-Office may, in these cases, demand whatever sum they please. They have the exclusive privilege of selling; a complete monopoly; however exorbitant their price, or insolent their manner of demanding it, it must be submitted to. Were the Hamburg papers sent round to the several newspaper-offices as soon as they arrive, be it when it may, the translations would be left to the talents and industry of the several proprietors of papers, each of whom would thereby avoid an expense of about 30 or 40*l.* a year; and it is certainly as easy to send round the foreign papers themselves as to make out and send round a translation from those papers. The people of the Post Office would, indeed, by such reform, be prevented from extorting about a thousand pounds a year from the proprietors of newspapers; but I am certain your lordship would not regard that circumstance as a diminution of the credit of the office over which you preside.

* This observation is now completely verified by the introduction of the Argus, an English paper, published at Paris, abounding in the most false and infamous libels on his Majesty's person and government, and which is imported and sold by the clerks in the Post-Office.—We beg our readers to remember, too, what Professor Robison, in his "Proofs of a Conspiracy," says about the French gaining in the Post-Offices, in the different countries, whose governments were to be subverted.

It is, my lord, in the nature of abuses to increase; accordingly the people of the Post-Office, having, without interruption, followed the trade of news-men, and that of editors; having bought and sold manufactured newspapers, and supplied the manufacturers with the raw materials, conceived at last the idea of becoming manufacturers themselves. I have now before me a paper, having the King's arms at the head of it, and bearing the title of "General Shipping Commercial List," purporting to be "published by subscription at the General Post-Office, every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday," and further purporting, what I was much astonished at, that it is published "conformably to a plan submitted to and approved by His Majesty's Post-Master General." This paper, my lord, always contains what I am sure your lordship never intended it should. It is called a "List," but is to all intents and purposes a newspaper, though the proprietors have the assurance to send it forth without a stamp, in open defiance of the law. This "List" contains an account of the price of stocks, foreign and domestic; of the course of exchange; of the rates of insurance; of the prices of corn and coals; of inward and outward bound vessels, as well ships of war as others; of captures and other occurrences at sea, and in the different parts of the world; of the situation and movements of His Majesty's fleets, and of those of the fleets of his enemies; of accidents, battles, defeats, and victories. If this be not a newspaper there is no such thing. Yet it is published without a stamp, and that too under the pretended sanction of your lordship. For a proof of what I have here asserted I could appeal to the whole of the numbers of this publication; but I shall here lay before your lordship an extract which I think will suffice.

"The Pheasant, from New Providence, arrived at Bermuda the 18th of April, brought intelligence there that H. M. frigates Cleopatra and Andromache, went on a secret expedition to cut out a number of Spanish ships from a port on the north side of Cuba, near Punta Malas, with all the boats they could collect, but succeeded in taking possession only of one armed schooner. The Spaniards were apprized of the attack by a schooner which sailed from New Providence three days before the frigates, and were ready with their gun-boats, batteries, &c. Lieut. Joseph Taylor and two midshipmen of the Cleopatra, with eight men, were killed, and a number wounded."

This extract, my lord, which I have copied from the "Shipping and Commercial List" of Monday, June 8, 1801, will, I am persuaded, leave no doubt on your lordship's mind as to the illegality of that publication. The injury which it is calculated to do to other newspapers, all of which are loaded with a heavy stamp duty, is evident. There are many persons who want to hear no news but that which this paper contains, and such persons will certainly prefer a three day in the week paper, which costs but 1*l.* 5*s.* a year, to one which costs 3*l.* 18*s.* This Post-Office paper prevents also the publication of a great number of commercial advertisements, the place of which it supplies, and does thereby, as well as by narrowing the circulation of stamped papers, very great injury to the revenue. This paper enjoys other peculiar advantages. Not only are the proprietors paid for their time by the public, but their paper is printed and published in the buildings appertaining to the Post-Office, and is conveyed through London and its environs by the letter-carriers, who are also paid for their time by the public: and further, the proprietors of this unstamped paper have a privilege which even members of parliament do not enjoy, to wit, that of sending their paper postage free by the Penny-Post. With an undertaking thus supported at the public expence, what private individual, my lord, can be supposed capable of maintaining a competition? For my part, I am so fully convinced of the injustice and illegality of this establishment, that, had it not assumed the sanction of your lordship, I should long ago have brought it to the test of the law.

But, my lord, it is not the injury that my interests have sustained, and do yet sustain, from the regulations of the Post-Office, and the conduct of its inferior officers, that would justify my having taken up so much of your lordship's time; it is the more serious injury which I am convinced must arise therefrom to the cause of truth, of real liberty, and of unfeigned loyalty, that has urged me to take up the pen on this occasion. From what I have stated, it is evident that the Secretary of the General Post-Office and his subalterns, possess an influence over the press which no man, or set of men, ever ought to possess. We may talk about the liberty of the press, my lord, but while the Secretary has the power, in virtue of his exclusive privilege of franking, to give one newspaper or other periodical publication a preference over another, in America and the West Indies, while this privilege enables him almost entirely to exclude from those extensive and populous countries any paper, or other periodical publication, which he happens to dislike; while his power of exacting the full postage for packets from America or elsewhere, or of remitting that postage at his will, places every newspaper at his mercy in a very important branch of its foreign concerns; and while the discretion vested in him, of giving or with-holding, as his interest or prejudice may dictate, the advertising custom of the General Post-Office, creates, as it ever must do, a strong temptation in every news-printer to truckle to his will;—while the clerks of the roads, by carrying on the business of newsmen, have it in their power to add to the sale of one newspaper, and to diminish that of another, at the same time that the public purse supports them in a very unfair rivalry against the newsmen of London and Westminster: while the clerks in the Foreign Letter-Office assume the sole proprietorship of the news that arrives by the Hamburgh Mails, which news they compel the proprietors of papers to purchase, which they sell on terms that they themselves dictate, and that they can vary towards different persons at their pleasure: while some people in the Post-Office, (no matter who) are permitted to publish a newspaper without a stamp, to print it in, and issue it from, buildings appropriated to the public use, and to circulate it, through the medium of the Penny-Post, postage free, at the same time that all other news-printers are compelled to pay a heavy stamp duty, to print and publish their papers in buildings provided at their own expence, and to allow a considerable per centage for the circulating of them; while these things are, my lord, we may, as I before observed, talk about the liberty of the press, we may think we possess it, we may even boast of it as the birth-right of Englishmen, but it will exist no where except in the imaginations of those who are unacquainted with the facts which I have submitted to your lordship.

* * * * *

With all becoming respect and humility, with a full assurance that none of the abuses of which I have complained have been tolerated by your lordship, with a perfect submission to your superior judgment, and a perfect reliance on your impartiality and your justice, I remain, my lord, your lordship's most humble and most obedient servant,

(Signed) WM. COBBETT.*

Right Hon. Lord Auckland.

* I have no desire to swell the catalogue of neglects and abuses in this important office, otherwise I could give no very pleasing account of the Packet-Boat service, which is, in numerous instances, conducted, by the inferiors, in a manner scandalous to the last degree.—At home, too, I might mention the shameful imposition of what is called early delivery-money; that is, money levied, by the people of the General Post-Office, by way of payment for the delivery of letters, to particular persons, at an hour much earlier than letters are delivered to persons who do not submit to this imposition; whence it comes, that some persons, at the west end of the town in particular, have their letters at ten o'clock, while others, in the very same street, may not get their letters till twelve, or, perhaps, one or two o'clock; and there can be little doubt, that the general delivery is greatly retarded, in order to compel persons to pay for the early delivery—Far be it from me to insinuate, that the Post-Master General winks at this abuse: it is impossible that he should: but, where is his secretary, where are his comptrollers, where the numerous host of inferior officers that are maintained by the public in this exorbitantly expensive department?

MESSRS. FOX AND O'CONNOR.

In p. 338 et seq. of this work, Mr. Cobbett addressed a letter to the former of which pair of patriots, towards the close of which the following questions were put to him: "But, suppose, for a moment, that you were really obliged to go to Paris on this affair" [to examine manuscripts], "was ARTHUR O'CONNOR obliged to meet you at Calais, and to pass the evening with you à-tête-à-tête? Was he, soon after your arrival at Paris, obliged to follow you thither, in the company and in the carriage of Lord Oxford? And was Mr. Erskine obliged to break off from the enchantments of a jubilee, in order to meet you in the capital of the world?"—The correctness of the first of these assertions (for they are assertions in an interrogative form), has frequently been doubted by persons unacquainted with our scrupulous attention to facts; but, we think, that the following article, which we have extracted from the ARGUS (the English paper published at Paris) of the 20th instant, will completely remove all doubt upon the subject.—It should be observed, that O'CONNOR himself is one of the persons employed in conducting the ARGUS, and, of course, the article here extracted may be fairly looked upon as containing his declaration on the subject of which it treats.

Extract from the Argus of Nov. 20.

The Morning Chronicle of the 11th Nov. after heartily abusing the Argus, in the same paragraph levels its scurrility against Arthur O'CONNOR, by observing, "that he is the man, whom even Irish rebels must despise, and whom every honest Englishman must detest. It must be endured, because it cannot be prevented, that this man should walk the streets of Paris, boasting of his treasons, and rendering society odious to its English visitors, by his intrusions." We wish to know upon what principle ARTHUR O'CONNOR is to be despised by Irish rebels. Is it, because he saved the lives of Oliver Bond, and other Irish patriots, that he is to be detested by Irishmen? Does the Morning Chronicle forget their abuse against the late administration for the system they pursued in Ireland? Did they not cordially agree with Mr. Fox, when, speaking on the affairs of Ireland, at the Shakespeare Tavern, on the 10th of October, 1800, he made use of the following words.—"From what has happened in a neighbouring country, it appears still more clearly, that there is a fixed and systematic plan for depressing the cause of liberty, and enslaving the people. Tumults were excited by the most unjustifiable measures, and afterwards were quelled by means of the most dreadful atrocities. Villages were set on fire—torture in its most horrid forms was employed to gain discoveries, and military power was used of all controul from civil authority. Yet both in this "country, and in Ireland, government had been complimented for suppressing the rebellion, though it had been suppressed by acts still more reprehensible than those which originally fomented it. That unhappy country has now, by a continuation of the same system of tyranny and oppression, been forced into what is called an union, and thus deprived of every thing dear to it as an independent state. I do not speak of the policy of the measure in the abstract, nor pronounce that in no circumstance it could have been advantageous or advisable; but I most strongly condemn the manner in which it was brought about. By the means of a Parliament, which it was allowed, did not fairly represent them, and was utterly incapable to govern them, these people were compelled, against their inclination, to give up their independence, and to abandon their separate existence."

After these expressions, could Mr. Fox, with any propriety, decline seeing Mr. O'CONNOR in Paris? But we are very certain, that the moment the Editors of the Morning Chronicle shall have learnt, from Mr. Fox and MR. ERSKINE themselves, that they were REALLY IN HABITS OF INTIMACY with MR. O'CONNOR, they will instantly change their tone, and no longer talk of MR. O'CONNOR having been obnoxious to the opposition members, during their stay in Paris!!!

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Paris, Nov. 22.—Citizen Bruyere, aid-de-camp to General Leclerc, is arrived at Paris; he left the Cape on the 10th of Oct.—General Leclerc, Gen. Dugua, and Gen. Rochambeau, were at the head of their troops, and in the best state of health; the rains had been this year fifteen days later, and the sickness at the Cape still preserved all its malignity. On the 7th, however, the first rains fell, and already in the interior the sickness has ceased.—Gen. Leclerc had collected in the arsenals 45,000 muskets, of which the blacks had been disarmed: 12 or 15,000 more were still expected.—A negro general of the name of Bellair, had revolted, and assembled around him some hundreds of the brigands, who had set fire to several habitations in the plain of the Cape; he had, however, been arrested and shot.—A strong fermentation manifested itself amongst the blacks during the latter end of August, and beginning of September. Seeing our hospitals crowded with sick, and our soldiers unable to quit their cantonments on account of the excessive heat, the negroes were emboldened to act.—The Polish Legion, which disembarked on the 7th of October, displayed great bravery and courage in the pursuit of the Brigands.—Gen. Leclerc visited the hospitals and the barracks, and did all that was possible for man to do, to diminish the effects of the dreadful yellow fever.—Madame Leclerc on her part refused to quit the colony, and declared that she would not leave it until she was certain that her care was no longer necessary to her husband, and that the sister of the First Consul ought to know how to die in the midst of a camp.—The convoy of troops from Carthage, and one of the convoys from Rochefort, were not then arrived.—(Moniteur.)

A part of the Deputies of the Helvetic Republic, arrived at Paris some days ago. A deputation of fifteen of them had an audience last Tuesday, with the Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Cairo, Oct. 12.—The Pacha, who takes at Cairo the title of Viceroy, is fortifying with great activity the palace which Buonaparté occupied, under the apprehension that he may be besieged there by the Beys, who have taken possession of Upper Egypt, and extend their power even to the Pyramids. The troops of the Pacha have been five times beat by those of the Beys.—The English are still at Alexandria. General Stewart commands there with 4000 men.—The Turks have 3000 men at Damietta, 2000 at Rosetta, and 20,000 at Cairo.

Banks of the Mein, Nov. 16.—The English Ambassador, at Vienna, transmitted lately to the Count de Cobentzel a note, relative to the affairs of Switzerland, the object of which was, to engage the Emperor to interfere with the French Government, in favour of the re-establishment of the ancient Régime in Helvetia, but the Court of Vienna not only formally refused to interfere in the affairs of that country, but moreover, as it is said, ordered M. de Diesbach, who was desirous of presenting letters of credence, in the name of the diet of Schwitz, to quit the Austrian States.

Berne, Nov. 17.—Orders had been given for the disarming of the people of Helvetia in general: but representation having been made upon this subject, it is now determined that those only shall be disarmed who took part with the insurgents.

DOMESTIC.

On the 24th instant, his Majesty held a Levee at St. James's, which was numerously attended, it being the first after the opening of Parliament. The presentations were, Mr. Portalis, Secretary to the French Ambassador, accompanied by Messrs. Geveria and Bagne, Aid-de-Camps, by Andreossi; Lord Lowther, Lord Robert Tottenham, Lord Glendore, and the Hon. Mr. Lambé.

The Privy Council met on Friday the 19th inst. for the further examination of Col. Despard, and the other persons taken up on suspicion of treasonable practices. Two printed copies of the Oath administered at the Oakley Arms were found in the Colonel's pocket. He is fully committed to Newgate to take his trial for High Treason. Among the papers found in the possession of the prisoners, were seditious toasts and songs, but the most material was, one declaratory of certain rights, with a copy of the oath taken on becoming a member. It begins with—"Constitution, Independence of Ireland and Great-Britain, Equalization of all Civic Rights." Then follows an assurance that the members will unite to maintain the families of all those heroes who may fall in contending for their rights.

It appearing that this alarming combination had agents in different parts of the country, particularly in the manufacturing towns, messengers have been dispatched to the magistrates of these places, with instructions to take the speediest and most effectual measures to make every possible discovery relative to the subject.—On Saturday the 20th inst. several of the persons implicated underwent a further examination. The whole of the persons yet discovered amount to 36, amongst whom are four soldiers of the Guards.

The Privy Council met again on Wednesday the 24th inst. Fourteen of the persons in custody were brought up for examination; and several warrants were issued for the apprehension of other persons supposed to be implicated in this conspiracy.

PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT.*

November, 19, 20, and 21.

On the above days no business of importance was transacted. Both houses were chiefly employed in swearing in new members.

Tuesday, November 23.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—This day at half past two, his Majesty went in state to the House of Peers, and being seated, in his royal robes, on the throne, the Commons attended at the bar. His Majesty then opened the session with the following most gracious speech:—

HIS MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

My Lords, and Gentlemen,—It is highly gratifying to Me to resort to your advice and assistance, after the opportunity which has been recently afforded, of collecting the sense of My People.—The internal prosperity of the country has realized My most sanguine hopes; We have experienced the bounty of Divine Providence in the produce of an abundant harvest.—The state of the Manufactures, Commerce, and Revenues of My United Kingdom, is flourishing beyond example; and the Loyalty and Attachment which are manifested to My Person and Government, afford the strongest indication of the just sense that is entertained of the numerous blessings enjoyed under the protection of our happy Constitution.—In my intercourse with Foreign Powers, I have been actuated by a sincere disposition for the maintenance of Peace. It is nevertheless impossible for Me to lose sight of that established and wise system of policy, by which the interests of other States are connected with Our own; and I cannot therefore be indifferent to any material change in their relative condition and strength. My conduct will be invariably regulated by a due consideration of the actual situation of Europe, and by a watchful solicitude for the permanent welfare of My People.—You will, I am persuaded, agree with Me in thinking, that it is incumbent upon Us to adopt those means of security which are best calculated to afford the prospect of preserving to My Subjects the Blessings of Peace.—Gentlemen of the House of Commons,—I have ordered the estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before you; and I rely on your zeal and liberality in providing for the various branches of the Public Service; which it is a great satisfaction to Me to think, may be fully accomplished without any considerable addition to the burdens of My People.—My Lords and Gentlemen,—I contemplate with the utmost satisfaction, the great and increasing Benefits produced by that important measure, which has united the interests and consolidated the resources of Great-Britain and Ireland. The improvement and extension of these advantages, will be objects of your unremitting care and attention. The trade and commerce of My Subjects, so essential to the support of public credit, and of our maritime strength, will, I am persuaded, receive from you every possible encouragement; and you will readily lend your assistance in affording to mercantile transactions in every part of My United Kingdom, all the facility and accommodation that may be consistent with the public revenue.—To uphold the honour of the country, to encourage its industry, to improve its resources, and to maintain the true principles of the Constitution in Church and State, are the great and leading duties which you are called upon to discharge. In the performance of them, you may be assured of My uniform and cordial support; it being My earnest wish to cultivate a perfect harmony and confidence between Me and My Parliament, and to promote to the utmost the welfare of My faithful subjects, whose interests and happiness I shall ever consider as inseparable from My own.

* A correct report of the debates in both houses of parliament, from the commencement of the present session to the Christmas vacation, will be given in the SUPPLEMENT to the present volume of the Register, which will be ready for delivery on the 15th of January, 1803, at farthest. This Supplement will also contain "A Complete Collection of all the Debates upon the Preliminary and Definitive Treaty of Peace with France;" in which collection the prominent passages of each speech are particularly pointed out.

Lord Arden moved the address, which was, as usual, an echo of the speech, and was seconded by Lord Nelson. A debate took place on the danger to be apprehended from the encroachments of France. It was commenced by the Marquis of Albemarle, and supported by Lords Carlisle, Grenville, and Carington: the speakers on the other side of the question were the Duke of Norfolk, Lord Pelham, and Lord Hobart. The address was agreed to, nemine dissente.

Lord Walsingham was appointed chairman of the committee of privilege, of all the committees of the House, and of the private committees during the session.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—The House was engaged until half past two in swearing in members; when the Usher of the Black Rod appeared at the bar, and stated his Majesty's command, that the House should attend him forthwith in the House of Peers. The Speaker, accompanied by several members, proceeded accordingly, and on his return, the House resumed the swearing in of members.

Mr. Wallace brought in the Clandestine Outlawry bill, which was read a first, and ordered to be read a second time.

The usual committees of privileges, grievances, courts of justice, trade, and standing orders, were appointed. The several standing orders of the House were read and agreed to.

The Speaker then read his Majesty's speech (see p. 690). The address was moved by Mr. Trench, and seconded by Mr. Curzon: after which, an interesting debate ensued, on the conduct of France, since the conclusion of the treaty of peace, and on the inability of ministers to conduct a war, if war should be found expedient. This opinion was maintained by Mr. Cartwright, who was followed on the same side by Sir John Wrottesley, Messrs. Canning, Windham, T. Grenville, and Sir H. Milnes: the speakers on the other side were Mr. Pytches, Mr. Fox, Lord Hawkesbury, Mr. Addington, Lord Castlereagh, and Mr. Whitbread. The address was voted, nemine contradicente.

Wednesday, November 24.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—The Lord Chamberlain brought

a message from his Majesty, informing their lordships, that he would be ready to receive the address of the House, at St. James's, at three o'clock.

A variety of arrangements were made relative to the hearing of Scotch appeals; and some proceedings respecting private business took place.

The Lords went with their address to St. James's, at half after two.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Sundry unimportant petitions were presented: petitions were also presented against the election of the members for the following places, viz. Great Grimsby, Penryn, Borough of Stanmacr, Nottingham, Barnstaple, Chippenham, Caermarthenshire, Coventry, and Bridgewater.

Mr. Trench then brought up the report of the address on the King's speech. On the question for the second reading, Mr. Wilberforce rose, and delivered his sentiments on the propriety of abandoning continental connexions, and on the necessity and wisdom of maintaining peace, a debate of a similar nature to the one of yesterday took place. Mr. Wilberforce was supported in his opinions by Sir Francis Burdett, Mr. Johnstone, General Maitland, Mr. Yorke, Mr. Fox, Mr. Addington, Sir James Pullen, Lord Hawkesbury, and Mr. Baggot. The speakers on the other side of the question were Mr. Elliot, Mr. Dillon, Lord Temple, Mr. Windham, Lord Norpeth, and Mr. Canning.

The report of the address was agreed to nemine.

Mr. Vansittart gave notice, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would move to-morrow, for leave to bring in a bill for the better establishing and regulating the militia of Ireland.

Mr. Vansittart moved for "An Account of the Produce of the Permanent Taxes for the Years ending the 1st of Oct. 1801, and the 10th Oct. 1802." "An Account of the Amount of Bounties paid on the Importation of Corn and Rice for the same periods," and "An Account of the Amount of Exchequer Bills, issued under the Act of the 4th Geo. III. ch. 4, now outstanding and unprovided for."

Thursday, November 25,

HOUSE OF PEERS.—Two naturalization bills were brought in; and some arrangements made relative to the hearing of Scotch appeals.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Mr. Burdon moved for leave to bring in a bill for continuing the suspension of an Act of the 15th and 17th of his present Majesty, prohibiting the circulation of Promissory Notes, under a certain value.—Leave granted. A petition was presented from the Burgh of Kircudbright, in Scotland, complaining of an undue election.

Mr. Corry moved for leave to bring in a bill for the Regulation and more effectually enrolling of the Militia of Ireland.—Leave granted.

Mr. Vansittart moved, that that part of his Majesty's speech, relative to the public service should be read: he also moved, that a supply be granted to his Majesty; and that that part of his Majesty's speech should be referred to a committee of the whole House to-morrow.

At a quarter before 3 o'clock the House adjourned, and the Speaker, accompanied by several members, proceeded to St. James's with the address.

PUBLIC PAPERS.

Note addressed by the French Minister at the Diet of Ratisbon, to the Imperial Plenipotentiary, and to the Sub-Delegate for Bohemia, and which had been communicated to him by the said Minister, and afterwards by the Russian Minister.

The undersigned received on the 26th inst. a Note of the Imperial Plenipotentiary and the Sub-Delegate of Bohemia, containing the communication of the same wishes which they made at the opening of the Extraordinary Deputation of the Empire: he finds with confidence, and with the most lively interest, the hope of the approaching co-operation of his Imperial Majesty, in the intention of the mediating powers, and is very far from doubting that his Majesty has not made propositions the most proper, to remove every difficulty. That object may, however, be accomplished, without the deputation suspending its labours, which are too necessary for the tranquillity of Germany, and which at the same time will actuate the moment so much desired by his Imperial Majesty himself.—The undersigned seizes with true pleasure, this opportunity of renewing, as well to his Excellency the Imperial Plenipotentiary as to the Sub-Delegate of Bohemia, the assurance of his high consideration.

Ratisbon, Oct. 30, 1802. (Signed)—Laforest.

Proclamation issued by the King of Prussia at Hildesheim.

His Majesty the King of Prussia, &c. our most gracious Sovereign, after an examination of the accusations spread against the order of La Trappe, in obedience to an order of the Cabinet, of the 18th ult. has been pleased to allow the monks of La Trappe to remain in the country for the present, and till their further destination shall be arranged, but on condition that they shall neither take novices, nor bring into the country members of any other establishment of monks of La Trippe. They are also commanded, under the severest penalties, immediately to give up their establishment, for the education of children, and to restore all their pupils to their parents. All parents and guardians, whose residence is not known, are hereby required immediately to take back their children, and to apply for that purpose to the magistracy at Paderborn, who are commanded to lend them all possible assistance in claiming their children.—Done at Paderborn, Nov. 1, 1802, by his Mhjeesty's special command,—Schulenberg.

FROM THE LONDON GAZETTE, 1802.

St. James's, Nov. 17.—This day General Andréossi, Ambassador from the French Republic, had his first private Audience of his Majesty to deliver his Credentials:—To which he was introduced by the Right Hon. Lord Hawkesbury, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and conducted by Sir Stephen Cottrell, Knt. Master of the Ceremonies.

Nov. 18.—This day General Andréossi, Ambassador from the French Republic, had his first private Audience of her Majesty:—To which he was introduced by Edward Desbrow, Esq. Vice-Chamberlain to her Majesty, and conducted by Robert Chester, Esq. Assistant-Master of the Ceremonies.

* * * The Letter to Lord Auckland, which could not be divided, and which relates to a subject deeply interesting to every body, has compelled us to postpone the insertion of several valuable articles from Correspondents.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

The last week has not, that we have yet heard, seen the destruction of any kingdom or principality, except, perhaps, in the Empire of Germany, where the work of indemnifying does not appear to be quite finished: when it is, Citizen Talleyrand will, perhaps, condescend to supply the surrounding nations with a list of the states of Europe, as the Consul intends them to remain. Whether Switzerland will be a name upon this list, or whether it will form a department or two of France, appears, at present, to be altogether uncertain. And here we cannot refrain from observing on the infatuation, which has prevailed in England, with respect to the Swiss and their government. At first the success of the "patriots" was regarded as certain; their triumph in some trifling skirmishes came in confirmation of this opinion. Buonaparté issued his proclamation; this was to fill the Swiss with indignation and fury; it had a contrary effect; it produced a promise of submission, and yet the words of the Swiss themselves were not believed; it was certainly a "com-promise." The next post brought us word, that the Diet of Schwitz was absolutely dissolved, and that French troops had marched into every principal post in the country. This looked more like subjugation; but still there was "great hope in the "exertions of REDING and his comrades." To blast, however, this last foolish hope, we are now informed, that Reding and the principal patriots have been arrested by an order of the French government, and imprisoned in the Castle of Chillon, on the banks of the Lake of Geneva, where, we dare say, they are full as secure as, in the days of "despotism," they would have been, in the Bastille of Paris. But, this is not all, the "Helvetic government," that is to say, Buonaparté's Swiss government, that is to say the government which we left in that country, at the date of the treaty of Amiens, and which we tacitly acknowledge by that treaty, has, amongst the first of its new series of oppressions, issued a proclamation, (which we shall insert in our next sheet), by which it calls upon the miserable people to "furnish EXTRAORDINARY CONTRIBUTIONS for the support of the French troops, which their insurrections have caused to enter the country!"—Long may the countries we love, long may Ireland, long may England and Scotland, long, very long, may they be free from such contributions! It is our humble and hearty prayer that they may, but that they will we have not the confidence to say.

There are, it seems, two demi-brigades of French troops, consisting of about 3,000 men, expected to embark very shortly, from Helvoetsluys from Louisiana, where several French engineers and commissaries arrived in September last. Provisions are to be furnished by the Dutch, and the men are to be conveyed in fifteen American merchant ships, under convoy of two French frigates from Brest. The American ships have been engaged in Holland, and will, of course, be paid for by the Batavians, whose new name has already cost them pretty dear. Thus, then, of this whole armament, which, in its object, is one of the most important that ever sailed from the ports of Europe, France furnishes, at her own expense, only the two frigates, which are, perhaps, besides, manned, in great part, and victualled altogether, by the Dutch! And yet there are persons, who are still weak enough to rely, for the security of England, on the poverty of France; on her want of "credit, capital, and confidence!"

For about the 20th time, it is reported, that LECLERC is dead, at St. Domingo. This may, at last, be true*; and we wish it were not more probable than those other accounts, which we hear of, from the same quarter, of insurrections and plagues, that are likely to induce the French to evacuate the Island! From our souls we wish, that we may not be compelled to evacuate the Island of Britain sooner! We are perfectly serious. In no time or country did infatuation ever prevail in so great a degree as in this country, at this time, and upon this particular subject. The produce and the trade of the French part of St. Domingo are already greater, far greater, than the produce and trade of Jamaica; and we call upon the friends of the ministers to contradict this statement if they can; if they dare, we have proofs, indubitable proofs, wherewith to establish our assertions. But, as we have constantly observed, it is not as a source of direct gain, that St. Domingo, or any other part of the West Indies, is valuable in the estimation of France. Our sapient ministers, our "safe politicians," have proclaimed to the world, that we have made peace for the "wise purpose of recruiting our

* Since our writing this the French papers have brought us the intelligence that will be found in p. 688, and which once more mars the hopes of those who relied on the alliance of the yellow fever of St. Domingo, once more disturbs the "paradise of fools" and of cowards.

"strength, of husbanding our resources," in order to be able, in a few years' time to cope with France; and this, therefore, is what France will prevent us from doing, by destroying our commerce and colonies as much as lies in her power. She does not want to take Jamaica for the sake of any other sort of gain than that which she will derive from our loss. Eight thousand French troops arrived at St. Domingo, from Europe, late in September, when the sickness must have been nearly over; and, on the 10th of October another convoy of troops was daily expected from Carthagera and a third from Rochefort. There were upwards of twenty thousand already there, besides disciplined blacks, making, altogether, an effective army of not less than forty thousand men; and these men commanded by some of the most skilful and enterprising officers in the world, and lying at no more than five hours sail from the most valuable of all our colonies. A descent on the Island of Jamaica is so practicable, so easy, that, if it be not accomplished before this day twelvemonths, unless we greatly augment our force in the West Indies, we shall be disposed to join Mr. Fox and lord Castlereagh in extolling the moderation of Buonaparté.—On this subject, too, we cannot but refer to the arguments of those, who, afraid to rely upon their own exertions, would fain persuade themselves and their hearers, that France must ultimately fail, in the West Indies, or elsewhere, for want of money. What does she want money for? "Man and steel, the soldier and his "sword," her own fruitful, and now almost boundless territories produce in abundance. What does she want money for? Not to enable commissaries and quarter-masters-general to return home with the fortunes of Nabobs; not to enable her generals to take leave of absence, and to lounge away their time in the laps of the harlots of Philadelphia and New York, and there to libel their master both by their actions and their words. For what, then, does she want money? She wants money to pay for the provisions necessary to the support of an army of fifty thousand men, and this money she finds, not in France, nor in Spain, nor in Holland, nor in America, but in England! In answer to objections like those above referred to, it was, in the letters on the peace, p. 186, observed, that France would find capital on the Royal Exchange of London; and, this conjecture is now fully established by the fact, to which, we suspect, Mr. Windham alluded, in the debate of Tuesday last, in the House of Commons, and which we think it our duty fully to explain. As soon as Buonaparté determined, after the signature of the preliminaries, to send out a fleet and army to the West Indies, application was made to the house of Willings, of Philadelphia, to supply them with provisions. This application was accompanied with a proposal, that Messrs. Willings should draw, for payment on the joint firm of three of the most respectable houses of Paris, which the Americans wisely refused, and preferring one house in London. This was agreed to; the house of Sir Francis Baring was fixed on, and that house has actually paid Messrs. Willings for the provisions so supplied. For this statement we have unquestionable authority. We do not mean to insinuate, that there is any thing at all blame-worthy in the conduct of the house of Sir Francis Baring. It is a mere mercantile transaction, of which, if that house had refused it, another would, undoubtedly, have accepted. We have been led into this explanation by the desire which we have to undeceive our readers on a subject, with respect to which a very great and very dangerous error prevails; to wit: that France has neither "capital, crédit nor confidence," which we possess to such an unlimited degree, and without which no nation is capable of exertion, particularly beyond the limits of the mother country. It is notorious, that the conquerors of St. Domingo sailed out of Brest Water with sixteen thousand pounds in their military chest, hardly enough to lay in sweet-meats for one of Mr. Dundas's heroic West India generals; but, as we observed once before, if France be poor in purse, she is rich in friends. She is perfectly at home, in every country in the world: first she drew upon the Dutch, next upon the Spaniards, but, unwilling to exhaust her poor neighbours, she took the laudable and generous course, and drew upon us, who had been boasting of our wealth.

We have heard no more of the sailing of the Toulon fleet, which we suppose is yet in port. It consists of twelve sail of the line and seven frigates, and it is certain that troops have been marching into Toulon for some time.—On the subject of French naval preparations, we observed in our last (p. 647.) that Buonaparté had launched eighteen ships of war since the signature of the preliminaries, but, by a mistake of the press, they were called ships of the line. There were, we understood, seven of the line, six frigates, and five of smaller size, which account, we perceive agrees with Mr. Windham's statement in the House of Commons, except as to the smaller vessels.—The circumstance, mentioned by the same right hon. gentleman, respecting the quantity of hemp imported by France from Russia, during the season which is now about to close, is, too, of very great importance. This quantity was stated at ten thousand tons, far, we believe, within bounds, but certainly equal to the quantity imported for the use of the British navy in any one year even of war. Yet France has no money! Great part of this hemp has, too, been shipped from Russia to France by English merchants, and in English bottoms. And yet France has neither "credit nor confidence!" Not a single sailor has she discharged, and it is notorious, that she has taken thousands of ours into her pay. And yet we are confidently told to rely upon her poverty for our safety! We do not fear, that France will be able to create a navy capable of disputing with ours the sovereignty of the sea: she has no such foolish intention. But, we do fear, that she will very soon be in a situation to give us continual uneasiness; we do fear, that she will, by keeping up an army of embarkation in the Netherlands, be able to fix our regards on the county of Essex, while she falls upon Ireland, an object for which we should not be at all surprized if the Toulon expedition be intended, more especially when we consider, that our retention of some of the places to be restored would furnish a plausible, and, perhaps, a justifiable, pretext for such a most dangerous act of hostility.

The French official paper, the Moniteur, which we, from day to day, see more and more reason to call le livre des destins, has put forth a sort of manifesto against our East-India domination. The passage (in the Moniteur of the 17th inst.) we more particularly allude to is this:—"The affairs of India are not foreign to any of the powers of Europe. The spoils of India serve, not merely to enrich those who appropriate them; the conqueror employs them to corrupt the counsellors and agents of other princes and states. With gold in his hand, he procures the adoption of resolutions contrary to the national interest; and, on this account, European tyranny cannot be extended in India, without the peace and prosperity of Europe being menaced and disturbed."—This passage makes part of a sort of preface to a translation of our parliamentary papers respecting the deposition of the Nabob of Arcot. Their object and tendency are evident. The jealousy, the envy, and the hatred, which they are admirably calculated to excite against us, in all the courts and countries of the continent, will be necessary to insure the connivance of those courts and countries, with respect to a project, which is intended to cut off the principal arm of Britain, if the blow aimed at her heart should fail.—Nothing can be more fully descriptive of the rooted hatred, of the unquenchable thirst of destruction, which the republicans of France have with respect to this country; and, whatever traitors and fanatics may unite in saying to the contrary, that hatred, that desire to destroy, are general through the republic. The whole of France, as she now is, has, with one voice, one mind, and one heart, sworn not only our ruin and disgrace, but our utter extirpation.—To resist a foe thus disposed and resolved, and having at her absolute command more than half of the human power in the world, we have the skill and the courage of the Hawkesburys and the Addingtons!

Since our last, his Majesty has met his Parliament, and has graciously condescended to deliver to them a speech from the throne. His Majesty was, on this occasion, received by the thousands who were assembled to see him, with every demonstration of joy, with every expression of loyalty, veneration, and love!—Would to God, that the heads of his ministers were as good as the hearts of his people!

To describe the system of Ministers, to guess even at the measures they mean to adopt, would be no easy matter. They are so light in themselves, and receive their impulse from so many and such conflicting directions, they are so truly a reed shaken with the wind, that it is impossible to say which way they will next bend, or into what form they will next be blown and battered. Nothing can more strongly mark their imbecility, their total ignorance of foreign affairs, their absolute incapacity for conducting any thing of moment, the contempt in which they are held all over Europe, than their late, compared with their present tone and conduct with respect to Switzerland. It was on the 4th of October, that they published, in the True Briton, (which is as much their official paper as the Moniteur is the official paper of Buonaparté), their first manifesto against the encroachments of France. In that paper, they asserted, that the interference of the Consul in the affairs of Switzerland, made "the cause of that country a common one with every power not a voluntary slave to the influence of France;" and, added they, "a resistance to the system at present pursued by Buonaparté, becomes a duty in the rulers of every free country."—On the 11th of October,

(we still quote the True Briton): "The cool sneering insolence, the haughty supercilious arrogance, of this last proclamation" (the proclamation of Buonaparté) "would provoke the resistance of the most timid, to put a stop to a SYSTEM OF AGGRESSION, a submission to which has tarnished the honour, and nearly destroyed the independence of EUROPE."—On the 19th of October: "Scarcely one month has passed, since the signature of the preliminaries of peace, which has not been attended with the adoption of measures on the part of the French government, calculated to excite the just jealousy and apprehensions of this nation * * * They" [the Ministers] "will not quietly suffer Buonaparté to destroy the independence of Switzerland: they will not suffer him, by a virtual infringement of the peace he has made with us, to oppress and subdue other nations, or to aggrandize his power, so as to increase the danger to ourselves. * * * They will not suffer the country to be conquered in peace—they will not permit themselves to be deluded by the name, when they cannot obtain the thing; and they know, that the result, even of an UNSUCCESSFUL war would not, in all probability, be more fatal to us than the completion of that system, on the part of France, of which we have spoken."—On the 30th of October: "His Majesty's ministers cannot proceed to carry into effect the articles of the treaty with France, which relate to the cessions to be made, without new stipulations. If the Chief Consul annexes Piedmont to the Republic, let us keep Malta—if he interferes in the affairs of Holland" [which he has never ceased to do], "let us keep the Cape, Demerara, and Essequibo. * * * Ministers wish for peace, if we can preserve it without a sacrifice of our honour and our interests—but to cling to a feverish, restless peace, denying us the advantages of a state of real tranquillity—to make use of the interval to restore our conquests—and to see (what the conduct of France gives us too much reason to suppose we should see) the war break out again, as soon as we had made all our restitutions, would be to take a line of conduct which his Majesty's ministers will not adopt, and which none can recommend, except those who would see with pleasure the aggrandizement of France and the ruin of the British Empire."—This was their language on the 30th of October; in five days afterwards their tone was thus softened: "The King's ministers will be moderate but firm.—They must, at the same time, recollect how much the relative situation of France with this country is changed since the signature of the Treaty of Amiens; but, if any compromise can be made with respect to the conquests we still retain, reserving to us even LESS than our JUST demands, we trust they will be disposed to evince their moderation by accepting such compromise, rather THAN HAVE RECOURSE TO THE DREADFUL ALTERNATIVE OF WAR."—Now, it behoves us to enquire what could have wrought this great and sudden change in the language and sentiments of those "safe politicians." Not any alteration in the system, not any relaxation in the violent proceedings of Buonaparté, who had actually marched his troops into Switzerland, who had done what the ministers had declared they would not suffer him to do, and who, in addition to his actions, had made use of words declarative of his resolution, not only to persevere in his system, but had so explained that system as to leave no doubt of his intention to cut us off, for ever, from all connection with the Continent of Europe. But (mark well the important circumstance) the same manifesto (see p. 565), which contained these insolent and domineering threats against their country, also contained an observation, that Buonaparté approved of the Ministers themselves, and deprecated the views of those who wished to remove them from their places. This, this it was, which, in our opinion, changed the tone of the men, who have "an hereditary disposition to office." We are perfectly serious. From our souls we believe, that to this and this alone we have to attribute, that we are now at peace. People laugh at the Addingtons and Hawkesburys: they laughed at the Helvetic government; but the latter is now mocking the mocker, and the former will keep their places, in spite of all the efforts that can be made against them, unless such an union can be brought about as would conciliate the wishes and rouse the spirit of the people, and command the respect and confidence of foreign nations; and that such an union should be formed is the most improbable of all improbable things. The very men, with some few exceptions, who support the Ministers, agree with us as to their total incapacity to conduct the affairs of the nation; but, as to the remedy, we differ. The calling in of Mr. Pitt, would, without a radical change of system and of notions, and without an union of talents, character, and courage, in every department of the State, only serve to eke out the disgraceful existence of the country for a few years, or, perhaps, a few months; and, if we are to be sacrificed, it is little matter by whom; the meaner the instrument, as far as we know, the better; it would be a poor consolation to see the name of Pitt, a name in which we have gloried, coupled with the final destruction of England. "To defend Gibraltar," said Burke, "is worthy of the genius and the courage of an Elliot; to deliver its keys to the enemy, is a task which had better be performed by a drunken invalid."

We congratulate the ministers on the support which they are likely to receive from the hearty and united efforts of Messrs. Fox and Wilberforce, and Sir Francis Burdett. We could not listen to the long and painful endeavours of the former of these, to persuade the nation that we have nothing to prepare against but a rivalité in trade and commerce, without recollecting a most remarkable passage in the letter of our valuable correspondent SWENSKA, p. 132. "Buonaparté intends to amuse you with a rizaliti in trade and national improvement: if you believe him, you will not long be his rival in power"—To this we have nothing to add, except it be to remark, that the letter was published in London so long ago as the 7th of August.—Mr. Wilberforce reproves the country for putting its trust in talents and human wisdom, instead of listening to the counsels of simple, common men, men in the middle class of society, a reproof, which it certainly does not merit.

Every thing that has transpired, during the last four or five days, tends more and more to convince us, that England is fast approaching to her final doom, and that she deserves no longer to escape the chastisement of Heaven. She has on her all the marks of a degenerate and falling nation. Since the 1st of October, 1801, how rapid has been her decline! We may be mistaken; we hope we are; but, with the consciousness that we stand in the presence of God, we do declare it to be our opinion, that, if the present course be pursued, a very short time will see this island in the possession of France.

POSTSCRIPT.

Our readers will perceive (p. 689) that the Emperor has refused to have any connection with us, in remonstrating in behalf of the Swiss Cantons.—This is as it should be. We are "too honest," the receivers of Trinidad and Ceylon are "too honest;" those who gave up Guiana, and who abandoned the Stadholder and the French Royalists, are truly "too honest" for the Emperor of Germany to be connected with!—It is to be hoped, that the Ministers will take an early opportunity of laying before Parliament, the papers relative to the remonstrance which they made to Buonaparté, in behalf of the Swiss; and also those relative to the overtures made to the Emperor. Were we in their place, we should be very anxious to unload ourselves of the accumulation of disgrace, which has grown upon them since the last kind Parliament, by adopting their resolutions, had the goodness to take the burthen from their shoulders.

Just as this sheet was going to the press, we were informed of the arrival, in this country, of a number of those French commercial agents, of which we spoke some time ago. They are all understood to be experienced in military and naval matters, and are intended to reside in our several sea-ports, naval as well as commercial. Our wise and courageous ministers were alarmed at the proposition of sending such persons as these to line our coasts, as it were; and they actually refused to receive them, which refusal formed one of the subjects of dispute between the two countries. In the mean time, one of them was sent to the island of Jersey, where the Governor refused to receive him; but, where he has nevertheless remained, and does still remain, setting the Governor and his government at defiance; and, we are informed, that ministers have not had the courage to order him to be removed.—Impunity begets hardihood; accordingly a whole swarm of these agents have since been sent to England, in defiance of the declared will of His Majesty's Government; they are now arrived, and are actually, at this moment, in London. One of them, at least, is, we understand, destined for Ireland!!!

* * Our next will contain a letter from Mr. COBBETT to the Hon. CHARLES JAMES FOX, relative to a misquotation which the latter made from the Political Register, and to divers other matters, particularly the "LIBERTY OF THE PRESS," of which Mr. Fox, till he breathed the all-regenerating air of St. Cloud, was a constant defender.

The next sheet will also contain a letter to Mr. WM. WILBERFORCE, on his address to his honest Yorkshiremen, particularly those parts of the said address which relate to Parliamentary Honours, and Continental Connections.

PICTURE OF FRANCE IN 1801.

The following extracts from a quarto volume, of 800 pages, recently published by CHAPTAL, the French Minister for the home department, under the title of "Analyse des Procès Verbaux des Conseils, sésion de l'An IX," (1801), while it will enable our readers to form a correct idea of the miserable internal situation of the country, to which Britain, in that same fatal year, for the first time, bowed the knee in sign of submission, will also give them a prospect of the probable consequences of that base and disgraceful act.—We are confident, that no work (the "Bloody Buoy," and the "Cannibal's Progress," excepted) exhibits such a combination of misery and crimes, and we are not at all surprised, that Citizen Chaptal's book should have been suppressed; but the more we look at the horrid picture the more resentment we feel against the feeble, the timid, and selfish men, who laid the glories of England at the feet of France, and who, in that weak and wicked act, exposed our country to all the horrors which this shocking picture presents to our view.

LAND-TAX. in the department of the ESCAUT: This department in extent is a 230th-part of the Republic; it pays a 58th-part of the land-tax.—MANCHE. The land-tax amounts to one-half of the net rent.—ROER. In many of the communes the land-tax amounts to one half, or two thirds of the net rent.—SOANE (haute). In granting new leases, proprietors of land are obliged to lower their rent a 4th or a 5th below its amount in 1790.

AGRICULTURE.—SARRE. Agriculture is entirely neglected. For want of markets, farmers only sow as much as is necessary to provide for their families and their cattle.

SHEEP.—SEINE (inferieure). The number of sheep is diminished one-third since 1790.

WOLVES.—AISNE. The number of wolves is greatly increased.—CANTAL. The increase of wolves is very alarming.—LOVRET. Wolves have multiplied to an alarming extent. The damage they commit is incalculable.—VENDÉE. Wolves carry off the cattle, and attack them even in their stalls.

COMMERCE.—FINISTÈRE. Foreign commerce is annihilated. Three fourths of our coasters have been either captured or destroyed.—MANCHE. The only remains of our trade are a few fishing boats, and a few privateers.—MONT TONNERRE. Smuggling is become very injurious to our commerce; the custom-house officers engage in this traffic. It is ascribed to the high duties on foreign merchandize.—RHONE. We think that English goods should be prohibited; and that the fancy works of Lyons should be brought into fashion, both in France and abroad, by means of presents.—SEINE (inferieure). France, in order to acquire the rank among the commercial nations of Europe to which she is entitled by her position, her industry, her force, and her riches, ought to establish an effectual act of navigation; to obtain from Spain the right of supplying South America with manufactures; and the privilege of importing Spanish wool, as a favoured nation; to form a commercial treaty with Russia, on a different plan from that of 1788, and with Denmark and Sweden; but, if possible, to avoid entering into a commercial treaty with Great Britain.—SOMME. The English are our most formidable rivals. Prohibit the introduction of their manufactures; burn them in the market place; post up the names of those who sell them; and determine what are English goods by judges selected from persons who are engaged in similar manufactures.

HOSPITALS.—BOUCHES DU RHONE. All the hospitals in this department are in a wretched state.—CREUSE. The state of the hospitals is worse than it was last year: they will soon cease to exist.—GARD. The distress of the hospitals in this department is general:

They require annually	Livres 250,479
Their revenues amount to	98,838
They are in arrear	213,951
They have lost	1,861,760

LANDES. The hospitals are threatened with total destruction: the sick can neither procure food nor medicine.

FOUNDLINGS.—ALLIER. The nurses have five years wages due to them: they will, therefore, receive no more foundlings. Nine-tenths of them are lost.—CANTAL. Extreme penury obliges this department to feed its foundlings with goat's milk. Seven-eighths die before they are one year old.—CHARENTE (inferieure). For want of pecuniary means the establishments have ceased for two years to send their foundlings to nurse. Of two hundred infants received into the hospital at Saintes one only has lived.—CREUSE. The foundlings perish in consequence of neglect. Twelve or fifteen are suckled by two nurses.—LANDES. Infants enter into the hospital to die there by thousands: there are no means of providing nurses.—PYRÉNÉES (hautes). Between the year two and the year nine, 366 infants were received into the hospital at Tarbes: there are only 124 alive.

SOLICITATIONS FOR RELIEF.—GARD. The land-holders are ruined, and can no longer cultivate their vineyards. An immense number of labourers are without bread, and reduced to desperation.—NORD. The whole country exhibits marks of warfare. The fields have been striped, the proprietors plundered, their houses burnt; and yet the inexorable collectors of the revenue insists on receiving taxes from farms which have been wholly unproductive.

PRISONS.—AVERON. None of the prisons are both wholesome and secure: most of them are neither the one nor the other. The dungeons of Ville Franche are so damp, that straw, placed there, rots immediately. No where are women separated from men, or the convicted from those who are simply detained.—BOUCHES DU RHONE. The prisons of this department are in so unwholesome a state, that humanity is disgusted, and the public safety endangered. When the Rhone is high its waters filtre through the walls of the prison at Tarascon, and inundate its cells. No one comes out without a rheumatism for life. (We cannot do justice to the French expression—il n'en sort que des cadavres rhumatisés pour la vie.)—DOUBS. Contractors for supplying prisons, in order to indemnify themselves for bad bargains, reduce the quantity of clothing and food allowed to prisoners; who have never been so ill treated as they are at present.—MANCHE. The prison at Mortain has no roof: the court yard of this prison is a complete common-sewer. The same may be said of the prison at St. Lo. The prison at Mount St. Michel is a wonderful piece of art: but, in its present state, it threatens to crush two hundred prisoners. Its lead and gutters have been carried off. The prison at Avranches is a subterraneous dungeon in which living victims are immured.—MARNE. The prison is in such a state, that the prisoners are threatened with instant death by its fall: they are, also, exposed to destruction from the mass of putrefaction which surrounds them.—OISE. A dungeon ten feet square, five feet high, and sunk seven feet below the level of the ground, constitutes the prison at Breteuil. The innocent, the accused, and the convicted, are all heaped together, in this tomb, without distinction of age or sex. During the year nine, it has altogether received 2278 prisoners. (Query, if the little town of Breteuil, in one year, received 2278 persons into its prison, what number may we reasonably suppose, to have been immured during the same period in all the prisons of the Republic? We advise those Middlesex jacobinical orators, who can read, to peruse the whole of this chapter on prisons. It will furnish them with many embellishments for their next description of what they denigrate an English Bastille.)

GREAT ROADS.—LOIRE (inferieure). The great roads are in a wretched state. 7,000,000 livres (about £300,000) are required to repair them, or rather to make them anew.—RHONE. The roads in every direction, through France, are impassable.—VOSGES. The roads are so entirely ruined, that the country people carry off the paving stones to build houses or to form enclosures. (The Prefect of the department of “the Var,” in his statistical account, lately published, says, that the roads are a muddy abyss which sometimes swallows up carriages, horses, and drivers.)

CROSS ROADS.—MAINE AND LOIRE. The roads are so execrable, that some Communes, for several months, have no intercourse with each other. Men and cattle are swallowed up.—NORD. The cross roads in this department are so bad that they may be fairly said not to exist.

CANALS.—YONNE. The canal of Burgundy has already cost sixteen millions (above £600,000) which will be all thrown away, if the completion of this canal is not speedily attended to.

PORTS.—MANCHE. The works at Cherbourg have been neglected; and are therefore in a state of ruin.

BRIDGES.—BOUCHES DU RHONE. The bridges are in as bad a state as the roads.

NAVIGATION.—SEINE (inferieure). A navigation act (like that of England or Sweden) is much wanted.

PUBLIC INSTRUCTION.—SCHOOLS.—AISNE. All the schools have been sold: few of the buildings remain. The children are left in a state of idleness and vagrancy; they have no ideas of a Supreme Being, and no notions of right or wrong. It is owing to this that our manners are harsh and barbarous, and that we are a ferocious people.—FORÊTS. Few persons in the country can sign their name.—GIROUDE. Our schools have too many holidays. The masters are obliged to shut their schools on the Decades; and parents will keep holy the days which the Christian religion appropriates to rest. So that, instead of correcting the abuses arising from too many holidays, we have increased them.—LYS. Most of the schoolmasters in the primary schools have obtained their situation by no other qualification than a readiness to take the oath which their predecessors had refused.—MARNE AND LOIRE. In all the little Communes there is no kind of school whatever.—MEUSE (inferieure). It is to be feared that in fifteen years not one person in a hundred will be able to write.—PAS DE CALAIS. Children are left in the most profound ignorance, and the most alarming profligacy. Vandalism has destroyed almost every building appropriated to the purposes of education.

MUSEUMS.—ESCAUT. Nothing has afflicted the inhabitants of Belgium more sensibly than the loss of their pictures.

THEATRES.—DEUX SEVRES. Young persons are grown extremely fond of theatrical declamation. May this taste accord with patriotism, with good morals, and with virtue!

POPULATION.—CANTAL. The population of this department is evidently reduced. In the year 3 (1795) it amounted to 244,016 persons: in the year 8 it was only 220,304.—CHARENTE (inferieure). Its population is decreased from 420,000 persons (the amount in 1790) to 399,000. The causes of this difference are war—the wretched state of hospitals, the abandonment of infants, the repeal of the law which allows fathers and mothers to inherit from their children, the facility of procuring divorces, and early marriages, which are entered into through dread of military requisition.—GIROUDE. It is said, that population is diminished considerably in all the Communes of this department, and that it is reduced one-tenth in Bourdeaux. The causes (which are common to all France) are a destructive war by sea and land, emigration, proscription, famine, corruption of morals, the ruin of manufactures and of commerce, the want of labourers, and excessive fatigue.

REMARKS ON GOVERNMENT.—OISE. The council observes with regret, that their labours and their efforts are useless. Their last session has produced no improvement. Their requests and their informations have not been attended to. They ascribe these evils to the war; and they hope that peace will enable government to attend to the internal concerns of the republic.

REGISTERS.—ARRIÈGE. Not only negligence, ignorance, and inattention to duty, but wilful mis-statements are found in the registers. To preserve friends from the military conscription and requisition some persons have made such entries in the registers, that it appears from them, that a woman, sixty years old, has married thirty-six conscripts, and that a mother six years old has been delivered of a son.—FINISTÈRE. Some Communes have no registers.

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,

"Music has charms to soothe the savage breast;"

How much greater, then, may we not expect its influence to be on the minds of a cultivated assembly of noblemen and gentlemen. As there seems to be a more than usual quantity of discord among our statesmen at present, I would advise the minister to try the effects of harmony. Instead of circular letters from the Treasury, how much better would it be, to send round a polite invitation to a Concert! The inclosed is a sketch of the selection which I think might form the First Act.—I am, Sir, your constant Reader,

G. Crotchbet.

Concert of Music, Vocal and Instrumental, to be performed at the Great Room.

DEAD MARCH IN SAUL.

Glee for three Voices.

MR. ADDINGTON, LORD HAWKESBURY, and LORD CASTLEREACH.

We are three poor Ministers,
Such as the CONSUL please;
From bluster to humility
We change about with ease.
Shall we again go round, around, around?
Shall we again go round?
If FOX will be our bully-boy,
With him we'll kiss the ground, the ground, the ground,
We care not for those martial men,
That our poor peace disdain;
But we care for those merchant men
That do our stocks maintain.
With them will we go round, around, around,
With them will we go round;
With them and FOX our bully-boy
Again we'll kiss the ground, the ground, the ground.

Bag-Pipe CONCERTO by GENERAL MAITLAND: in which will be introduced the favourite tune of "De'il take the Wars," with variations.

ANTHEM ON THE PEACE.

(As performed at Bisham Abbey)

MR. WILBERFORCE and MR. VANSITTART.

MR. WILBERFORCE.

The wise men are ashamed, they are dismayed, and taken: and what wisdom is in them? Jer. viii. part of ver. 9.

The way-faring men, though fools, shall not err therein. Isa. xxxv. 8.

MR. VANSITTART.

They have healed the hurt of the daughter of my people slightly. Saying, peace, peace, when there is no peace. Jer. viii. 11.

MR. WILBERFORCE.

Why do we sit still? assemble yourselves and let us enter into the defenced cities and let us be silent there. Jer. viii. 14.

MR. VANSITTART.

We looked for peace, and no good came: and for a time of health, and behold trouble. Jer. viii. 15.

SOLO on the Irish Harp by COL. ARCHDALL, who will introduce "Croppies lie down."

QUINTETTO from the Padlock.

Mr. FOX, Mr. ADDINGTON, Mr. HOBHOUSE,
Mr. NICHOLL, and Mr. WILBERFORCE.

Mr. FOX.

O thou, whose peace enchants my heart,
Hear me my politics explain.

Mr. ADDINGTON.

I must not hear—no more impart—
Too small, alas! is my desert
An orator, like you, to gain.

Mr. FOX.

Then do I seek your love in vain?

Mr. ADDINGTON.

It is another's right;

Mr. FOX.

_____ and he,
Seceder! is prefer'd to me,
Who here the brunt sustain!

Mr. HOBHOUSE.

(From the Bench above the Treasury.)

Come over, Charles, I've been to try.

Mr. NICHOLL.

(From the Stranger's Gallery.)

And so have I.

BOTH.

The Cabinet is not too high:
If you please,
You'll mount with ease.

Mr. FOX to Mr. ADDINGTON.

Can you a nod, a smile deny!
Shall it be so?
If you say no,
I cannot go.

Mr. ADDINGTON.

I to say no, or yes, am loath.
But, should PITT his room require,
Will you promise to retire?

Mr. HOBHOUSE.

Oh! you shall hear him take his oath.

Mr. FOX.

By what BUONAPARTE told;
By his liveries, green and gold;
His Mamelukes that still attend;
His more than royal state and eares.

Mr. WILBERFORCE.

Lord have mercy! how he swears!
He makes my hairs
All stand on end.

Mr. HOEHOUSE.

Come, that's enough—once more, my friend!

ALL.

Let us join, while join we may,
While at Bath, Pitt keeps away.
Rats, when puss is absent, play:
PITT may come, if we delay.

Full Piece by the Treasury Band.

TO THE EDITOR.

MR. EDITOR,—I live in the country, and my time is chiefly spent in retirement and study: but I am a very attentive observer of every event in this important and critical period. Among the various productions of the present day your Register is the most popular, and I read it with pleasure and with instruction. The spirit of a real Briton animates every passage, the ardour of a loyal patriot for the welfare of his country glows in every sentiment, and the most profound knowledge of its political relations is conspicuous in every number of your publication. Is it then, Sir, extraordinary that it should be read with eagerness by every class of society? You alone, unawed by that dastard spirit of submission to a man, who is aiming to grasp the sceptre of the globe; that dastard spirit which, originating in the present timid ministry, and abetted, by those worthy Citizens Messrs. Fox and Burdett, enervates the courage, and depresses the vigour of this once glorious, but now falling, nation; you alone have stood in the gap of destruction, you have called upon us, you have warned us, you have painted in the most expressive colours the dreadful perils which surround us on every side; without, an implacable foe; and within, domestic and pernicious traitors; and your ideas are conveyed in a bold and free style, a masculine eloquence well suited to the conceptions of your fearless and sagacious mind. Sir, your fatal predictions from the moment of signing the preliminaries to this day were, alas! but too well grounded in truth: part of them have been literally fulfilled, and the rest are in a course of evident accomplishment. The prognostications of Mr. Burke on the progressive evils of the French revolution, then in its infancy, have been so exactly answered by subsequent facts, that posterity will be tempted to regard them as historical records collected long after the events. The same may be predicted of your own writings. If Porphyry, having industriously collated the testimonies of prophane historians, casual and undesigned, to the authenticity of Daniel's Prophecies, and found them uniformly harmonious, could explore no better means of relieving himself from the pressing difficulty than by a gratuitous affirmation that they were published after the transactions which, as he said, they affected to foretell; truly, Sir, so accurate have you and Mr. Burke been in your anticipations of what was to happen in this terrible convulsion of society, before it did actually happen, that we cannot reasonably censure another age if it look upon you both as no more than historians or annalists. But be that as it may: if an unexampled combination of moral depravity, inflicted by the righteous judgment of offended heaven upon a degenerate nation, had not deafened our ears against the most solemn proofs, appeals, and admonitions, you, Sir, would have roused again the antient energies of our valiant country, which the opiates of her present unskilful and dangerous physicians have now plunged in so deep unconscious a lethargy, as, I much fear, is a prelude to that leaden sleep of death from which she will awake no more. You would have stimulated her, while still flushed with health, to resist in time the ambition of the Corsican, which no compromise short of her destruction can satiate, and whose rooted enmity the grave only can extinguish.

*Et si fata Deum, si mens non læva fuisset,

I mean this letter as an introduction; and, if you deem it worthy of a place in your Register, I shall be happy to maintain an occasional correspondence. In that case my next will consist of cursory remarks on the tergiversations of that political weather-cock, that Vicar of Bray in all changes of men and measures—MR. HERIOT, as they are prominently exhibited in his two stupid and heavy prints, the Sun and True Briton: of short, but, I hope, striking observations on the nature of that extraordinary bargain which MR. FREELING, Secretary to the General Post-Office, attempted to drive with you; against whose proposal your upright mind, impelled by the noblest motive, to your eternal honour indignantly revolted: and in order last, but in consequences far more important and interesting, a copious examination of some very novel positions in the late speeches of Mr. Charles Fox, as they are given to the public in the Morning Post. The first person, if we consider him intrinsically as to his natural talents, or to his acquired knowledge, is of a character so neutralized, or, to speak with more logical precision, so completely insignificant, as to be intitled to no more notice than any individual selected from the promiscuous multitude. But because newspapers are either useful or mischievous in proportion as they are, or are not, conducted upon the basis of genuine patriotism, and he is the proprietor of two (mere transcripts indeed from each other; but no matter, it does well enough for his purpose) admirably singular for their flexible accommodation to the ministerial powers that be

"O'er bog, o'er steep, through strait, rough, dense, or rare."

I will bring him forward on the scene just for a moment, and then, dismissing all memory of his name for ever, wish him a safe and speedy voyage to the gulph of that oblivion which is the proper termination of his political services. The second person is distinguished for his elevation, from an inferior department of the post-office on the western road, to a high station, and to great opulence: but I am not therefore convinced that he should have the privilege of limiting or extending ad libitum the periodical publications of the British press. This, forsooth, would be a marvellous conclusion! Of his public services, which he urged to you, I know nothing; and the world, I believe, knows just as much. The last personage is of more majestic port; a veteran in parliamentary evolutions and convolutions; a constant opposer of every measure, right or wrong, which during the last thirty years has emanated from government; the most ardent and indefatigable pupil in the school of Locke; a loud preacher of original compacts, and of resistance, not as a question of morality, but of prudence; a proclaimer of liberty to the whole earth in his speeches to the Senate, to the charmed populace in Palace-yard, and in the midst of copious libations at the merry meetings of the Whig Club.—But, O the wonder-working man! he has suddenly changed his tone; and, having for more than ten long years denounced vengeance and extermination to all tyrants and arbitrary Potentates, Kings, Czars, Emperors, Grand Signiors, Great Moguls, Beys, and Tartarian Khans, he now trumpets forth in the astonished ears of his country the virtues of her deadliest enemy; the praises of the fiercest despot that ever shook a rod of iron over the human race; and, good man! he strenuously advises Britons—or rather those who, alas for the deed and for the cause! were once Britons—not to think of checking his ravage by war: O by no means! that would be very unkind and very ungrateful, that would create a schism in the "western family:" but to submit like dutiful and affectionate children to their protecting parent. Nay, he deprecates, might and main, the least symptom of rudeness and incivility from our insulted press to the gentle, to the moderate, to the dove-like Buonaparté, who has no other object in view but the rivalry of trade and commerce between France and England. Well said! indeed; indeed, I give worthy Mr. Fox great credit for this most curious, most ingenious, and most miraculous discovery. Who now talks of war? Away with that odious and terrific vocabulary. After so consoling a piece of intelligence, the fears of the meek Addington will subside; each perturbed spirit will be at rest, and we shall all sleep in secure repose upon our pillows. I am, Sir, your, &c. &c.

CARACTACUS.

Nov. 29, 1802.

TO THE HON. CHARLES JAMES FOX.

SIR,—It is, I assure you, with great reluctance that I take up the pen for the purpose of addressing, in this public manner, another letter to you: not because I feel any of those lingerings of respect, which still appear to restrain the indignation of some of my contemporaries, nor because I entertain the least dread of your vengeance; for, of the manifold sins, of which I have to repent, that of having, either in thought, word, or deed, ever been the adherent of Charles Fox, is certainly not amongst the number; and, there is not, that I know of, in the whole creation, a human being of whom I should be more ashamed to be afraid. My repugnance arises from an apprehension, that the subject is beneath the attention of my readers: it is, therefore, necessary for me explicitly to state, that, if I have thus a second time broken through the silence of disdain, the effort is to be entirely ascribed to the consequence which you derive from the countenance and friendship of the Consul of France.

That you should, on all proper occasions, evince your gratitude towards the person, who has honoured you with that countenance and that friendship, and whose powerful influence may have in store for you honours still greater, is perfectly natural; and, in particular cases, especially where the precious life of your friend may be exposed to danger, I can readily excuse that exaggeration, to which the vehemence of passion is apt to give rise. But, Sir, give me leave to say, that your anxiety for the safety of Buonaparté led you, during a recent debate, totally to misrepresent a passage, to which you alluded, in the Political Register, which passage was written by me. You observed, that the London newspapers had published what redounded to their shame, particularly one of them, which had said, that "Great-Britain ought to fight him" [meaning Buonaparté] "with fleets and armies, and that Frenchmen ought to fight him with something more than a pen;" and this language you represented as tending directly to instigate the ASSASSINATION of the person at the head of the government of France. It is true, indeed, that you were instantly contradicted by acclamation; but you renewed the charge, and persisted in hinting, that the passage was matter for the animadversion of the Attorney General.

Passing over, for a moment, your misquoting of the passage in question, I shall allow, for argument's sake, that it contained the very words you gave it, and I defy you to prove that those words tend directly, or, indeed, at all, to instigate assassination. "Frenchmen ought to fight him with something more than a pen." Is it not fair to presume, that the Frenchmen here spoken of were the Royalists, including the Royal Family, of France; those whom Mr. Burke called the French nation out of France? And would any one but the friend of O'Connor style this numerous and respectable body of men assassins? Besides, what is it said, that they ought to do? To assassinate Buonaparté? No, no; but to "fight him with something more than a pen." That is, perhaps, with swords, muskets, and cannons, instruments with which men are not said to assassinate. In short, it must be obvious to every man endued with the common powers of comprehension, that the words, as recited by you, have no such meaning as that which you endeavoured to affix to them.

But, besides this glaring and shameful misconstruction, you thought proper to make a misquotation also. The passage, to which you evidently alluded, was very different indeed, from the words on which you chose to comment. The subject was the threatened prosecution of M. Peltier: the words as follows: "If M. Peltier refrains from future attacks on Buonaparté, nothing, we hope, will be done; and, if our advice be of any weight with him, it is that he should so refrain. After ten years of labour, in the cause of monarchy, against the infernal Republicans, it would be very hard to be thrown into

"Newgate for the rest of his life. Besides we doubt of the policy of attacking Buonaparté for his present acts in France. We think it somewhat inconsistent that M. Peltier should at all unite with the Republican Journalists of London, the principal ground of whose hatred to Buonaparté, is, that he has blasted, for ever and ever, the hopes of themselves and their rebellious supporters. As ENGLISHMEN, we would resist, we would attack Buonaparté, with fleets and with armies; and, were we FRENCHMEN, we would not attack him with a pen." (Register, p. 284)—Is this "directly instigating to assassination?" Will it bear any such construction? Does it not, when taken altogether, rather tend to dissuade from assassination? I must confess, that, when I wrote it, assassination never came into my mind: I did not think of it: I was blaming M. Peltier for joining with your old friends in abusing Buonaparté for having destroyed the hopes of the Republicans; and in the concluding sentence, I had evidently nothing more in view than to say, that, neither the British Nation nor the Royalists of France had any thing to hope from a war of words. I appeal to every man of sense and sincerity, whether this be not the obvious meaning of a passage, which you have construed into a direct instigation to assassinate the person at the head of the government of France. As you are fond of a dilemma take this: either you had not read the Register, p. 284, or you had. In the one case you were guilty of making a violent and calumnious assertion, without having troubled yourself about the fact; in the other, of having wilfully mistated my words, for what purpose is evident enough.

As to my sentiments respecting the "horrid deed," the very idea of which has caused such emotion in your tender bosom, be assured, Sir, that, as I would not give the price of the sheet of paper, on which I am now writing, to preserve the life of your friend, so would I by no means advise the destroying of that life. Another friend of yours, who conducts the Paris ARGUS, has also accused me of instigating the assassination of Buonaparté, a charge which is absolutely false. Whenever I have spoken on the subject (as I recollect I did at the time of the "infernal machine,") I have unequivocally declared, that, whether in time of peace or war, such a deed, on the part of an Englishman, whether by his own hand or the hand of another, would be infamous. With respect to the same deed, on the part of a

French Royalist, who had never owned allegiance to the present government of France, and who should act in behalf of himself, his fellow subjects, and his native lawful sovereign, I have never given an opinion. It will be time enough for me to turn casuist, when I see some execrable black-hearted traitor attempting to cashier my own sovereign, and to plunge my country into slavery, misery, and blood. No, no, Sir, it is not men of my stamp that would assassinate your friend, or that would even wish to hear of his being so disposed of. Our sentiments on this subject were thus expressed a very few weeks ago: "Buonaparté has returned to Paris, safe and sound, in spite of the prayers and predictions of the timid herd, who were in hopes of losing their fears in his loss of life. There are none but the basest of cowards, who look to the death of this man as a deliverance from danger. Yet, disgraceful as is the fact, the hopes of no small portion of the advocates of peace have no better, no more honourable foundation. Those who, like ourselves, were opposed to a disgraceful peace with Buonaparté, do not, nor ever did, entertain any such foolish hope; we know that if he were dead to-morrow, another, perhaps even more dangerous, would arise to fill his place: we are for the employment of no base means of offence or of defence, but are for a fair and honourable contest between the two nations, in which, with God's good help, we should hope to come off victorious, and to rescue our country from impending ruin and slavery." (Register, p. 666). These are our sentiments, Sir. It is your bawlers for peace and plenty on any terms; your philanthropic haters of all war; your men who would "rather be kicked a little than fight much;" these are the men (if, indeed, they are worthy of the name), who would gladly contribute half-a-crown a piece to purchase the death of the Consul; not because he is the enemy of their sovereign and of the glory and independence of their country, but because his restless and ambitious mind may conceive such projects as will deprive them of their wealth, or compel them to defend it. The very same motives of selfishness and cowardice, which led them to embrace Buonaparté, would also lead them, if they could do it with the certitude of impunity, to slip a dagger in his side. That cowards are always cruel is a maxim, which has been most amply verified by the statements, the predictions, and the wishes of those English prints which have been loudest in the defence of the peace. How often have they encouraged their readers to believe, that the Consul's life was in jeopardy! How many stories have they hatched about plots and conspiracies! With what delight have they counted over and over again the thousands of French troops, slain in St. Domingo! What monstrously exaggerated pictures have they drawn of the ravages of the yellow fever! Horrible enough, God knows, it is; but they have made it ten times more horrible, while they have most hypocritically affected to pity "the poor sufferers!" Is any thing of this sort, any thing savouring of cowardly malice and cruelty, to be found in the Political Register? Is there any sentiment, which would authorize a belief, that the writer would be content to owe the safety of himself or his country to the hand of an assassin or the ravages of disease? If there be such a sentiment, from the first page I ever wrote in my life to that which is now under my hand, I will suffer that hand to be burnt from my body. No, Sir; one of my objections to the peace of Amiens, one of my reasons for beholding that measure with detestation, is, that it has reduced this once brave and honourable people, a people famed for the frankness of their professions and the fairness of their combats, to affect friendship for those whom they hate, and to hope for security from the lowest and foulest of means.

While, however, I thus show the groundlessness of your charge against me, and those who think like me with respect to Buonaparté, I cannot help congratulating that favourite of fortune in having found in you so affectionate, so zealous, and so vigilant a friend. During your visit to "the capital of the world," I have frequently heard it asserted, that you were become the most listless and most torpid of mortals; nay, some persons went so far as to doubt, whether you were not asleep at the time you crossed the channel, and whether you would, at your return, recollect that you had been in France! Nor was this opinion altogether contradicted by your conduct. You had just informed the patriots of Westminster, that, if they re-elected you, you did not know that your attendance in parliament would be more constant than it had been. You saw no probability of doing any good there. Thanks to the air of France, thanks to the animating friendship of the First Consul, which have roused you into life, activity, vigour, and watchfulness!

It is impossible to observe your anxiety for the personal safety of Buonaparté, and to hear your animadversions on whatever you choose to regard as tending to excite hatred and violence against him; it is absolutely impossible to see and hear this, without adverting to your conduct with respect to the murder of the lawful King of France, and also with respect to those repeated attempts which have been made to destroy the throne and the life of your own Sovereign. Did you ever express your detestation of the men who murdered Louis the XVIth.? Is there one of the French regicides, who has to complain of your censure? I do not say, that you ever have, in so many words, commended them for murdering the prince to whom they owed, and to whom they had formally sworn, allegiance; but this I do say, that almost all the rebels and regicides of France have, at different times, been, even individually, the objects of your praise and admiration. And where, I pray you, Sir, shall I look for a proof of your dislike to the rebels, the traitors, the regicides, and the would-be regicides of England and Ireland? Shall I find it in your loathsome calumnies on the House of Stuart, in your miserable attempt to defend the characters of Russel and Sidney, in your testimony at Maidstone, or in your silence at the time of the mutiny in the fleet? Where, where, Sir, shall I find, in all the cumbrous volumes of harangues, which you have uttered, during the last ten years of treasons and conspiracies against the throne and the life of your sovereign, where, pray tell me where, I shall find one single sentence or phrase, expressive of your abhorrence of those diabolical machinations? Will you refer me to your speech at the Shakespeare Tavern, on the 10th of October, 1801?—"The peace is glorious to France" and to the FIRST CONSUL, and I rejoice at it. We have not gained the object of the war, and I like the peace so much the better."—"France has set AN EXAM-PLE, which will be highly useful to all the nations of the earth, and, above all, to GREAT BRITAIN."—"I fear, that, from the nature of the contest, in which you have been engaged, you may have contracted principles of admiration for unlimited monarchy, but the peace, fostered up by a good understanding between the two countries, will do them away. I hope we shall return to the temper which we were in when we CASHIERED one king, and elected another."—And is it you, Sir, you, who could utter these words to a senseless, a heated, and a soured rabble; is it you, who are now so alive to every expression and word, that may, even by possibility, tend to excite hatred and violence against the most implacable and most formidable enemy of your country? The difference in your sentiments and feelings on these different occasions is so strongly marked, and the conclusion to be drawn therefrom is so evident, that any attempt at a further exposition of your motives would be totally superfluous.

It was my intention to have concluded this letter with some remarks on the furious assault, which you have recently made on the London news-papers, in which, though you did, indeed, only repeat, almost word for word, the charges before preferred by Buonaparté's official Journal, you have, at once, not only given up, but flatly contradicted, all your former opinions and declarations respecting that "precious gem of the British Constitution," that "palladium of free-men," that "birth-right of Britons," called the liberty of the press, which an honest Chinese, after hearing a translation of one of your famous harangues on the subject, once took to be the meat, drink and clothing of the inhabitants of this kingdom! It was my intention to have made a comparison between your former and your present notions; to have traced you down to the last Shakespeare dinner, and to have shewn how sudden and surprising your conversion has been; but, want of room compels me to defer this subject until another opportunity; which I do with the less regret, as I leave you in the more able hands of a writer in the Morning Post, whence, I trust, you will not escape, until you have been exhibited in your true and proper colours to every man, woman, and child in the kingdom.—I am, &c. &c.
London, Nov. 30, 1802. WM. COBBETT.

P. S. The public are curious to know, why the anniversary of your election has not been celebrated this year; and also, why the rump of the Whig Club has discontinued its meetings.—As to the Stuart manuscripts, too, which it was pretended you went to Paris to consult; it is still averred, that the far greater part of those manuscripts were destroyed long ago, and that what remains of them is at Edinburgh instead of Paris.—You are very much mistaken, Sir, if you think, that silence, on your part, will operate in your favour.

PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT.

Friday, November 26.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—The Speaker stated, that his Majesty had been waited on with the Address, and had been pleased to return a most gracious answer. Petitions complaining of undue elections, were presented from Nottingham, Bridgewater, Inverness, Liskeard, Waterford, Drogheda, and Hereford county. The order of the day being read, for taking into consideration that part of his Majesty's speech relative to the supply, the House resolved itself into a committee of supply, Mr. Alexander in the chair. The Chancellor of the Exchequer then moved, that a supply be granted to his Majesty, which was agreed to, and the report ordered to be received on Monday. — Admiral Berkeley wished to know whether any arrangement had taken place with Spain since the peace, relative to the cutting of logwood and dye-woods, in the Bays of Campeachy and Honduras? Mr. Addington replied, that no arrangement had taken place with Spain on the subject. — Mr. Burdon brought up the bill for suspending the operation of the 15th and 17th Geo. III. prohibiting the circulation of Promissory Notes under a certain value. Bill read, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday.

Monday, November 29.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. — Petitions complaining of undue elections, were presented from Ilchester, East-Grinstead, Glasgow, Oakhampton, Harwich, and Berwick-upon-Tweed. — Petitions were presented from the Malsters and Brewers of Bristol, Coventry, Plymouth, and Leominster, praying the repeal of the Act regulating the Process of Malting. — The report of the committee of supply was brought up, read, and agreed to. — Estimates of the ordinary expense of the navy; of the charges necessary for building, &c. ships of war; of the guards, garrisons, and other land forces; and also of the ordnance-office, for the year 1803, were ordered to be laid before the House. — Mr. Vansittart brought up an account of the amount of Exchequer bills outstanding, and unprovided for. — A clerk from the Customs presented an account of the bounties paid on corn and rice. — An account was also presented of the receipts, disbursements, and progress of the London Dock-Company. — The Country Bank Note Bill was read a second time. — A petition was presented from the Chymists and Druggists, praying the repeal of the Medicine Act of last session. — A committee for considering such laws as are about to expire was appointed. — The time for receiving private petitions was limited to the 14th of February.

Tuesday, November 30.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. — Admiral Berkeley presented a petition from the prisoners in the gaol of Gloucester. Petitions complaining of undue elections were presented from Liskeard, Taunton, Boston, Malmesbury, and Stirlingshire. — Mr. Alexander brought up the report on the Expiring Laws. — Mr. Vansittart moved for an account of the amount of Exchequer Bills issued under an Act of the 42d Geo. III. outstanding and unprovided for. — Mr. Praed brought up the report of the committee on the Petition of the Subscribers to the Grand Junction Canal. — Mr. Addington informed the House that the number of seamen at present employed in the public service was 50,000.

PUBLIC PAPERS.

Proclamation to the Helvetic People, from the Government of Helvetia.

CITIZENS OF HELVETIA. — In announcing to you, four month ago, that the French troops were about to quit our soil, the Council of Execution at the same time declared to you, that a constant obedience to the laws, a spirit of confidence and peace, the union of all wishes for the maintenance of the established order of things, could alone protect your independence; while the contrary dispositions, disobedience, tumult, and dissensions, would infallibly bring back a foreign army. — You have not attended to our words, Citizens of Helvetia! Ambitious men have induced you to embrace the cause of their interests and their passions; and while one party amongst you roused itself at their calling to overturn the constitutional and national government, the other party became, by its silence, an accomplice in the civil war. — What is the result? A few weeks have scarcely passed, when the French troops, ten times more numerous than they were last spring before their departure, penetrate into your Cantons; they take from you the arms which you have turned against your government, and thus declare to all Europe that you are at once incapable of remaining at peace, and unworthy to protect yourselves. — Tell us then, Citizens of Helvetia, to whom you owe the return of these troops? Is it to the Senate and to the Council of Execution, whose fault was, on the contrary, to consent too soon to their departure, and whose whole study latterly tended to prevent, by a frank and loyal acceptance of the mediation of the Chief Consul, the evils which we had to fear from his indignation? Or is it to the Insurrectional Authorities, to the assembly which dignified itself with the name of the Confederate Diet of Schwitz? To that Assembly which, rejecting the conditions of the proposed mediation, promising to dissolve itself, and notwithstanding continuing its intrigues, announcing peace, and keeping the soldiers under arms, wishing that a foreign force might enter the country, that they might have it in their power to say, "we yielded only to force?" Miserable vanity, which gratifies itself at the expense of a whole nation! Wretched ebullition of pride, calculated to precipitate the country into complete ruin, and which it would have done, if the generosity of the Chief Consul had not equalled his power, notwithstanding all the efforts of his enemies, and of yours, he had not still persisted to wish your welfare. — However, Citizens of Helvetia! the Council of Execution is informed of it; the members of that seditious assembly, and the committees which it had established in the Cantons, not content with having consecrated, in formal protestations, their foolish pretensions, still seek to mislead the people respecting their real situation, to spread false hopes of foreign succour, to frighten them by menaces, and to belie the intentions in which the Helvetic Government addressed itself to the Chief Consul, to invite him to make himself the supreme arbiter of our differences.—But we will answer these men, that they likewise have invoked that mediation. The letters of the chiefs of the Little Cantons to the Chief Consul, and to the ministers of France; the plans of constitution on which they openly called for their good offices; the sending deputies to Paris, are so many proofs of the desire which they had of interesting the French government in their cause. It was only when the First Consul had previously demanded and exacted the cessation of a war which armed citizens against citizens, and brothers against brothers, that they rejected the mediation solicited by themselves, and which they then artfully turned for the purpose of increasing the number of their partizans.—We will tell them again, that if we have called for the mediation of the First Consul, it is because, of all the powers called by their position, to take an interest in the destinies of Helvetia, France is the only one which has recognized our independence, consecrated, by its means, in a solemn treaty: the only one which can exercise over us an influence of protection and support. The history of Switzerland for five centuries, our revolution, and the years which have succeeded it, sufficiently prove how much it is our interest to follow the political system of France. It is this truth which, engraved on the hearts of our ancestors, protected the cradle of the Confederation, and we, Citizens of the Helvetic Republic, have a thousand times more reason still to be convinced of it.—Lastly, we will say no longer to these men, for they will not understand us, but to the Nation itself, that the Equality of Rights amongst the Cantons, the abolition of Hereditary Privileges, the Liberty of the Citizens, being a deposit placed in our hands to be preserved at any price, it was not permitted to us to waver respecting calling for the mediation of the only government which can preserve to us these principles.—Thus, our conduct in this respect has been only the necessary consequence of the national will, expressed in favour of these same principles at the time of the acceptance of the constitution.—Such is the answer which the Council of Execution owes to that part of the accusations of its enemies.—With regard to the other accusations by which it is attempted to raise against them a factious hate, they despise them, well knowing that they cannot cite a single family of which it has caused the ruin, or a single person in whom the rights of a citizen have been violated. It is, on the contrary, for having been too indulgent, too confident in the justice of its fellow-citizens, too little severe, in short, that it has experienced misfortunes. The insurrectional Authorities ordered in four weeks ten times more arrests, odious inquests, and measures of rigour of every kind, than it had ordered during the whole course of its existence.—Citizens of Helvetia! you will be required to furnish extraordinary contributions for the support of the troops which your insurrection have caused to enter your country. Submit yourselves to a necessity which you cannot tax with injustice; open your hearts to dispositions of fraternity and social order; it is the only means of abridging the period of your misfortunes. Shew yourselves, in short, worthy to be called a Nation, and you will become one.—Bonaparte only desires to have still the power of interesting himself in your destinies.—For us, Citizens, thanks to the care of this generous Mediator, our task will soon be finished. Returned into the class of private individuals with those who have so cruelly calumniated our conduct, we shall be always ready to answer their imputations. Henceforth there is no sacrifice to which we are not resigned, if it can only be profitable to our country. Done at Berne, Nov. 3, 1802.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Vienna, Nov. 3.—The Emperor returned from Presburgh the day before yesterday.—The Spanish ambassador, Prince Castel Franco, had yesterday his first audience.—The French ambassador yesterday gave a splendid ball, at which the archdukes, the Grand Duke Constantine, and above 800 persons, were present.—Nov. 12. His royal highness the Grand Duke of Tuscany wrote to the First Consul, to announce to him the death of the archduchess his wife, and at the same time to remind him of his royal highness's present situation. The First Consul, in his answer, expressed much concern for the loss the prince had sustained.—Our court is at present occupied in procuring for the Archduchess Amelia, who will soon leave her residence at Parma, an income suitable to her rank.—The French minister has notified to our Government the annexation of Parma, Placentia and Guaitalla to France.

Barcelona, Nov. 6.—A Portuguese squadron of four sail of the line arrived lately at Carthage, to purchase provisions; they afterwards sailed against the Barbary powers.—We have but slight hope that our disputes with the Algerines will be settled without considerable sacrifices on our part.—The English minister, Mr. Frere, is daily expected at Madrid.

Manheim, Nov. 17.—A dispute has arisen between the courts of Munich and Carlsruhe, respecting the museum, gallery, library, &c. belonging to this city. The Elector of Bavaria has sent Count Rumford and M. de Hacfelin here, for the purpose of removing to Munich all the objects of arts and sciences which could be considered as public property. A representation having been made to our new sovereign, the Margrave of Baden, he gave orders to fix seals upon the doors of the museum, &c. Count Rumford has sent to Munich for further orders.

Switzerland, Lucerne, Nov. 8.—M. M. Aloys Reding and Aufder-Maur arrived here, escorted by fifty French hussars, and one hundred infantry. While they were here, no one was allowed to converse with them. They are gone to the fortress of Arbourg. They likewise speak of the arrest of M. M. Zellweger, of Troguen; Peister, of Schaffhausen; Merian, of Basle; and Reding, of Baden, ex-senators. These are to be conducted to the castle of Chillon, in Geneva.—Basle, Nov. 13. The French commandant of this city has received orders to arrest M. Merian, deputy of the canton to the last diet of Schwitz; but the order has not been executed, in consequence of his flight. A detachment of thirty men has been lodged in his house, and will remain there till he re-appears.—Berne, Nov. 20. On the 16th instant, dispatches arrived at Berne from Paris, and on the same day General Ney had a long conference with the executive council. On the next day, the general left Berne. It is not known whither he is gone. The municipality of Berne have appointed M. de Mulinen to represent them at the consulta of Paris, and he has accepted the appointment. This is the same person whom the provisional government sent to Paris six weeks ago. He went to General Ney, and solicited the release of Reding and others; but all that he could obtain was a permission for M. Thorman, formerly secretary of state, to see Aloys Reding, at Arbourg. Hartmann, of Thursteren, the former sub-prefect of the districts of Wangen and Lanzenthal, has been taken up. He is accused of having attempted to foment a new insurrection in the country parts. It is said also, that some Bernese, who went lately into the Pays de Vaud, have been arrested. The Ex-Landamman of Underwald, Warsch, has been removed to the prison of Lucerne, and thrown into a dungeon. But as soon as M. Basingen, curate of Stantz, and who had been dispossessed of his cure during the time of the insurrection, by the influence of the Landamman, was informed of the circumstance, he went to Lucerne, and interceded so strongly in his favour, that the Landamman obtained permission for him to be confined in an inn of the town. The Ex-Landamman of Appenzel has been sent to the citadel of Arbourg. The canton of Zurich has appointed the Ex-Director Laharpe as its deputy at Paris. He is thus the representative of three cantons, Zurich, Zug, and Berne. On the 6th, several persons had assembled in order to appoint a deputy to the consulta, and to draw up a memorial to Buonaparté, of whom they proposed to solicit a popular government. This measure appeared to be illegal in the eyes of the constituted authorities, and the peasants were sent back to their respective houses. More troops have been sent into the eastern cantons. Arrests multiply, and the number of patriots who have been arrested is very great indeed. Disconsolation in Switzerland is general and deep.

Stutgard, Nov. 18. (very important article).—One of the most important considerations which at present appears to occupy the attention of the several continental powers, is, the restraining the political influence of the English in Europe, and other parts of the world, within the limits of the British dominions.—Since there exists no other formidable power to whom commerce is necessary, and since the productions of their native soils are inadequate to the supply of civilized nations, among whom industry and art require new materials, and luxury fresh sources of enjoyment, England has become, in some degree, a central power in the new world, of which the antients seemed to entertain a very weak idea: she finds in our tastes, our necessities, our commercial relations, our habitudes, and our speculations, a powerful lever, of which she well knows how to avail herself, in moving the different political bodies, which have been formed since the revolution effected in the minds of men about two centuries since: those consist of nations to whom nature has afforded opportunities of self-aggrandizement, to make advances, and, in fact, to establish themselves with advantage in the new empires, of which civilized men have achieved the conquest. In order to exercise her power in Europe, England has never moved from the center of this part of the political world.—It is, however, in both the Indies, in all the seas, and in various colonies, that she has established the principle of this power, which never will cease, in a manner, to be continental, as long as the continent itself continues the colonial system, or as long as England continues so important a part of the colonial dependencies, which are, in some degree, an integral part of Europe.—Do we not see that this uniformly ambitious nation has secured her power, in consequence of her always extending it, and becoming, in a certain point of view, more and more European, by her aggrandizement, and consolidating her power in Asia, America, and on the coast of Africa?—The possession alone of the city and fortress of Alexandria, is more interesting to it than the possession of a rich province. The retention for some weeks, and the enjoyment of the post of Malta, is but a part of a system, which leads her to regard, as an important acquisition, every naval station, which can, in any degree, enhance her maritime strength.—England is too powerful in India, for any part of Europe to escape her influence. France alone is capable of counteracting this preponderance—the question regards that of a power, founded principally on the possession of riches; and though France be happily situated by nature, for contesting, one day, that power which she has so often contested with advantage, it cannot be denied that the misfortunes of the latter times have not retarded the epocha which ought to re-animate the industry and exertions of a powerful nation. The consciousness of its greatness, the necessity of its forming new establishments, and the incitements of a species of glory which alone appears to be a stranger to the French nation, that when delivered up to intestine commotions and continental wars, she has been able to employ her naval strength only to fight and to attack, and not to aggrandize and enrich herself in another hemisphere.—The French power in both the Indies, has, at all times, been less burthensome than that of England. This antient reputation must necessarily be favourable to French commerce, when once established in those countries. We already learn from Asia, that the aggrandizement of the English, and the manner in which they gained possession of the wealth and dominions of the Nabob of Arcot, have excited general resentment in that quarter. The colonial power of the English is arrived at its acmé, and in future it will certainly decline. This consideration promises a gleam of hope to the maritime powers of the Continent, by the prospect of being enabled to aggrandize their fortune, and by a wise and happy administration of their resources, to open to themselves new sources of wealth and prosperity.

France.—Paris, Nov. 20.—On the 16th, the English ambassador, Lord Whitworth, demanded an audience of the minister for foreign affairs, by whom he was received with the greatest consideration.—Nov. 26. An arrêté, passed by the Consuls on the 19th inst. relative to the island of Guadaloupe and its dependencies, contains the following articles:—Art. I. All local lists of emigrants formed in the colonies are suppressed, and to be regarded as of no effect. They cannot be urged in bar of the claims of proprietors to be put in possession of their effects.—II. The emigrants only from the European territory of the republic, are to be considered as such in the colonies when they are unable to produce vouchers of their names having been erased, or their having been included in an act of amnesty, conformably to the laws, arrêtés, and senatus-consulta, passed upon this subject. III. In consequence of these dispositions, none of the proprietors of colonial estates, who have resided on the European territory of the republic since the month of May, 1792, can be put in possession of those estates by the prefects, or other administrators in chief of the colonies, until they have produced the requisite proofs, according to the forms hitherto in use, relative to their residence, their non-emigration, or erasure, or that they have been admitted to enjoy the benefit of the amnesty, pronounced by the senatus-consultum of the 26th of April last.—Nov. 27. A Neapolitan frigate has arrived at Toulon, with several valuable antiques, which his Sicilian majesty had sent as a present to the First Consul.—The Count Stahrenberg, minister extraordinary from his Imperial to his Britannic Majesty, passed, on the 22d of this month, through Nancy to Paris, where he will remain a short time before he sets out for London.—By a decree of the Chief Consul, the table allowance for officers in the navy serving in America, Asia, or Africa, is to be doubled upon their arrival in any of the colonies.

SUMMARY OF POLITICS.

The final settlement of the affairs of Germany (that is to say, till France chooses to make another change in them) seems to be near at hand; and, it is probable, that the world will shortly be put in possession of an authentic account of the new distribution of the power, rank, and territory of the Empire, through the columns of the Moniteur.—It was, by some of the newspapers of last week, stated, that the Duke of Tuscany was to receive part, at least, of the dominions of Parma, the whole of which, as we observed before, belonged eventually and of right to the House of Austria; but, we find (see p. 724), that the French Ambassador at Vienna has announced to his Imperial Majesty, that the Duchy of Parma and its dependencies are united to the Republic of France; and we are not informed, that the Emperor has said a single word in reply.

In the mean time, the Elector of Bavaria seems to be new-modeling his government and dominions upon the French plan; and, we should not be at all surprized, if the Prince of Baden, whom the honest Talleyrand has surnamed "the good," were to follow the example of his neighbour. In fact, the whole of the Empire of Germany is, either directly or indirectly, under the influence, and, indeed, under the command of France. Had we kept the colonies and the sea, the powers of the Continent would have retained some degree of hope; but, seeing us basely yield the only remaining counterpoise to the monstrous power of the common enemy of all independent nations, they hastened to save themselves from the effects of her vengeance, by an early and implicit submission to her will.

Our foreign intelligence furnishes nothing, respecting Switzerland, but the mere continuation of that series of events, which began with the proclamation of Buonaparté (see p. 423), and which is no more than a dull repetition of what we have seen acted over and over again, in all the countries which France has subjugated. Troops have been marched into the country, in order to maintain its liberty; and, extraordinary contributions have been raised (see p. 722) in order to maintain the troops. The people of the country have been disarmed; those of known hostility to France have been arrested and imprisoned, and will, doubtless, never more be suffered to deprive their country of those "blessings of peace," which Buonaparté has in store for it. While those patriots are (totally unpitied by the universal patriot Fox) passing their time in the same dungeon, perhaps, which holds the unfortunate Citizen Toussaint, their more pliant countrymen, who, like our "prudent ministers," have the happiness to please the Chief Consul, are, in obedience to his proclamation, assembling, at Paris, for the purpose of forming a new constitution for their country. The persons thus collected together are to be called a Consulta; and, though they will not, probably, come to a determination in terms exactly similar to those of the Consulta of Lyons, we venture to predict, that, in substance and effect, there will be but very little difference in the two. Devoted as the Swiss Deputies, composing this Consulta, may well be supposed to be to the will of Buonaparté, it has not been thought advisable to trust the business entirely to them; and, accordingly, we find, that the Ex-Director Laharpe has been chosen to represent no less than three of the Cantons; a precaution, however, which would seem entirely unnecessary, since it appears, that Citizen Hantrive (a clerk in the honest Talleyrand's office), has had the goodness to undertake the drafting of the constitutional act!—Nay, reader, mock not the poor Swiss! Gibes, on such a subject, but ill become Englishmen of the present day; very ill indeed they become those, who, for the sake of "peace and a large loaf," have basely surrendered the honours handed down to them from their forefathers, and who are now patiently waiting to receive the yoke, which already encircles the necks of the descendants of William Tell. Mock not the mountaineers of Switzerland: they had not the means of resistance; we have money, navies, and armies. Mock them not, nor their Consulta; for, be you well assured, that, unless a great and speedy change takes place in the policy and the conduct of this government, there will be a British Consulta at Paris, before this day two years. "Oh! it is impossible," say the listless, selfish, cowardly, canting tribes; "it is impossible that the French should come here!"—So said the people of Berne, and so they continued to say, not only till the French troops entered Switzerland, but to the very morning of the day that they entered their own city!—We cannot dismiss this subject, without adverting to a passage in the Ministers' official paper of the 29th instant. It contains their answer to the remarks in page 701 of our last sheet.—"A very strong public feeling, on the subject of Switzerland, has evidently been mistaken by some for a wish to renew the war; which has, however, been completely disproved by the recent proceedings in Parliament. Possibly our own sentiments, on this subject, may have been too strongly expressed. "If we have been in an error, we shall find abundant allowance for it, in the breast of every generous cotemporary!"—As coming from the worm, who is the owner and the ostensible conductor of this paper, passages like this are, of course, unworthy of notice; but, as coming from the ministers themselves, or from their immediate confidential agents, they are not only worthy of notice, but are to be regarded as documents little short of official declarations. The above miserable apology, then, is all that this injured, this insulted, and disgraced country, is to receive by way of answer to the remonstrance which was presented in behalf of the Swiss, and which Buonaparté treated with that contempt, with which every thing emanating from the present ministry will be treated. This apology is, too, to compensate for the rebuff which we have met with at Vienna. The Emperor thought, doubtless, that, as we were "too honest" to have continental connections, it was pity to endanger the morality of so innocent and modest a people; or, which is, indeed, much more likely, he thought it the height of inconsistency in us to interfere for the independence of a people, whose dependence we had tacitly sanctioned by the treaty of Amiens. He thought too, most probably, that it would be absurd to expect good faith from a nation and ministry, who, with all their overstock of honesty, had retained Ceylon and Trinidad at the expense of the Queen of Portugal and the King of Sardinia; and who, by way of a reward to the Stadholder, for services rendered to England, sent him to seek an indemnity in the plunder of the Empire of Germany. His Imperial Majesty further thought, perhaps, that no great reliance was to be placed on the courage of those, who had surrendered the honour of the British flag; and who, at the command of the Consul, had unbarred the prison doors to the traitor Napper Tandy. These, these are the circumstances, which will, which must, occur to every court, with which we shall attempt to form a connection, even of the most trifling kind. The treaty of Amiens, particularly as it has been illustrated by the subsequent conduct of our government and that of France, is, to this nation, a mark of infamy, which, if not indelible, will not be easily worn away. It will require time, and pains and patience; it will demand liberality, fortitude, and courage; we must tread back, not a part, but the whole of our steps, since the month of March 1801; we must, in short, so think, speak, and act, as to efface from our own minds and from the memory of the world, that we have ever been governed by the counsels of the Addingtons and the Hawkesburies.

In our last (see p. 699) we quoted a passage from the Moniteur of the 17th ultimo, relative to our domination in India, the object of which, as we then observed, was, to excite against this country, the jealousy, the envy and the hatred of the nations of the Continent. Another article of the same tendency (see p. 725) has since been published at Paris, in the Gazette de France, after, as it would appear, having been first published, in the German language, at Stuttgart, in the Duchy of Wirtemberg. We beg leave to request our readers to peruse this article with great attention: it aims at several points, and all its shafts are barbed with poison. The truth is (and it is a truth of the utmost moment), that France, having completely severed us from the continent of Europe, having taken effectual means for our ruin in the West-Indies, and for shutting us out of the Mediterranean, has only one more object to accomplish, preparatory to our final destruction; and that is, to shake our power, and disturb our trade in the East Indies; and, in order to avoid all impediment in this enterprize, she is beginning, beforehand, to persuade the nations of Europe, particularly the maritime nations, that the colonial greatness of England is the great cause of all the evils they have endured and do yet endure; that it is Great Britain alone who with-holds from them their just share of navigation and commerce; that it is she who has involved them in wars, and, of course, that the curtailing of her colonial domination and wealth, would tend to increase their opulence and to insure their tranquillity. That this is impudently false we know, and the nations, or, at least, the governments, of the Continent know it too; but, those courts, one only excepted, are afraid of France, they are in her power, and, in order to lengthen out their own existence, they will assist in furthering her views, not, perhaps, with ships or with men; but with their no less hostile and mischievous neutrality. Mr. Dundas, full of confidence in those "four-pounders," which, in his answer to Dr. Laurence, he contended were so much superior to the stipulations of treaties, will, doubtless, smile at these artful manœuvres of France; but, we can assure him, that, after having lately read the observations of a French commercial writer on the speech to which we have now alluded*, we are far from feeling that exultation which seemed to animate his breast, when, backed with his trusty clan, he so bravely commanded his opponent to "put his motions in his pocket."—The troubles of India are, we fear, about to begin. The whole world, without the exception of one single country, grudges us the possession of the riches which we derive from the East, and which, though in reality immense, have been magnified a million fold by the envy of other nations. While, indeed, we maintained our antient reputation for power and for courage, the effects of this envy were confined to the breast of those who entertained it; but, now that we are lowered in the just estimation of the world, now that we have, by a solemn act and deed, proclaimed to the universe, that we are become inferior to the rival against whom our fathers so long, so bravely and so successfully contended; now that we are degraded, stripped of our honours, and branded with the marks both of dishonesty and cowardice, we have no right to hope, that the world will leave us in the enjoyment of our wealth.

During the last week, mention has been made in Parliament of the impediments, which the operation of the treaty of peace has thrown in the way of our trade to the Bay of Honduras. ADMIRAL BERKELEY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether any communication or arrangement had taken place, since the conclusion of peace, between the government of this country, and the court of Spain, respecting the right of this country to cut logwood in the Bay of Honduras and Campeche. To this the Chancellor replied, that no arrangement of this sort had as yet definitively taken place; but that it long had been in contemplation to settle some commercial relations with that country, the completion of which was still retarded by circumstances. He might however observe, he said, that no special arrangement was yet fixed upon concerning our right to cut logwood in the Bay of Honduras and Campeche. What! is it come to this already? Are there to be arrangements, then, respecting this right? And are these arrangements, as yet, not fixed upon? Well do we remember, that the opposers of the definitive treaty insisted, that by the omission, in that fatal compact, to renew former treaties, we had lost, or, at least, greatly endangered, several of our rights, and, amongst the rest, that of cutting logwood in the Bay of Honduras, which right was particularly mentioned by Lord Grenville, Mr. Windham, Dr. Laurence, and several other speakers. The reply of Lord Hawkesbury was, "that the right to cut logwood in the Bay of Honduras was ceded to us in 1787; that it was a settlement which we possessed of right, and to which the Spaniards were as much

* Etat Commercial de la France, au Commencement du dix-neuvième Siècle, &c. &c. P. J. BLANC DE VOLX.—This work is just published. The part to which we allude is extremely interesting. It is now under the hands of the translator, and will appear in the Supplement to the Volume, which will be published in the middle of next month.

"bound to refer as we: it was, he said, in "truth, no omission at all." (Speech, 13th of May, 1802.) His lordship's expressions are by no means of the clearest; but, it is evident enough, that he regarded our right to cut logwood, not only as not impaired, but as not at all put in doubt, by the treaty of Amiens. The Master of the Rolls, whose opinion is, on every account, of more weight than that of Lord Hawkesbury, said, "that our right to "cut logwood, &c. was a right of possession, "preserved throughout the war, and not annulled by the peace;"* and, Sir Frederick Eden, adopting implicitly the opinion of the Master of the Rolls, insisted, that "if "the non-renewal of treaties had any effect, "as to this point, it must be disadvantageous to Spain; since, by retaining possession "of this settlement, unfettered by any stipulations, we should be freed from the engagement entered into by the 17th article "of the treaty of Paris, to demolish our "fortifications erected in the Bay of Honduras." He added, "that Great-Britain "would NOT ALLOW other nations to avail themselves of the non-renewal of former treaties to set up ancient and exploded rights of sovereignty." (See Sir F. M. Eden's Letters on the Peace, 2d edit. p. 193.) This was the high tone made use of by the defenders of the peace, in May last, which when compared to the tone now held by the ministers, may serve to show how far we are fallen in the short space of six months: like Falstaff we have a wonderful alacrity in sinking!—This "right of possession," this "unquestionable right," is now, it seems, not only questioned, but the question is not determined: it is matter of "arrangement," and "no arrangement respecting it has yet been fixed upon." At the time, when the omission to renew former treaties was discussed, we made, in speaking of the rights, which had been endangered by that omission, the following observations.—The language of the country to the ministers is this: "either you "have given up those rights, or you have "not; if you have, then do you merit all "the reproach that has been bestowed on "you; if you have not, let us now see whether you will defend us in the enjoyment of those rights." (Register, Vol. I. p. 555). This is the language; which we, in common with the rest of the nation, now address to these "safe politicians," these precious guardians of our rights, who, instead of giving an answer to our claims, will set themselves gravely to work to convince us, that the net proceeds of no one right are sufficient to balance the expense of a war, however fortunate. and however short its duration Upon this principle, we say now as we said then, the treaty of Amiens has been concluded; upon this grovelling principle right after right will be yielded, branch after branch, limb after limb, will be lopped off, till this once spreading, lofty, and flourishing empire, becomes a naked, sightless, sapless trunk, fit for nothing but to be hewn down and cast into the fire.—And shall we, the sons of Englishmen, the subjects of the best of kings, stand tamely by while our beloved country and more beloved sovereign are shorn of their honours, impoverished, ruined, and annihilated, to humour the fears and to gratify the avarice of a dastardly and selfish faction! Shame, then, everlasting shame and infamy on our heads!

For an answer to the ever returning question: "Will there be peace, or war?" We must beg leave to refer the querists to Buonaparté or the honest Talleyrand; for certain we are, that the sages of Downing-street, "the prudent Ministers who govern Great-Britain," know nothing of the matter. They have asked for, and will, of course, obtain, 50,000 sailors for the whole of the ensuing year. They are hurrying out the militia; they are "keeping an eye on the affairs of the Continent;" they are "watching the encroachments of France;" they know not what the price of the funds will be to-morrow; they, and we along with them, are fairly entered upon that state, described in the Letters on the Preliminaries of Peace: "The consequence of "this state of mistrust, uneasiness, expense, "and danger, on our part; and of threats, "intrigues, and hostile preparations, on the "part of France, will enable her, suddenly, and with the greatest advantage, to "renew a war, which will be pregnant "with the greatest danger to England, in "asmuch as the French will have had time "to collect their forces and their means of "attack, so as to bear upon the points "which they have in view; and as they will "moreover have it in their power to choose "both their time and their point of attack."*—Is not this precisely our situation? Are not our predictions, as far as time would permit, most fatally fulfilled? And who, then, shall say that our present apprehensions are groundless?—"Resistance would be right, but it is not expedient, "until we can find allies." Thus, we are keeping an eye upon the Continent, and the Continent is keeping an eye upon us: we are both raising our hands in mutual astonishment at each others blindness, perverseness, folly, and degradation, while France is employed day and night in contriving the means of our final destruction. But, the Continent is less, far less to blame than we: the Continent is already in chains; we are, as yet, at liberty; and we have the baseness to wait till our fetters are prepared. Every day, every hour, the means of resistance are diminishing: in a few months we shall see 50,000 men stationed on the shores of the channel, looking us constantly in the face. Not a soldier of the Continent will stir. We shall be kept in a state of constant alarm: no one will know what to rely on: the public funds will be constantly, as they now are, in the hand of Buonaparté, or his successor: men will grow tired, as they are already grown ashamed, of their dishonoured country: they will, by degrees, grow familiar with notions of vassalage to France; till, at last, the question being put, for further submission or war, we greatly fear, they will determine for the former; and then farewell, a long, an everlasting farewell to the independence, and even to the name of England!

By a reference to our domestic articles, it will be perceived, that, in a military and naval view, the kingdom is left still more defenceless than we, on a former occasion, stated it to be. We said, that the Admiralty could not, if an emergency required it, send ten ships of the line out of the ports of England and Ireland. It appears, that, even now, they have but nine ships of the line in commission in Europe; and we are well informed, that, there are not men enough on board the nine to man five of them for sea. The frigates are in the same state. Their names and numbers may serve to fill up the columns of a report to the House of Commons; but, were they, with their present hands, to be sent to sea, very few of them would ever return to port: our coast would be strewn with wrecks.—This is the economy, for which the noble Admiral at the head of that department has been extolled. With all his economy, however, he has not yet thought proper to strip Jamaica quite so naked. That island, which, during the last peace, was guarded by one fifty gun ship and two frigates, has now nine ships of the line, nine frigates, and nine ships of war, notwithstanding the French have, by our connivance and assistance, removed all danger, from the threatening shores of St. Domingo! How does this force at Jamaica agree with the predictions of the “prudent ministers?” And how does it agree with the ministerial tales of mortality, amongst the French troops? We remember, that the Lord Chancellor (quoting the Duke of Norfolk), said, that, “appearing to distrust the French was making “peace with a drawn sword in our hands.” (Debate, May 13). We not only appear to distrust them now; but we openly acknowledge that distrust to be the principle of action, the very system on which we proceed.—How long will this last?

It is said, that his Excellency Count Stahrenberg, being a few days ago at Paris, on his way from Vienna to London, received an order from the French government to quit the territory of the Republic in twenty-four hours. To obey this order is, as every one must know, absolutely impossible; and, therefore, if such an order has really been given, the object must be to expose the Count to arrest and imprisonment in some obscure town or village, where * * * * *. Let Capt. D'Auvergne tell the rest, which, by the bye, he ought to do, and under his own name: it is a duty he owes to himself, to his country, and to the world.—Count Stahrenberg has, during his visit to Vienna, received, from the hands of his Imperial Master, the Order of the Golden Fleece; a very great honour most assuredly, but not half so great, as that of being the object of the jealousy and hatred of Buonaparté. We hope he will escape from the dangers that threaten him, and arrive once more safe in England, where he will be greeted, not with the shouts of the brutal rabble, not by the hypocritical smiles of opulent poltroons, but with the applause of all sensible, honest, and honourable Englishmen, who must know, that if we ever again attempt to make head against France, it must be with the co-operation of the illustrious prince and the gallant and faithful nation, of whom his Excellency is, in every respect, the worthy representative.

The Letter to Mr. Wilberforce in our next.
 * In consequence of the great demand for the last number of the Register, containing MR. COBBETT'S LETTER to Lord Auckland, on the ABUSES IN THE GENERAL POST OFFICE, the Public are respectfully informed, that it has been reprinted, and is now ready for delivery.

ON THE SITUATION OF EUROPE, AND THE PARTIES OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Sir,—“The public FEELING,” we are told in one of our journals, “is with Mr. WINDHAM, and the public REASON with Lord HAWKESBURY.” Such it was “most confidently affirmed,” was the result of the debates on the speech from the throne. If this be true, never surely was there an administration that more exactly fulfilled the duty which it owes to the Sovereign and his people, and whatever may be the state of the continent, that of our own country is highly “satisfactory.” For this is the great end of all government, this is the leading object which human wisdom has aimed to secure, by all the different institutions of political society,—that the public REASON should prevail over the public FEELING. But, however confident is the assertion, however pretty and quaint is the antitheses, in which it is conveyed, tricked out, too, with all the decoration of italics and CAPITALS, to catch the eye, and surprise the judgment, it is not so that a question of such serious importance can be determined. To satisfy the reason, something of closer examination and deeper discussion is required. As a plain man, therefore, having no party interest to manage, and thinking for myself, I shall endeavour to discover and exhibit truth, in her own unadorned simplicity.

Let us, then, look a little into the ground of this assertion. I have, indeed, in some degree, chosen to begin this letter with the passage I have quoted, because the explanation which the writer gives of his meaning, is well worthy of attention.—“It is a “struggle,” (he goes on to say), “between “a sense of two sorts of dangers; the dangers of peace, and the dangers of war. “The first,” (he assumes) “are somewhat “distant and uncertain, and may be averted by events: the latter are immediate “and inevitable. Hence, (concludes he) “to risk the former is preferred; but the “choice is made with a sigh, and with “heavy forebodings.” Alas! Sir, “sighs “and heavy forebodings” do not usually accompany the clear and steady decisions of satisfied reason: they rather speak the confused and tumultuous victory of one ill-defined feeling over another. If, however, we for a moment put out of our view the positive truth or falsehood of the comparison, which is assigned as the motive, I do believe this to be a sufficiently faithful account of the gloomy, dull, dead acquiescence which the majority of Parliament certainly, and possibly of the nation, coldly and doubtfully yielded to the ambiguous intimations of Ministers, and the more intelligible rhetoric of their powerful champion and protector, Mr. Fox. Our day-dreams of the blessings of peace are fled for ever. We distinctly perceive that our present situation is, what, if I remember right, some of the Minister’s own connexions described it to be,—nothing better than “a hollow armed truce,” that very truce, which, when desired before, under its proper name, was refused, with the warm approbation of every honest man in the kingdom; but when offered to sale, as a favour and a boon, under the specious name of peace, was eagerly purchased by our rulers, at a price never yet given for the safest and most beneficial settlement of our own interests, and the liberties of Europe. There is, in fact, no question now between war on the one side, and peace on the other. The only choice is between two evils of the same kind; the war of the sword, and the war of journals and gazettes, of memorials and remonstrances, of tariffs and cockets, of intrigues and influence (if any influence we can ever regain) in all the foreign courts of Europe; attended, at every turn, with mutual preparations for actual hostilities; and ultimately leading, at no great distance of time, to a more obstinate and dubious contest for our independence, or to absolute and final submission.

To this point, Sir, FEELING and REASON have journeyed on amicably together; but here, it seems, they take different roads. The former, with HONOUR for her companion, holds on the steep and arduous, but plain and direct track that rises before her: the latter stops short, and led by INDOLENCE, turns away, to wind as she imagines, by a gentle declivity, along the side of the mountain that opposes her progress. I fear, however, that she will soon find her path rough with stones, and perplexed with brambles and briars, carrying her downward with more precipitous descent at every step, till she sees the gulph of ruin and infamy yawning under her feet; from which there is no escape, but by clambering up the over-hanging rocks with tenfold difficulty and danger. Indeed, she has taken an ignorant and deceitful guide; and, with a little departure from her own character, forgot to look at a map of the country before she set out upon her travels.

If, Sir, the choice has been made on such a notion as this writer holds out to us, of the dangers of war compared with the dangers of peace, I do not hesitate to say, it has been rashly as well as erroneously made. No such question has ever been discussed, certainly not in the debate on the King's speech, by which it is said to have been determined. For this I have what the writer whom I have quoted must allow to be incontrovertible authority. The report in the same paper will shew him, that he has, with consummate justice, pronounced sentence against Mr. Windham, without hearing him. That gentleman is there represented as having expressly distinguished that he did not mean to consider at all the expediency or in expediency of immediate war. The words attributed to him are:— “Not being in an official situation, I am “NOT SUFFICIENTLY INFORMED TO ad“vise particularly; but I THINK we should “weigh well in what situation we shall be, when
 “the war shall come upon us; for come it
 “will, and sooner than I wish to say. I “THINK it would be the wiser way to anticipate “the blow; BUT THIS IS MORE THAN IS “NECESSARY FOR ME TO ENTER INTO,
 “as it is for Ministers to determine.” And the other reports all concur in making a similar reservation. As I am no respecter of persons, I am not concerned whether Mr. WINDHAM may be thought to have done right or wrong in thus treating his subject. All which I think it important to observe, is, that in fact he did so treat it. He seems to have designed no more, than to impress the country with a just and awful sense of its present situation; professedly leaving every thing beyond to future deliberation, whenever sufficient knowledge shall have been obtained to light the public REASON to a sound and well-informed conclusion.

Mr. T. GRENVILLE and the other speakers on that side, if we may trust the same channels of intelligence (and I have no other) confined themselves within still narrower limits. They chiefly protested against one passage of the address, which, they apprehended might otherwise be interpreted into a declaration of confidence in the present administration, and as in propriety they were bound to do, they stated why they did not think that confidence to have been deserved. It was, that while France had been continually month after month taking some new measure of violent and dangerous aggrandizement, openly attempting to interfere in the internal concerns of this country, for the purpose of silencing the British Press, and at the same time endeavouring to prohibit us from interfering in the affairs of the continent: in proportion as she increased her military and naval force, our establishments were gradually reduced, and our conquests continued to be delivered up under the treaty, till a sudden alarm, we had not yet been told wherefore, all at once changed the whole course of our proceeding; new orders were dispatched to countermand the cessions which had been directed; and new invitations were thrown forth to re-assemble the men, whom we had lost no time, and spared no expense to discharge and disperse. I restrict myself to the speeches in the House of Commons; because to them only allusion is made; but the tendency of what passed in the House of Lords appears to me to have been very similar. And in all this what is there to raise a question between FEELING and REASON in the comparative dangers of war and of peace.

BUT the DANGERS OF WAR, truly! the “immediate and inevitable” DANGERS OF WAR! Oh! Sir, how are we already degraded by this pusillanimous peace! This is the first time, I believe, that ever such an argument was addressed to our fears. While the war lasted, when the preliminary articles and the definitive treaty were debated, we heard indeed of the injustice of the war, of the inutility of continuing the war, of the burthen and expense of all war, of the horror of war contrasted with the blessings of peace; but not a syllable of the positive dangers, “the “immediate and inevitable” dangers of war. I am persuaded, that the spirit of the nation was not then so far broken, as to have tolerated such language. And is it possible even now, that the people, who two years since, when all our allies, some from caprice, some from over-ruling necessity, one by one dropped away; when we were not only opposed single-handed to France and all her allies, but the very Russian troops, which had been made prisoners while fighting, were accoutred, armed, and mustered to be led against us; when in a time of scarcity we were partly dependent on the Northern States for the very bread which we hoped to eat; yet cordially applauded and strengthened the energy of that government, without waiting for an explanation, which anticipated and provoked a war with all the rest of the maritime powers of Europe;—is it possible that such a people can bear to be represented as shrinking from the peril of renewing hostilities, in a just cause, against France?

What does experience teach us of these pretended dangers? When we laid down our arms, did our merchants feel any trepidation for their rich fleets, which every wind wafted across every sea, laden with all the precious products of the world? Did our colonists in the West fear, as in former wars, lest they should be torn from the protection of the mother country? Were we under any alarm, lest France might detach to the East an army capable of putting our possessions there once more to the hazard? Could she with impunity traverse, what she affects to call her own sea, to seek in Egypt at once a compensation for the American colonies which she had lost, and the means of distant and future attack on our Indian empire, which she could not immediately approach? Could she send out a naval expedition, a cruiser, or a merchant ship in safety? There was, there could be no danger—but of public distress in our finances, or of an invasion. The first is, in other words, the plea of necessity, so strenuously renounced alike by the late and present Chancellor of the Exchequer, before the peace, and up to this very moment; for within these few days, Mr. ADDINGTON, I perceive, has asserted, that without laying any very inconvenient pressure on the country, he could readily find resources for a seven years war. And if there be any point on which such an authority is entitled to peculiar respect, it is here. What, then, is the only remaining terror? That of being compelled to fight for our existence on English land? The menace is not new; It has been perpetually repeated in former wars, but never carried into effect. It has long since become the object of mockery and derision in our popular songs and ballads. Are we then changed? or has that danger become so much more formidable? I am far, very far from thinking, that it is not considerably increased by the possession, or use, which our adversary will now have, of so many harbours and naval stations opposite to the eastern, the most defenceless coast of our island. Yet, let us seriously reflect, that if we admit the preponderating weight of this argument, we must also admit at once the necessity of absolute, unqualified submission. In any future war, whenever begun, and from whatever cause, that danger must equally be encountered.

It may be said, perhaps, in answer to these topics from past experience, that we do not stand in the same advantageous position now, as at the conclusion of the late war. It is true, the treaty of Amiens has indeed made a lamentable change. France has augmented her army by more than 100,000 men. She and her allies have obtained from us a supply of seamen sufficient to man between 40 and 50 ships of the line. Their exhausted dock yards are replenished. They have actually at this moment more ships of the line commissioned than we. In the West-Indies they have Martinique, the key of the circumjacent islands, now rendered inexpugnable by our labour and at our cost; and from the relics of their force at St. Domingo, if they despair of that enterprise, they may furnish an expedition at least of doubtful success against Jamaica. With regard to the East-Indies, we know not at this instant, whether if hostilities should now break out, we shall have a resting place for the necessary refreshment of our troops, who will otherwise go, not to the garrisons and camps, but to the hospitals of India.

If we then turn our eyes homeward, we shall discover with mortification and shame that we have forfeited the confidence and affection of Europe, which never considered what France had over-run, as totally lost, till we abandoned all at Amiens. Then we did not gradually descend in reputation; we were at once plunged from the summit of glory to the lowest abyss of disgrace. The first sentiment, was, a disbelief of the fact; the next astonishment;—that which too soon succeeded, and which will long remain, was,—contempt. And, whatever we have lost in character, is more than added to the intimidation, which France inspires.

Such is the alteration worked by a single year of this ill-omened peace: what, then, are we to expect from its continuance? Is the strength of the French empire likely to grow with its duration, or to be diminished by natural decay, or the shock of internal riots. Are the dangers of peace as they have been described, "uncertain" and "such as may be averted," in the ordinary course of human events? For, innocent as we are, in comparison with our adversary, we are not yet a nation so pure in ourselves as to reckon on a peculiar interposition of Providence in our favour; and, the superior crimes of one people, as history both sacred and profane will teach us, are sometimes made the instrument of divine punishment on the rest of the world.

To the considerations which I have hinted at, and to many others, which have been made use of to deaden the spirit of the people, as well as the paltry views of party interests, which they are most unworthily designed to answer, I am most anxious, Sir, to proceed:—but I am afraid, that I have already occupied more space than you can well afford me. I shall, however, resume the first opportunity, and, with the blessing of God on the humble efforts of an obscure individual, endeavour to go through this important subject. In the mean time, I hope, that your readers will search their own bosoms, and breathe a little from the only terror which any man can reasonably pretend, that of an invasion. Let them remember, that the sooner they venture to raise their eyes in the face of this danger, the better they will be prepared to meet it: and, upon this fear will all the future policy of France turn, till it has been fairly met and baffled. Yet, let me not be misinterpreted. Be the advantages of an early renewal of hostilities, over a protracted truce (such as we at present have), what they may, we ought not, on that ground alone, to break a treaty, however injurious, which we have solemnly ratified. We must have a just cause of quarrel; we must be satisfied, that there has been some attack on our interests or our honour.

A FREEHOLDER.

Highgate, Dec. 1, 1802.

TO SIR JOSEPH BANKS, BART.

SIR,—Although the unmerited neglect which my last letter experienced at your hands might offend a more captious correspondent, I cannot withhold my compliments on your reinstatement in the chair which you lately occupied with so much dignity, fidelity, and discretion: and indeed, Sir Joseph, you have reason to expect from me not congratulations only, but excuses, because the event of St. Andrew's day has shewn that the charge of vilifying the Royal Society was unfounded.—If that learned body should require a champion in future, I would recommend to them some gentleman of the bar, accustomed to defend the most worthless of mankind; perhaps Mr. Erskine would accept the office; for my own part, I abandon those who have abandoned their own honour, being of opinion that to suffer calumny is indeed a common lot, but to court the calumniator, to abet our own abasement, is the lowest depth of turpitude.—The men who have prostituted their suffrages on this occasion aspire, undoubtedly, to share with you a seat in "that first literary society of the world," the National Institute of France; and since they deserve the stigma, I trust they will obtain it; in which case your memorable address will supply them with a model of thanksgiving: but as the process of individual election may seem too tedious for their philosophical impatience, I beg leave to suggest a more compendious mode of accomplishing their purpose, by procuring (through the joint influence of you and Mr. Fox) a consular decree to merge the London Society in that of Paris. Should this affiliation be effected, though it might not be expedient to assume at first the maternal name, it would, however, be requisite, or at least decorous, to relinquish their ancient title, and substitute that of Philogallican Club, or Regicide Academy, or any other which you may deem appropriate to their views and dispositions; the metonymy to commence on the 21st of January, the anniversary of your incomparable letter and of the murder of Louis XVI.—Your management of the Royal Society proves you to be an apt disciple of the French School; for as it prepares its empire by insulting and debasing the nations which it designs to vanquish, and finds the conquest easy in proportion as the prey becomes contemptible, (a scheme of policy which is now pursued steadily and effectually against England) so you, Sir Joseph, have applied the same rule to subdue a herd of literati. It is true that this display of science was perfectly gratuitous, and that if to maintain the credit of your Society you had manifested a portion of that zeal which you have exerted to pollute it, your re-election would have been equally secure; and, in the judgment of such unsophisticated men as I am, the Presidency so retained would have been more honourable to yourself. But herein again you imitate your masters, whose liberal and enlarged ambition heeds not the condition of their subjects, and prefers the unqualified submission of impoverished and despicable slaves to the voluntary friendship of a generous but independent people: and if they accomplish the end which they have constantly in view, and which is the chief object of their insidious and unremitting machinations, assuredly they will not suffer us to retain any particle of those blessings that have long been the inheritance of our island; they will plunder us of our wealth (that will be a trifling concern), they will bereave us of our force, our laws, our liberty, and, above all, of that proud and undaunted spirit, the source of our ancient happiness and glory.

Before I conclude this letter, I must congratulate you and your French brethren on their recent acquisition of the arch-patriot of Palace-yard, a man qualified in every way to justify their choice in the class where they have ranged him; the steady partizan of all the conflicting governments of France, the bitter enemy of all her enemies, the apologist of her crimes, the eulogist of her frenzy, the abettor of her aggrandisement; he assimilates with the Institute in morals as well as in politics, and his piety is as orthodox as your own.

And now, Sir Joseph, I take my leave of you and your associates probably for ever: the indignation excited by your conduct subsides into contempt; and the British public will no longer deign to interest itself in your proceedings, foreign or domestic, ostensible or occult, unless peradventure they become a subject for legal animadversion. I am, &c. &c. MISOGALLUS.

Dec. 7th, 1802.

TO WILLIAM WILBERFORCE, ESQ.

SIR,—I have long had an intention to investigate your political opinions, conduct, and motives; and, if adversity be the season, in which nations, as well as individuals, may be taught to see and to abjure the causes of their disgrace; if the people of this country be not more senseless and more hardened than the most callous of malefactors, now is the time to present them with this investigation. Before, however, I enter upon my intended remarks on the general tone and tendency of your politics, and on the great and fatal, though, in its operation, not conspicuous, influence which they have had on the domestic, the colonial, and foreign, affairs of the kingdom, I think it necessary to notice certain passages in your late address to the freeholders of the county of York.—“In appearing before you, on the present occasion, I cannot but feel, that I am placed in a serious, and I might almost “say, an awful situation; for I am come before you to render up an account of the trust, which, six years ago, your kindness committed to me; and, when I consider the weight and importance of that trust, under any circumstances, and still more when I reflect on the very critical and portentous times, during which I have possessed it, which have tended to multiply its difficulties and to increase its responsibility, it is natural for me to feel that I am in a grave and solemn situation, now that I stand before you to answer to you for the discharge of its various and weighty duties. I will fairly own to you also, gentlemen, that there is another consideration, which powerfully affects my mind; I mean the prodigious size of our vast county; its population, its wealth, and all those other circumstances by which it is distinguished. I know, indeed, that it is constitutional language to affirm, that a member of parliament for any place, be it what it may, is, when chosen, the representative, not of his own particular constituents, but of the people of England in general: that the member for Old Sarum is a member of parliament equally with the member of the very county, in which we stand.—This is an opinion, which, in the main, I myself hold; it is sound constitutional doctrine, which I maintain, and which this day, I publicly avow; but yet, gentlemen, be must have a mind of greater power of practical abstraction than mine, or have firmer nerves than I possess, who, when the rights, the interests, the credit, the character, the honour, of this great county (itself a little kingdom) are committed to his care, does not feel himself loaded with a burden far more weighty than that which he would have to bear, if he were the representative of some decayed town or insubstantial borough.—Gentlemen, I trust I may appear before you with boldness, because, though conscious of my errors and imperfections, I can truly declare, that I have acted with honest and pure intentions, with a mind unbiassed by personal considerations or party motives; with a sincere desire of promoting the welfare of our common country—I have not made the sacred trust which you confided to me, subservient to the purposes of my own interest or aggrandisement.—Gentlemen, I trust, it will be our future policy to abstain, as far as possible, from those continental connections, for which I had almost said the very integrity and

"good faith of the ministers and people of this country, render us unfit, inasmuch as we cannot keep or break our engagements according as it suits the convenience of the present moment, in the fluctuating state of human affairs. We shall, I trust, cultivate our own internal resources, and endeavour to render our people secure, prosperous, and contented. I am happy to declare to you, gentlemen, that the character of his Majesty's present administration, and the tenor of their past conduct, firm and temperate, but yet conciliating and unassuming, is a pledge for their continuing to act with the same honest and faithful attention to the true interests of their country."—The address, from which this quotation is made, was delivered to the freeholders of Yorkshire previous to your late re-election. It had, doubtless, been prepared with great deliberation, it has since been published, from under your own hand, in almost all the newspapers in the kingdom, and, it is, therefore, a fair object of close and severe criticism. I have, indeed, seen, in the True Briton, a publication, purporting to be a speech, delivered by you, in the House of Commons, on the 25th ultimo; in which speech, the editor makes you say, in reference to the address above quoted, that it had about it, perhaps, some unseasonable merriment; but that those who animadverted on it, ought to have made some allowance for your situation; that you had occasion to return to your constituents, and to address them upon the subject of their pressure arising from the war; and that, therefore, if you did make use of an odd expression, you were entitled to some indulgence in speaking, upon such an occasion, to such a class of persons as your constituents were.—Observe, Sir, that I do not impute these sentiments to you: it is impossible, that Mr. Wilberforce should have represented as a jest, as a mere odd expression, made use of to soothe and coax a crowd of ignorant, credulous, avaricious countrymen; it is absolutely impossible, that the moral, the pious, I had almost said the sanctified, Mr. Wilberforce, should have given this interpretation to any part or particle of an address, at the delivery of which he professed to consider himself as placed not only in a "serious," a "grave," and a "solemn," but even in "an awful situation!"—No; this is impossible; the speech, as given in the newspapers, must be grossly erroneous, if not altogether a fabrication: the address to the freeholders of York was a serious, grave, and solemn act; a deliberate declaration of your principles; an "awful" enunciation of your political creed.

Those particular parts of this address which I propose, at present, to remark on, sufficiently explain your sentiments as to parliamentary and to foreign politics. With respect to the former, I cannot but admire the acuteness, with which you, in the letter, subscribe to the "sound constitutional doctrine," while, in the spirit, you retain those democratical principles of reform, by the aid of which you first found your way into parliament as member for the deluded county of York; I cannot but admire the modesty, as well as the nice discrimination of character and intellect, which led you to provide for the meridian of St. Stephen's, a confession of the perfect equality between you and a member for Old Sarum, while you taught the clowns of Yorkshire to regard their county as "a little kingdom," and you, of course, as a little king. Desirous as I am, however, to do you justice on these and some other points, I must, for the present, repress that desire, and confine myself to your professions of honesty, pure intentions, and disinterestedness, in the discharge of the "sacred" trust reposed in you by the persons whom you call your constituents. And here I must confess to you, that all this talk about constitutional doctrine, representatives, constituents, trust reposed, rendering account, &c. &c. as applied to the members of his Majesty's parliament and the electors of those members, is, in my opinion, when strictly examined, an unintelligible jargon, the mere slang of vulgar politicians, an assemblage of words and notions totally unknown to the letter and to the spirit of the laws and usages, under which the King's parliament is called together, and under which it acts. This, however, is a topic too unimportant to stand in competition against that of your unheard-of disinterestedness, which, leaving, your "honesty" and "pure intentions," to be noticed hereafter, I shall now proceed to examine.

Next to the word liberty, Sir, I do not, at this moment, recollect one that admits of a greater variety of interpretations, or that has produced more mischief in the world, than that of disinterestedness. You seem, however, to have affixed to it a meaning definite enough to reason upon. You say: "I have not made the sacred trust, which you confided to me, subservient to the purposes of my own interest or aggrandizement." If, then, disinterestedness consists in not making use of parliamentary influence for the purposes of private interest or aggrandisement, the next consideration, is, what ought to be regarded as private interest or aggrandisement. Is it exclusively the obtaining of money, or of titles? If so, disinterestedness is a very cheap commodity to him who happens to be rich, and who would think himself degraded by a title. Is it merely the possession of place? No; for though, as present experience teaches us, some men certainly wish for office because it enables them to gratify their own covetousness and vanity, there are others, and, I hope, a far greater number, who, in their pursuit of power, are actuated by the noble motive of advancing the honour and happiness of their sovereign and their country. That considerations of a private nature, that the desire of posthumous, and even of present, fame, may and must mix themselves along with this great leading public motive, I allow; but, Sir, I defy you to show me, in the conduct of a placeman of this latter description, any presumption that he has made the choice of his electors subservient to his own interest or aggrandisement, which presumption will not apply, with equal, if not with greater force to yourself. Such a minister of state may bestow, or cause to be bestowed, numerous places and pensions; but I much question if any one, of late years, has done more in this way than yourself. Such a minister may be proud of being the servant of the King; you of being the "representative" of "a little kingdom." Such a minister may desire to be, and may be, in reality, the open and absolute ruler of the nation; while your meekness may lead you to be content with being the secret, but not less absolute ruler of that same minister. Your ambition is of a different species, and seeks, therefore, a different sort of gratification. You have, indeed, in your address to your "constituents" since your re-election, given us an ample explanation of your feelings and motives, as applicable to this subject.—"I see also in its true point of elevation the exalted station to which your favourable opinion has again raised me. Suffer me in truth to say, (a sentiment the avowal of which, remarks that have been elsewhere made may render not improper) that I consider the honour of being your representative as one of the highest dignities I could enjoy. Great is my respect for hereditary honours. It is still greater for those which have been granted by the well-judging hand of our sovereign, for brilliant exploits rendered to the public by our great naval and military commanders, or for long and faithful services in public offices of high trust and laborious duty. But he must have a mind constituted very differently from mine; his estimate of things must be formed on very different principles; who could account as more honourable that nobility which should be granted from motives of political interest or personal favour, than the dignified and exalted station to which he is elevated, who, by the free and united voice of the freeholders of Yorkshire, is elected to be the depository of their interests, and the guardian of their rights."—I believe you to have been perfectly sincere in this declaration; and, indeed, every man in England must know, that if, during the administration of Mr. Pitt, it had pleased you to be a peer, you would not now have been a commoner. But, what becomes then of your disinterestedness? Or, at least, where is the proof of it? What sacrifice of interest or aggrandisement do you make in so acting as to insure your re-election, and, with it, the possession of what you regard as "one of the highest of dignities?" Already "loaded" with honours full as great, in your modest estimation, as those of the hero of the Nile, and greater than those of the descendants of Marlborough, what had you to covet? What greater object could you have than that of preserving your seat? To what greater purpose of interest or aggrandisement could you possibly have converted your parliamentary trust?

Since, then, the mere circumstance of not having been in office (even supposing you capable of it), and not having received a title, is, in itself, no proof, nor even presumption, in favour of that "honesty," that "uprightness," those "pure intentions," or that wonderful "disinterestedness," of which you make so ostentatious a display; and, since it is evident, from your own declarations, that the principal object of your ambition, is, to preserve your seat for the county of York, to continue to be the "representative" of a "little kingdom," it remains for me to inquire whether the means, by which you have hitherto secured that object, are such as entitle you to that character for superior political purity, which you have assumed, and which, through the credulity of others, has given you, in the public affairs of this country, a degree of influence that has largely contributed towards the adoption of those measures, which have produced our present embarrassment and disgrace.—But this inquiry

I must postpone till my next.—I am, Sir, yours, &c. &c. WM. COBBETT.

London, Nov. 6, 1802.

PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT.

Wednesday, December 1.

HOUSE OF PEERS.—Counsel were heard relative to the Scotch Appeal, Graham v. Henderson; and several new petitions were presented.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence moved, “that a committee be appointed to take into consideration the present situation of the House, for the purpose of considering the best mode in which the House, and the parts and chambers appertaining thereto, may be rendered more convenient and commodious for the reception of the Peers.” Question put, and committee appointed.—Petitions were presented from their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of Clarence and Cumberland, as peers of Ireland, requesting that they may be allowed their right to vote at the election of peers to sit and vote for Ireland. Referred to the Committee of Privileges.—Mr. Robinson, from the London Wet Dock Company, presented the account of the receipts and disbursements of that corporation, from June 1, 1801 to May 31, 1802, and also a report of the Surveyors relative to the progress of the works carrying on.—Lord Moira gave notice, that on Friday he should bring forward a motion for the production of some papers relative to the transactions which had taken place respecting the Nabob of Arcot.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Petitions complaining of undue elections were presented from East Grinstead, Cirencester, Bishop's Castle, Evesham, and Retford.—Petitions were also presented from the Malsters of Whitchurch, praying for relief.—General Gascoyne moved, “That there be laid before the House an account of the number of ships, with the amount of tonnage, and the number of men employed therein, who have cleared outwards, and entered inwards from Oct. 10, 1800 to Oct. 10, 1802, distinguishing Foreign from British ships.”—Mr. Addington stated, that the information must be withheld till January next, at which time the accounts were regularly made up. The motion was therefore withdrawn.—Mr. Vamott brought up an account of Exchequer Bills issued in pursuance of the Act of last Session, at present unprovided for.—Mr. Addington moved, “that a sum not exceeding £2,781,532 : 15 : 3½ be granted to pay off Exchequer Bills issued in pursuance of the 42 Geo. III.”—Sir P. Stephens moved, “that 50,000 men should be employed for the sea service, for the year 1803, including 12,000 marines; that £1,202,500 be granted for wages for the said 50,000 men for 13 lunar months, at the rate of 37s. per month per man; that £1,235,000 be granted for victuals for the said men, for 13 lunar months, at the rate of 38s. per month per man; that £1,950,000 be granted for wear and tear of the ships on board of which the said men are to be employed, for 13 lunar months, at £3 per man per month; that £162,500 be granted for Ordnance Stores, for the sea service, for the said ships at the rate of 2s. per month per man.” Agreed to.—In a Committee of the House, to take into consideration the Militia Laws of Ireland, Mr. Corry moved, “that the sum of £400,000 be advanced to defray the expense of raising the militia of Ireland.” Agreed to.

Thursday, December 2.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—A petition complaining of an undue election was presented from Newcastle-under-Line.—A petition was also presented from the malsters of Leicester against the Malt Wetting Act.—The Small Note Bill was read and passed.—Mr. Alexander brought up the report of the Committee of Supply, and on the motion that the resolution for granting 50,000 seamen for the service of the ensuing year be read a second time, an interesting debate took place, which will be found at length in our Supplement. Mr. Thos. Grenville expressed his astonishment, that ministers should demand an extraordinary supply of seamen, without condescending to give the least explanation of the reasons which induce the necessity, or the purposes to which he means to apply them. He was followed on the same side by Mr. Sturges, Lord Proby, Sir R. Laurie, Mr. Canynge, and Dr. Lawrence. The speakers on the other side were, Mr. Addington, Sir Sidney Smith, Capt. Markham, Lord Hawkesbury, and the Attorney-General. The resolutions were put and carried.—The report of the Committee on the Irish Militia Bill was brought up, and the resolutions agreed to.

Friday, December 3.

HOUSE OF PEERS.—Counsel were heard in continuation relative to the Scotch Appeal, Graham v. Henderson.—Lord Moira presented a bill entitled, “An Act for the more effectual prevention of frivolous and vexatious arrests, and for the relief of persons imprisoned on Mesne Process; and also a bill for the ‘Relief of certain Insolvent Debtors.’”—Lord Moira moved, “that there be laid before the House, copies of all the instructions sent out on the part of the East-India Company, from January 1, 1797 to January 1, 1801, from the Court of Directors to the Governor-General; also to the Governor of Madras, relative to the assumption of the Government of the Carnatic.” Ordered.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Petitions complaining of undue elections were presented from Radnorshire, Newcastle, and Kingston-upon-Hull.—Mr. Pole brought up the estimates of the Ordnance Service for the ensuing year.—Mr. Addington, in the Committee of Ways and Means, moved the resolutions for the annual duties upon malt, mum, cyder, perry, tobacco, and sugar: he also moved, “that a sum not exceeding five millions be raised by loans on Exchequer Bills.” Agreed to.—Gen. Gascoyne presented a petition from the merchants of Liverpool, against the Tonnage Duty.—Mr. Dent presented a petition from the prisoners in Lancaster gaol, praying for relief.

Monday, December 6.

HOUSE OF PEERS.—Heard counsel in a Scotch Appeal.—Promissory Note Bill brought up, and read a first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Accounts were laid before the House of the number of ships employed in the Whale Fishery from Scotland: of the quantity of rice and corn imported, and the bounties thereon: also an account from the Exchequer, shewing the amount of the permanent taxes from Oct. 1801 to Oct. 1802.—A petition from the Brewers of Gloucester, against the late duty on beer was presented.—A petition was presented complaining of a double return for Sterling.—Petitions were also presented complaining of undue elections for Carrickfergus, Coventry, Leominster, Aylesbury, Middlesex, Malden, Honiton, Shaftesbury Windsor, Weymouth, Great Grimsby, and Malcombe, Regis.—Mr. Dickenson presented a petition from the debtors in Ilchester gaol.—Mr. Alexander brought up the report of the Committee of Ways and Means; the resolutions were agreed to, and bills ordered to be brought in.—Irish Militia Bill read a second time.—Mr. Vansittart presented an account of the bounties paid for taking and bringing fish to the markets of London and Westminster: he also moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend an Act of 41 Geo. III. relative to the interest of 3½d. per diem on Navy Bills.—Sir E. Nepean moved, that there be laid before the House an account of the expense for the maintenance of prisoners of war, payable in 1802.

Tuesday, December 7.

HOUSE OF PEERS.—Heard counsel in a Scotch Appeal.—Promissory Note Bill read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Bill brought in for enlarging the burying ground of St. Giles' parish.—A petition from the druggists of Tavistock for the repeal of the Medicine Act was presented; and also one from the prisoners confined for debt in Worcester gaol. Petitions complaining of undue elections were presented from Shaftesbury, Kingston-upon-Hull, Newcastle-under-Line, Hereford, Carmarthen, Bridgewater, Tregony, Sudbury, Seaford, Minehead, Hereford City, Durham, and the City of London. A petition was presented from Middlesex against the return of Sir F. Burdett, and charging him with bribery and corruption. Another petition from Middlesex against the competency of Mr. Mainwaring, and denying the charges contained in his petition against the return of Sir F. Burdett was also presented; as strong doubts were entertained of the admissibility of this petition, a motion was made, that the debate upon it be adjourned to Monday.—Sir E. Nepean presented some accounts relative to prisoners of war.—The Irish Militia went through a committee.—Mr. Vansittart moved for an account of the money advanced out of the Civil List in consequence of addresses of that House, and which had not been made good by Parliament. The Malt Bill, Land Tax Pension Bill, Exchequer Bills Bill, and Navy Bills Bill were read a first time.—The Indemnity Bill was read a second time.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Constantinople, Oct. 25.—A great irritation still prevails between the Turkish and English troops in Egypt. There have been several bloody affairs between them, and the English General has thought it proper to require the Turks to restore the forts of Alexandria which have been already ceded to them, as necessary for his security, till the final evacuation of the city; but with this request they have refused to comply. The English, however, still remain in possession of the city of Alexandria.—The courts of Madrid and Naples, and the Batavian government, having obtained the consent of the Russian court that their ships should trade to the Russian ports on the Black Sea, the Russian ambassador here, general Tamara, has presented a memoir to the Porte, requesting the grant of a free navigation of the Black Sea for those governments, to which the Porte does not appear disinclined, provided it receives some advantages in return.—The Spanish ambassador here, the Chevalier De Corral, has applied to the Porte to acknowledge the King of Etruria, to which the Reis Effendi has answered, that the Porte is ready so to do, provided the established ordinance be not departed from, which requires that this acknowledgment shall be made by means of a treaty of peace.—A commercial treaty has been concluded with Spain, relative to the free navigation of the Black Sea.

Leghorn, Nov. 12.—The Batavian vice-admiral, De Winter, has been at Tripoly, and concluded a peace with that state, under a promise to pay to the Pacha an annual acknowledgment of 80,000 Spanish piasters, of which sum, 20,000 are to be paid immediately, and the remainder after the expiration of six months. A yearly present of 7,000 piasters is besides to be made. The Dutch have likewise given the Pacha 120 barrels of gun-powder and a quantity of tar.

Ratisbon, Nov. 20.—The deputation of the empire held its twenty eighth sitting the day before yesterday, when it voted a conclusum, importing that a definitive conclusum should be immediately prepared.—In the same sitting, a decree of Imperial commission was read, in which the minister of His Imperial Majesty formally required the deputation not to separate before they had finally decided upon the lot of those princes and ecclesiastical corporations, who, by the cession of the left bank of the Rhine, have been entirely dispossessed of their territories, referring to a preceding conclusum, by which the deputation agreed to provide sufficient funds for the maintenance of those who would cease to exist as states of the empire.

Vienna, Nov. 21.—Prince Nicholas Estethazy, lieutenant-captain of the Hungarian guard, is going to Paris. He took leave of His Imperial Majesty the day before yesterday. He will pass the greater part of the winter at Paris, and will, it is said, likewise go to London.—The brother of the Prince Ruspoli, who has been elected grand-master of the order of Malta, is here, and has received a letter from the prince, who is in England, informing him that he has declined accepting the dignity of grand-master, and stating his reasons for his refusal.—Letters from Italy say, that the vice-president of the Italian republic, citizen Melzi, will make a journey to his estates in Spain, and that general Murat will, in the mean time, exercise his functions.—General Colli, who formerly commanded the Sardinian army in Piedmont, which was joined by the Austrian troops, being now completely restored to health, is again in actual service.—The Palatine of Hungary is preparing to make a journey to Petersburg, which is supposed by some, to have a reference to an intended marriage with a Russian princess.

Ratisbon, Nov. 22.—On the 19th, citizen Laforet and baron Ehler again gave in a short note to the deputation of the empire, in which they say, that “the recess (or final conclusion) of the deputation is now immediately expected; a recess which must necessarily contain the general plan of indemnities, and the supplementary regulations, together with the regulations relative to the provisional maintenance of the chamber of the empire.” To this notification the said ministers have added some alterations, relative to the indemnities of the prince of Leinengen, the grand prior of the order of Malta, and the Helvetic republic; no change, however, is made in the principal allotments.—In the 29th sitting of the deputation, which was held on the 20th inst. the recess of the deputation was begun to be drawn up, and read as far as the 47th section inclusive: to-morrow, probably, the whole will be completed.—In consequence of the approaching occupation of this city, its ecclesiastical foundations and convents, by 300 of the electoral arch-chancellor's troops, the magistracy, on the 19th, published a notification of the approaching change of the government, in which they exhort all persons to behave peaceably and orderly on the entrance of the troops.

Augsburgh, Nov. 22.—As we are now freed, by the generosity of the mediating powers, from all the solicitude with respect to our continuing an imperial city, our magistracy will next Wednesday take possession of all the ecclesiastical edifices, lands, and property, within this city and its territory.—Several Swiss commercial houses propose to remove to Augsburgh, in consequence of the present distracted state of their country.

The government of the Bavarian territory in Suabia will be removed to Ulm.

Basle, Nov. 23.—Several nominations have been made within these few days past for the consulta, at Paris. The canton of Rhetia (the Grisons), have sent the senator Surecher, minister of police and of justice, and the prefect Planta. The city of Berne has deputed M. Gruber, president of the municipality, and the ex-patricians Wattenwyl, Jenner, and Haller. M. Mulinin has refused to accept his nomination. Several communes, of the canton of Appenzel, have appointed the receiver-general of the canton of Solis, citizen Zuber, to attend to their interests at the congress at Paris.—According to a decree of the senate, the members of the insurrectional authorities are called upon personally, and substantially, to restore all money and effects belonging to the republic, which they seized during the momentary triumph of the Oligarchic party.

Paris, Dec. 1.—Sidi Mustapha Arnout, envoy from the Bey of Tunis, was admitted last Sunday to an audience of the First Consul at the palace of St. Cloud. He explained, by means of his interpreter, the object of his mission, which was to congratulate the First Consul on his election to the consulate for life, and to express an hope that the First Consul would grant his friendship and protection to Tunis.

The general of division, Boudet, who has arrived from St. Domingo, brings intelligence respecting the situation of that colony, which must entirely dissipate the malevolent and alarming reports which have been raised. At the review of the 23d of September, the army was found to consist of 13,000 infantry of the line, 5000 light infantry 2000 gendarmes, 2000 artillery, and 500 cavalry, amounting altogether to 23,500 men, whites from Europe, and of 4000 black colonial troops. Of these troops there were in the hospitals 2600 infantry of the line, 1100 light infantry, 150 gendarmes, and 400 artillery. There remains, therefore, between 18 and 19,000 whites fit for service, and near 4000 blacks. The number of sick in the hospitals was, doubtless, considerable, but it does not amount to above a fifth of the whole. The rainy season having set in, it is probable that by the latter end of October there would be a diminution of one half in the hospitals.—The men who have perished since the debarkation of the army, either by disease or the sword, amount to about a fifth. This review was passed with the greatest strictness, and the result signed by general Leclerc, the inspector of reviews, and general Dugua, chief of the Etat Major.—All those troops which arrived in December, January, and February, and who have had time to become accustomed to the climate during the winter, have suffered much less than the others from the disease, which has been, not only at St. Domingo, but throughout America, much more dangerous than usual.—In the review there was not comprised the 36th regiment, con-
